

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. CASES

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

January, 1826.

Injunction—Motion to Dissolve—What Defendant Must Show.—On a motion to dissolve an injunction, it ought not to be required of the defendant, to invalidate, by full proof, the allegations of the bill: but the burthen of proof lies on the plaintiff to support them. All that is required of the defendant, is, to shew that the evidence of the plaintiff is entitled to no credit.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Lynchburg.

Anthony North filed his bill, alleging, that on the 10th day of March, 1823, Thomas A. North conveyed by deed of trust to Grief Barkdale several slaves and other property, for the purposes therein mentioned; which deed was recorded as to Thomas A. North, on the 11th day of the same month, and as to the other parties, on the 12th day of January, 1824; that on the 19th day of 2 February, *1824, the trustee, having advertised the said property, sold all Injunction—Motion to Dissolve—What Defendant Must Show.—It is true that upon a motion to dissolve an injunction the defendant is considered the actor, and upon him rests the burden of disproving the equities of the bill. Such full and positive proof, however, is not exacted as would be necessary upon a final hearing of the cause, since the effect of requiring such strictness of proof might be to prevent a dissolution until the final hearing. And for the purposes of such motion, defendant's answer is to be taken as true, so far as responsive to the allegations of the bill, and so far as it fully and fairly meets complainant's equities without evasion, and without passing over material allegations. Ingle v. Straus, 91 Va. 223, 31 S. E. Rep. 490, citing principal case as its authority.

The settled doctrine is that, where a motion to dissolve an injunction is on the bill and answer, and the answer denies all the equity of the bill, the injunction is dissolved, of course except when from the bill and answer, special reasons may appear for continuance. Moore v. Steelman, 80 Va. 240, 341, citing principal case as authority.

And in McCoy v. McCoy, 29 W. Va. 187, 2 S. E. Rep. 239, it is said: "If the grounds for asking an injunction are not, as stated in the bill, such as to justify the awarding of an injunction, the defendant, before moving to dissolve it, should file his answer sworn to. If this answer fully and fairly meets all material allegations in the bill, without evasion and without passing over any material allegation, it must be taken as true as far as it is responsive to the bill, and if, when so regarded, it leaves no reasonable doubt on the mind of the court as to the impropriety of continuing the injunction, it should be at once dissolved on such motion. Otherwise it should be continued to the hearing. Of course, the facts thus regarded as true by the court, as stated in the answer, must be supported by affidavit to the answer, and if the answer, as in the case before us, does not verify these facts, but simply states that the respondent believes them to be true, it will not be sufficient. See Miller v. Washburn, 3 Ired. Eq. 161; Brewer v. Day, 23 N. J. Eq. 418; North v. Perrow, 4 Band. 1; Brown v. Stewart, 1 Md. Ch. 87. If the answer does not on these principles justify a dissolution of the injunction, upon motion to dissolve it, it may be supported by affidavit or depositions."

The principal case is also cited in Gallagher v. Moundsville, 34 W. Va. 736, 12 S. E. Rep. 861.

of it that he could get, at the house of the said Thomas A. North; and the complainant purchased, among other property, a negro man named George, who was delivered to the complainant and carried to his residence in another county; that the said slave returned, by permission of the complainant, to his former residence, for a short time, when he was seized by Heyden, a Deputy Sheriff of Campbell county, under an execution in favour of Stephen Perrow against the said Thomas A. North; that the said Perrow threatens to indemnify the Sheriff, and force a sale of the said slave; that the slave possesses a peculiar value to the complainant, having been raised in his family, and if he should be sold, he may be carried off to foreign parts, or exposed to cruelty and hardships, against which no legal remedy could guard. He therefore prayed, that Perrow, Heyden and Hunter, the Sheriff of Campbell county, might be made defendants; and that they should be enjoined from selling the said slave, and be compelled to restore him to the complainant.

The Chancellor refused the injunction, but it was awarded by a Judge of the Court of Appeals.

The complainant died, and the suit was revived in the name of his executor.

Perrow answered, (protesting against the jurisdiction of the Court,) that the judgment on which the said execution issued was for money which the defendant had been compelled to pay as the surety of the said Thomas A. North: that the slave in question, was not, at the time, the said execution was levied, the property of the complainant; but, so far as the creditors of T. A. North were concerned, he was his property: that the deed of trust mentioned in the bill, was fraudulent, and made with the view of protecting the property of the said T. A. North from the claims of his creditors, and not founded on any valuable consideration, or if any, on a grossly inadequate one: that by the deed, nearly the whole of T. A. North's

3 *estate, real and personal, was conveyed for the benefit of the complainant that the complainant was the father of the said T. A. North, and the latter having become much involved in debt, they combined and confederated together, to shelter and protect the property of the son from the claims of his just creditors; and the said deed of trust was the fruit of this combination: that the property sold under the deed of trust, was fairly worth from five to six thousand dollars; but it was so obvious to the company that attended the sale, that the deed was fraudulent, that no person bid for any part of it, but the complainant, who purchased it for about three thousand dollars, except a few hogs, and a small mare, which were bought by one of his sons: that a son-in-law of the complainant was the crier at the sale, and the greater part of it was knocked out to him at his first bid: that after the sale, the complainant permitted the said T. A. North to retain possession of the land, and all his household and kitchen furniture: that as to the slaves, they were removed to the county of Charlotte, in a few months after the sale, by the complainant, but he immediately sent back to the said T. A. North, the same number of other slaves, of equal value, which have ever since remained in the possession, and under the control, of the said T. A. North. The defendant therefore affirmed, that the said deed was fraudulent and void against creditors.

Affidavits were taken to prove the fraudulent intention with which the conveyance was made. The deed of trust recited, that Thomas A. North was indebted to Anthony North, in the sum of $3000; to satisfy which, the property, real and personal, therein mentioned, was conveyed in trust to Grief Barksdale.

The Chancellor dissolved the injunction; and at a subsequent day, the complainant moved the Court to re-instate it. This motion was rejected, on the ground of want of jurisdiction, as the remedy at law was complete.

From this order the complainant appealed.

4 *Johnson, for the appellant.
Leigh, for the appellee.

January 27. The PRESIDENT delivered his opinion, in which the other Judges concurred.*

Upon the proofs in this case, it is unnecessary to decide the question of jurisdiction. The evidence in the record does not only raise the suspicion of fraud in the deed (as was admitted by the counsel for the appellant,) but is so strong, as, in my opinion, to render it very improbable, if not impossible, that it can be refuted by any testimony hereafter to be taken. On a motion to dissolve, it ought not to be required of the defendant, to invalidate, by full proof, the allegations in the bill. The burthen of proof lies on the plaintiff to support them. Having obtained the injunction on the prima facie evidence of his oath, or other proofs, all that is expected of the defendant is, to shew that it is entitled to no credit. To wait for full proof, before the injunction is dissolved, would produce great delay and much mischief. In no case, could the injunction be dissolved until the cause was ready for a final hearing; and in every case, by an appeal from the decree, the injunction would be continued until the final decision of the case in this Court. There might be more hesitation in affirming the decree of the Chancellor, if the appellant would be deprived thereby of his right to produce further evidence; but that not being the effect of the affirmance of the decree here, for the reasons stated the decree is affirmed.

mon law, the vendor of personal property is not answerable for the quality of the thing sold, unless he either warrants its quality, or makes some false representation in respect to it, or, knowing of the defect, omits to disclose it: and this is the law of Virginia.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Richmond.

Wilson filed his bill, stating that in 1821, he purchased of Shackelford a negro woman and three children, for which he executed his bond payable six months after date, for $700: that the complainant believed, from the statements and representations of the defendant, that the woman was sound and healthy, and gave him a sound price: that a few days (perhaps the next day) after she came into the possession of your complainant, he disposed of her to one John Brown, who very shortly thereafter discovered that she was diseased, and returned her to the complainant; when she was examined, and pronounced unsound, by a physician of great reputation, and she was taken back by the complainant: that when the defendant was called on to take the woman back, he positively refused, alleging that she was not seriously diseased; and that the medical gentleman was deceived, but proposed to the complainant that he should carry her to South Carolina, (where he was then going,) and that if she was not well before she was sold, that he would do what was right on his return: that, under this agreement, the complainant carried the negroes to South Carolina: that the malady increased while travelling, and before her arrival it was obvious that she was labouring under an inveterate dropsy: that the complainant had her examined by several medical gentlemen, who thought her incurable; and he sold her and her children to a purchaser with a full knowledge of her situation, for $475, being $225 less than the sum for which he had executed his bond to the defendant, in addition to the 6 charges and *trouble of removing them: that, nevertheless, the defendant has obtained a judgment for the full amount of the bond: that the complainant, not being able to avail himself of this defence at law, instituted a suit in the County Court of Mecklenburg, for the fraud, but has not been yet able to get a judgment: that an execution has been levied on his property. He therefore prayed that an injunction might be granted to prohibit the defendant from proceeding further with his execution, until the decision of the action for the fraud, &c.

The injunction was awarded, upon condition that the plaintiff should dismiss his action at law.

Affidavits were taken on the part of the plaintiff, to prove the unsoundness of the negro woman in question; and on the part of the defendant, to prove his ignorance of her disease, at the time of the sale. One witness says, in answer to the question put by Wilson, whether Shackelford did not promise that if the negroes proved to be unsound, he would do what was right, "I most think he did;" and another witness, in answer to a similar question, put by the same person, replied, "I believe he did."

The defendant answered, denying that the negro was unsound when he sold her to the complainant, as far as he knew or believed:

that at the time of the contract, there were no indications in her appearance, of unsoundness, nor any suggestion of it by the complainant, and no suspicion of it by the defendant: that the complainant, being a negro trader, carried her to South Carolina; and not realizing as much profit as he expected, seeks his indemnification in this way: that he does not conceive himself bound to repair the losses, if any had been sustained, which the complainant might have incurred in hawking the woman about: that the defendant refused to take her back, and never agreed, or gave the least right to believe, that he would be accountable for any thing that might happen, &c.

On motion of the defendant, the Court dissolved the injunction; and the plaintiff appealed to this Court.

7 *Spooner, for the appellant.
Leigh, for the appellee.

January 28. JUDGE GREEN delivered his opinion, in which the other Judges concurred.

The only ground upon which the appellant can claim relief, is, that the slave which he purchased from the appellee was, at the time of the purchase, affected by a disease which finally proved fatal, but which was not known or suspected by the vendor, at the time of the sale. The charge in the bill, that Shackelford, after the woman was discovered to be diseased, promised to do what was right, is denied by the answer, and not proved. Of the two witnesses who speak upon this subject, in answer to leading questions by the plaintiff, one says, "I most think he did;" and the other says, "I believe he did." If, however, such a promise were made, it would only bind him to do what, in point of law, he was bound to do.

By the civil law, the vendor who sold property at a sound price, was held bound to warrant against all secret defects, whether they were known to him or not; even if he had made no warranty or representation whatsoever, in respect to the qualities of the property 1 Domat. 80. And this rule has been adopted in Connecticut and North and South Carolina.

But, by the common law of England, which is our law, it has been held uniformly, from the earliest times, that the vendor is not answerable for the quality of the thing sold, unless he either warrants its quality, or makes some false representation in respect to it; or, knowing of the defect, omits to disclose it; in which case, the suppression of the truth is a fraud. The same doctrine has been held in many of the United States. (See the cases cited in Peake's Nl. Pri. Cases 115, in the note to Mellish v. Mattheux and others, and in Cooper's Justinian 610, and Dunlop v. Waugh, Peake's Nl. Pri. Cases 123.)

8 *If we doubted whether the rule of the civil law or that of the common law were the most just or convenient, we should be bound to adhere to the latter.

The order dissolving the injunction should be affirmed.

I. SCOPE OF THE NOTE.

The term—warranty—has a peculiar significance according to the relation in which it is used; whether in the transfer of real estate, the sale of personal property, or in policies of insurance. This article is confined to a consideration of the law relating to warranties in sales of personal property and warranties in policies of insurance; the law of warranties in sales of real property is treated in a separate article, see monographic note on "Covenants" appended to Todd v. Summers, 2 Gratt. 167.

II. IN SALES OF PERSONAL PROPERTY.

A. DEFINITION.—A warranty is an express or implied statement of something which a party undertakes shall be a part of a contract, and, though part of the contract, collateral to the express object of it. Benj. Sales, § 600; Bouv. L. Dict. 1214; Chanter v. Hopkins, 4 Mees. & Welsb. 399.

B. ASSETS DESCENDING FROM WARRANTING ANCESTOR.—Our act, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 21, p. 368, taken from the statute of Gloucester, and extended generally to common-law warranties, applies only to cases of real assets descending from the warranting ancestor, and not to personal assets, or assets, whether real or personal, accruing from him by devise or bequest. Worsham v. Hardaway, 5 Gratt. 61.

C. IMPLIED WARRANTY OF TITLE.

1. GENERAL RULE.—While a warranty of title should only be implied with regard to sales of personal property when good faith requires it. Byrnside v. Burdett, 15 W. Va. 702. Yet when a sale of chattels is made there is always an implied warranty of good title by the vendor, where the goods are in the vendor's possession. Byrnside v. Burdett, 15 W. Va. 702; Jarrett v. Goodnow, 39 W. Va. 602, 20 S. E. Rep. 575; Cogar v. Burns Lumber Co., 46 W. Va. 256, 33 S. E. Rep. 219.

2. VENDOR'S POSSESSION.—The possession of a vendor of chattels is equivalent to an affirmation of title. And in such case the vendor is to be held to an implied warranty of title, though nothing be said on the subject between the parties. But if the property sold be at the time of sale in the possession of a third person, and there is no affirmation or assertion of ownership, no warranty of title will be implied. If however there be an affirmation of title when the vendor is not in possession, the vendor should be subject to the same liability as if he had the possession at the time. Byrnside v. Burdett, 15 W. Va. 702.

3. APPLIES TO EXCHANGE OF CHATTELS.—A warranty of title is to be implied from the contract as much in the case of an exchange of horses then in the possession of those making the trade as upon a sale; and this implied warranty is as much a part of the contract as if it had been express. Byrnside v. Burdett, 15 W. Va. 702.

4. EXCEPTION TO THE RULE.—A sale of personal chattels implies an affirmation of the vendor that the chattel is his, and therefore he warrants the title, unless it be shown by the facts and circumstances of the sale that the vendor did not intend to assert ownership, but only to transfer such interest as he might have in the chattel sold. Cogar v. Burns Lumber Co., 46 W. Va. 256, 33 S. E. Rep. 219.

D. IMPLIED WARRANTY OF QUALITY.

1. GENERAL RULE.—It is the well-established rule of law that upon the sale of personal property there is no implied warranty as to the quality and the maxim caveat emptor applies in the absence of fraud or express warranty. Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518, 34 Am. Rep. 773; Mason v. Chappell, 15 Gratt. 572; Wilson v. Shackelford, 4 Rand. 5; Jarrett v. Goodnow, 39 W. Va. 602, 20 S. E. Rep. 575.

In the hiring of a slave even an express warranty of fitness or suitability, though it might be understood to cover essential or mental defects, would not extend to the absence of moral qualities, or of experience in the particular business, unless specified. Howell v. Cowles, 6 Gratt. 363.

2. EXCEPTIONS TO THE RULE.

a. Unascertained Article.—If an order is given for an undescribed, unascertained thing, stated to be for a particular purpose, the vendor will be held liable unless it answers, in a reasonable degree the purpose for which it was purchased. Mason v. Chappell, 15 Gratt. 572; Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518, 34 Am. Rep. 773; Hood v. Bloch, 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. Rep. 910.

For where there is warranty, either express or implied neither the ignorance of the seller nor the exercise of care and diligence can exempt him from liability if the goods do not answer the purposes for which they were sold. Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518, 34 Am. Rep. 773.

b. Manufacturer's Warranty.—While it is an established rule of law that upon the sale of personal property there is no implied warranty as to its quality, and that the maxim caveat emptor applies in the absence of fraud or express warranty, yet there are several well-recognized modifications of this rule; and one of them is, that where, on an executory contract of sale, goods are ordered for a particular purpose known to the seller, he impliedly undertakes that they shall be reasonably fit for the purposes for which they are ordered, and especially is this so if the seller is also the manufacturer of the goods ordered. Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518; Hood v. Bloch, 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. Rep. 910.

For Example, J. & Co. were manufacturers of tobacco, and G. a manufacturer of boxes for pressing tobacco in. G. agreed to furnish J. & Co., during the season of 1870, as many boxes as the latter would use in their business, at the rate of sixty-five cents per box, and under this agreement did furnish said boxes in which J. & Co. pressed their tobacco, and shipped a large quantity. Much of that shipped, and some which remained in the factory in the said boxes moulded, in consequence of the use of green and otherwise unfit timber in the manufacture of the boxes, and J. & Co.'s damages, arising from the moulded tobacco, thus caused, amounted to nine cents per pound of the tobacco contained in said boxes. On a suit brought by J. & Co. against G. to recover these damages. Held, that G. was liable for the same. Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518.

E. IMPLIED WARRANTY OF QUALITY FROM FULL PRICE.—It is well-settled law, in this state, that in a sale of personal chattels a full price does not import a warranty as to quality. Mason v. Chappell, 15 Gratt. 572; Wilson v. Shackelford, 4 Rand. 5.

F. SALES BY DESCRIPTION.

1. GENERAL RULE.—The general rule seems to be that in a sale of goods by description, where the buyer has not inspected them, there is, in addition to the condition precedent that the goods shall answer the description, an implied warranty that they shall be saleable or merchantable. Milburn, etc., Co. v. Nisewarner, 90 Va. 714, 19 S. E. Rep. 846; Hood v. Bloch, 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. Rep. 910. See Hood v. Bloch, 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. Rep. 910, distinguishing Mason v. Chappell, 15 Gratt. 572; Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518; Proctor v. Spratley, 78 Va. 254.

2. WHERE THERE HAS BEEN NO INSPECTION.—The maxim, caveat emptor, does not apply to a sale of goods where the buyer has no opportunity for inspection. Hood v. Bloch, 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. Rep. 910; Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518.

In cases like this, the question is not whether the purchaser has had an opportunity of examining the article, but whether he has in fact examined it, and whether the defect is one readily discoverable upon inspection. He is not bound to examine at all, for he has the right to rely upon the judgment of the seller, and to take for granted that the latter has furnished an article answering the terms of his contract. Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518.

2. WARRANTY IN CATALOGUE.—Defendant ordered wagons of plaintiff upon the latter's blank form, upon which was indorsed a warranty agreement to replace or pay for broken parts under certain conditions, if said parts were sent to the factory as evidence. The catalogue of the plaintiff, upon which the defendant also relied in purchasing, contained a warranty as to the material and workmanship. One lot of wagons was bought upon the representation in the catalogue alone. The wagons were made of defective material, and repairs for some parts were sent for, but never came, and one wheel was sent but never heard from. Held, that defendant was entitled to damages under the warranty in the catalogue, on protection at the factory of the broken or defective parts, although the parts were not sent to the factory. Milburn Wagon Co. v. Nisewarner, 90 Va. 714, 19 S. E. Rep. 846.

G. SALE BY SAMPLE.—Unless parties deal with the sample with the mutual understanding that the bulk is like sample, the sale is not by the sample, and otherwise there can be no warranty implied, and the maxim caveat emptor applies. Proctor v. Spratley, 78 Va. 264.

H. SALE OF SPECIFIC ARTICLE.—Where a specific article is ordered and furnished, the law is well settled that, although the purchaser states the purpose to which he intends to apply it, there is no implied warranty on the part of the vendor that it is suitable for the purpose; and he will not, in the absence of fraud or an express warranty, be held liable however unfit and defective it may be. Mason v. Chappell, 15 Gratt. 572; Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518, 34 Am. Rep. 773.

I. WARRANTY OF MONEY, BANKNOTES, ETC.—BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The court is of opinion that there is no implied warranty of the value of current money of the country, passing from hand to hand, in the course of trade, commerce and other business. This is true, not only of the money made by a law a good tender in the payment of debts and performance of contracts, but is equally so in regard to the notes of banks and bankers, payable to bearer, and circulated by delivery. Edmunds v. Diggs, 1 Gratt. 361.

There is but a single guarantee which those who circulated the money of that, or any other kind, can be understood to give, to wit, that it is what it purports to be, genuine and not counterfeit. Beyond that, in the absence of express warranty, or fraudulent misrepresentations or concealment, the receiver takes it at his own risk. There is no implied warranty, whether of title or value, in the circulation of banknotes, any more than of other money. The title to them can never be questioned in the hands of a bona fide holder; and on his part he takes them as money, for whatever they may be worth. Edmunds v. Diggs, Gratt. 361; Lyons v. Miller, 6 Gratt. 440.

The persons transferring impliedly undertakes that the instrument is genuine, in other words that it is what it purports to be; and if it turns out to be a forgery, there is a failure of the consideration, which subjects him to the repayment of the money he has received. Nor is it material whether the person making the transfer, receives the consideration for his own use, or for the use of another; unless he is acting as an agent, and discloses not only his agency, but the name of the principal for whom he is acting; in which case he is not a party to the contract, the contract being made with his principal through his agent. Lyons v. Miller, 6 Gratt. 440.

K. SHERIFF NOT A WARRANTOR.—Under Rev. Code, vol. 2, p. 160, when the sheriff has received a bond of idemnity he is bound to sell the property taken in execution, whether it belongs to the debtor or not, hence it cannot be held that the sheriff impliedly warranted the title of the property in question. Stone v. Pointer, 5 Munf. 287. A sheriff selling under execution, with good faith, incurs no responsibility as to title there being no implied warranty, raised by law, under such a sale, the rule caveat emptor applies to such a case. Saunders v. Pate, 4 Rand. 8.

L. POWER OF AGENTS TO MAKE WARRANTY.—A general agent to sell personal property is presumed to have power to make such warranties with reference to the property as are usual and customary in like sales in that locality. It is competent for the party relying upon such warranty to prove as a usage of trade what warranties are usually demanded by the buyer and given by the agents of the seller in affecting sale of similar articles in that locality. A restriction upon the power of the agent to make the usual warranties in effecting like sales, of which the buyer has no notice or knowledge, is not binding on him. If there be evidence tending to prove what warranties are usually given by agents in effecting like sales, it is for the jury to determine whether, in the particular case, the agent was clothed with the requisite authority. Reese v. Bates, 94 Va. 321, 26 S. E. Rep. 865.

A general agent to sell is authorized to do whatever is usual in the market to carry out the object of his agency. But it is for the jury to determine upon the evidence what is usual. It is not necessary for the principal to have notice of the course of business. If such agent, in accordance with the usage of trade of the place of sale, gives a warranty of the quality of the goods sold, which is not in itself unjust to his principal, the latter will be bound by it, although ignorant of such usage. Reese v. Bates, 94 Va. 321, 26 S. E. Rep. 865.

M. FORM OF WORDS NECESSARY TO CREATE WARRANTY.—No special form of words is necessary to create a warranty. A representation made by a vendor either at the time when the bargain is concluded, or, if it be a verbal sale, during the course of dealings, which led to the bargain, will or will not be held to be a warranty according to the intention of the parties, to be gathered, with an exception presently stated in case of ambiguity, from the written contract, if the terms of sale be reduced to writing, and if not in writing from the conversation of the parties at the time of or proceeding the contract and during the negotiation and from all the surrounding circumstances. To make such representation a warranty it is not sufficient that it appears to have been an inducement to the buyer, but it must appear, that it entered into the contract of sale, when it was concluded, and was intended by the vendor as a warranty and so understood by the vendee. If this does not appear, it will not be held to be a warranty, and the vendor may or may not be responsible for such representation, if it turn out to be false. If there be a warranty either express or implied, the vendor is always responsible on his contract, if the warranty be broken. But if the untrue representation be not an implied warranty, the responsibility therefor of the vendor will depend on a variety of circumstances, as we have seen. Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438, 479.

"It is enough, if the words used import an engagement on the part of the vendor that the article is what he represents it to be. Any distinct affirmation of quality, made by the vendors at the time of the sale, not as an expression of opinion or belief, but as an assurance to the purchaser of the truth of the fact affirmed, and an inducement to him to make the purchase, is, if accordingly received and relied on and acted upon by the purchaser, an express warranty." (Mason v. Chappell, 15 Gratt. 572-8). "The general rule is, that whatever a person represents at the time of a sale is a warranty." Herron v. Dibrell, 87 Ga. 289, 13 S. E. Rep. 674.

An affirmation of quality by the seller of goods at the time of the sale, intended as an assurance of fact and relied on by the buyer, constitutes a warranty. No particular form of words is necessary to constitute a warranty. If the seller assumes to assert a fact, of which the buyer is ignorant, or makes a representation of quality which the buyer relies on as a warranty and is thereby induced to make the purchase, the seller is bound by it as a warranty, whether he so intended it or not. Reese v. Bates, 94 Va. 331, 26 S. E. Rep. 865.

N. BREACH OF WARRANTY.

1. GENERAL STATEMENT.—Where goods delivered to the buyer are inferior in quality to what was warranted by seller, the buyer may sue at once for the breach of the warranty without returning the goods or giving any notice to seller. Eastern Ice Co. v. King, 86 Va. 97, 9 S. E. Rep. 506.

2. ACTION AGAINST PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES.—An action on the case for fraud in selling to the plaintiff an unsound slave, which he was induced to purchase by means of a false and fraudulent warranty of soundness; or by means of a fraudulent concealment of the unsoundness of the slave cannot be maintained against the personal representative of the vendor. And though there is a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the error will not be cured by the statute of Jeoffails. Judgment should be rendered in favor of the defendant non obstante veredicto. Boyles v. Overby, 11 Gratt. 203, and note.

3. EVIDENCE.—While the allegata and probata must always agree it is well settled that under a count in a declaration alleging a warranty, the plaintiff may prove an express or implied warranty, the legal effect of the two being the same. Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518.

Upon proof of a warranty that a fertilizer is as good as any other article of like character and price offered upon the same market, a breach of the warranty may be established by proof that when applied in like quantities to the same crop, during the same season, upon the same land, receiving the same cultivation, results were obtained from the warranted fertilizer inferior to those obtained from other fertilizers offered upon the same market at the same price. Reese v. Bates, 94 Va. 332, 26 S. E. Rep. 865.

The jury is justifiable in finding that tobacco was warranted by seller by evidence that seller represented to buyer that "it was sound" and "redried," and "would certainly keep." Herron v. Dibrell, 87 Va. 289, 13 S. E. Rep. 674.

4. PROPER ACTION.—When the vendee of personal property, takes from the vendor a warranty of soundness, and gets possession of the property under his purchase, if he becomes satisfied that the property was unsound at the time of the sale, he has a right to pursue one of two courses; either to keep the property and sue the vendor on the covenant, or to return the property in a reasonable time and sue for the purchase money. In the first case, if the vendee keeps the property, and recovers from the vendor the difference between the value of the property sound, as warranted to be, and unsound as it was, at the time of sale, he will have all he is entitled to. In the other case, if the vendor takes back the property, then the contract is rescinded, and if he pays to the vendee the purchase money, there being no question as to expenses for keeping, etc., then the parties are placed in "statu quo." Graham v. Bardin, 1 Pat. & H. 206, and note.

The action of trespass on the case, is a proper remedy for the breach of an express warranty of soundness of a slave, or other personal chattel sold, as much so as to the action of assumpsit, with which it is a concurrent remedy, and the party aggrieved may elect between them. In both forms of action, the gravamen is the breach of the warranty, which in the former is treated as a tort, with the appropriate language in declaring for a tort. Trice v. Cockran, 8 Gratt. 442, and note. See monographic notes on "The Action of Covenant" appended to Lee v. Cooke, 1 Wash. 306.

5. THE DECLARATION.

a. The Declaration a Tort in Action.—In an action on a warranty of title to a chattel, it is sufficient proof of the warranty, that the vendor affirmed it to be his, and the action lies on such affirmation, yet if the plaintiff does not choose to resort to the appropriate remedy for breach of contract, but sues as for a tort, his count must conform to the nature of the action. Here, the first count is in case for a deceit; the second is certainly not in assumpsit, but in case on the warranty, and in that view is defective. It should have charged, that the defendant by falsely and fraudulently warranting the slave to be his absolute property, sold him to the plaintiff. The wrong consists in the false warranty; which therefore, is of the very essence of the charge. Brown v. Shields, 6 Leigh 446, and note.

b. Form.

(1) The Breach.—The law attaches no warranty of fitness, or suitability, or even soundness, to the hiring of a slave. There may be an express warranty of soundness or qualities, and there may be cases in which an implied warranty arises from circumstances; but in either case the warranty must be stated, and the breach of it alleged in the pleading. Howell v. Cowles, 6 Gratt. 398.

(2) Scienter.—But a scienter or knowledge of the defendant of unsoundness is immaterial, and need not be alleged in the declaration, nor if alleged need it be proved. Trice v. Cockran, 8 Gratt. 450, and note; Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518, 34 Am. Rep. 778.

6. THE PLEA.—In an action of debt upon a bond, defendant pleads that the bond was given for the price of goods which he bought of plaintiff, who represented that they were sound and marketable, when in fact they were unsound and damaged, and by means thereof unsaleable; but the plea does not aver a warranty of the quality of the goods; or that the plaintiff knew that the said representations made by him were untrue; or that he used any fraud or art to disguise or conceal their true condition of quality. The plea is defective; and properly rejected when tendered. Cunningham v. Smith, 10 Gratt. 255, 60 Am. Dec. 333, and note.

In an action for the breach of warranty given on a sale of farm wagons, it cannot be contended for the first time on appeal that the wagons were used for other than farm purposes. Milburn Wagon Co. v. Nisewarner, 90 Va. 714, 19 S. E. Rep. 846.

7. INSTRUCTIONS OF JURY.—In an action to recover the price of fertilizers sold, where the defense is a breach of warranty of the quality of the fertilizer, it is not error to instruct the jury that they are to look to the evidence for proof of the warranty and its breach, and, if established, they must find for the defendant "such damages" as have resulted naturally from the breach of said warranty, "naturally" here means legitimately, and the instructions leaves it to the jury to determine from the evidence the amount of such damages. Reese v. Bates, 94 Va. 332, 26 S. E. Rep. 865.

8. MEASURE OF DAMAGES.—Upon a breach of warranty of personal property sold, the measure of damages is the difference between the value of the article with the defect warranted against and the value it would have borne without the defect. Thornton v. Thompson, 4 Gratt. 121; and note: Eastern Ice Co. v. King, 86 Va. 97, 9 S. E. Rep. 506.

But in Thornton v. Thompson, 4 Gratt. 121, it is said: The price at which the article was sold is the proper evidence at that time, if sound and the extent of the warranty. And the rule is the same whether the purchaser offers to return the article or not. See also, Boyles v. Overby, 11 Gratt. 208.

On a warranty of soundness of an animal, it is for the jury to decide what is embraced therein. And on that question, the qualities and uses for which the animal was sold and purchased may be referred to as explaining what was intended to be included in the warranty. Thornton v. Thompson, 4 Gratt. 121, and note.

A vendee of a slave, sold with warranty of soundness, tenders the slave back to the vendor, on discovering that he is unsound. The vendor refuses to receive him, and the vendee brings an action to recover damages for the breach of warranty. Held, he is entitled to recover the damages he has suffered, though he sold the slave, after the tender, at public auction, and received the proceeds to his own use; without having given notice to the vendor of the time and place of sale. Graham v. Bardin, 1 Pat. & H. 206, and note.

9. SET-OFF.—For a discussion of the question as to a breach of warranty being relied on by way of set-off to an action to recover the purchase price of the article warranted. See monographic note on "Set-Off, Recoupment and Counterclaim" appended to Anderson v. Bullock, 4 Munf. 443.

III. IN POLICIES OF LIFE INSURANCE.

A. DEFINITION.—A warranty is a stipulation upon the literal truth or fulfillment of which the validity of a contract depends. It is in the nature of a condition precedent, and like that must be strictly complied with, whether material or not. Home Life Ins. Co. v. Sibert, 96 Va. 403, 31 S. E. Rep. 519; Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Rutherford, 98 Va. 195, 35 S. E. Rep. 361. See also, Fire Ins. Co. v. West, 76 Va. 575; Va. F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Morgan, 90 Va. 290, 18 S. E. Rep. 191.

B. MATERIALITY.—Where the answers to questions propounded in an application for insurance are made warranties by the contract of insurance, it is a matter of no consequence whether they were material to the risk or not. Home L. Ins. Co. v. Sibert, 96 Va. 403, 31 S. E. Rep. 519; Schwarzbach v. Ohio, etc., Union, 25 W. Va. 623; Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Rutherford, 98 Va. 195, 35 S. E. Rep. 361. The validity of the policy depends upon the literal truth of such answers. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Rutherford, 98 Va. 195, 35 S. E. Rep. 361. This removes their materiality from the consideration of the jury; and if any of the answers are false in fact, the policy is thereby forfeited, though they were made in perfect good faith. (P. 652.) Schwarzbach v. Ohio, etc., Union, 25 W. Va. 623.

C. CONSTRUCTION OF COURT.

1. GENERAL STATEMENT.—But in determining whether the answers by the insured in the application are warranties or representations, the court leans in favor of construing the policy as making them representations rather than warranties; and if a portion of the policy or application would indicate them to be warranties, but another portion of the application shows that they were to be regarded as representations, the answers to these questions will not be regarded as warranted to be true. Schwarzbach v. Ohio, etc., Union, 25 W. Va. 623;

Morotock Ins. Co. v. Postoria Novelty Co., 94 Va. 361, 26 S. E. Rep. 850; Lynchburg Ins. Co. v. West, 76 Va. 575.

Because parties are not held to have entered into warranties unless they clearly so intend. Morotock Ins. Co. v. Postoria Novelty Co., 94 Va. 361, 26 S. E. Rep. 850.

2. MISREPRESENTATIONS.—Though the policy be construed as not warranting the truth of the answers of the insured, yet if these answers to specific questions are misrepresentations, the policy will be avoided whether the court or jury regard the answers as material or not; for the parties by putting and answering such questions have declared, that they regarded them as material. (P. 655.) Schwarzbach v. Ohio, etc., Union, 25 W. Va. 623.

On an application to a second company for insurance as a "rejected risk" based upon and averring the truth of the statements in the application to the first company, failure to disclose the fact that since rejection by the first company the applicant had been twice examined and rejected as unsound by the medical examiners of the second company is a breach of warranty contained in the application that no proposal or application to insure the life of the applicant had ever been made to any company or agent upon which assured had been rejected, or upon which a policy had not been issued and received by him, and bars any recovery upon the policy. National Life Ass'n v. Hopkins, 97 Va. 167, 83 S. E. Rep. 539.

D. CONFLICT BETWEEN STATEMENTS IN APPLICATION AND PROOF OF LOSS.—If a life policy makes the statement of the application on which it is issued warranties, and such application states that the death of the father of the assured was caused by one disease, and the proof of loss made by the beneficiary and offered in evidence by him states that said death was caused by a different disease, on a demurrer to the evidence of the beneficiary, in an action against the insurance company, judgment should be given for the company. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Rutherford, 98 Va. 195, 35 S. E. Rep. 361.

IV. IN POLICIES OF FIRE INSURANCE.

A. DEFINITION AND NATURE OF A WARRANTY.—"An express warranty," says MAY, quoting from 1 Arnould Ins. § 577 "is a stipulation inserted in writing on the face of the policy, on the literal truth and fulfillment of which the validity of the entire contract depends. By a warranty the insured stipulates for the absolute truth of the statement made and the strict compliance with some promised line of conduct, upon penalty of forfeiture of his right to recover in case of loss should the statement prove untrue, or the course of conduct promised be unfulfilled. A warranty is an agreement in the nature of a condition precedent, and, like that, must be strictly complied with." This is the language of the decided cases, and of this court in Lynchburg Fire Ins. Co. v. West, 76 Va. 575; Va. F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Morgan, 90 Va. 290, 18 S. E. Rep. 191.

B. MATERIALITY.—Whether the fact stated or the act stipulated for be material to the risk or not, is of no consequence, the contract being that the matter is as represented or shall be as promised; and unless it prove so, whether from fraud, mistake, negligence, or other cause, not proceeding from the insurer, or the intervention of law or the act of God, the insured can have no claim. "One of the very objects of the warranty is to preclude all controversy about the materiality or immateriality of the statement. If the warranty be a statement of facts it must be literally true; if a stipulation that a certain act shall or shall not be done, it must be literally performed." May Ins. quoted and approved in Va. F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Morgan, 90 Va. 290, 18 S. E. Rep. 191.

C. INTENTION OF PARTIES.—Whether a statement is a warranty or not depends upon the intention of the parties, as does the nature and effect of the warranty, when there is one, which is to be gathered from the language used and the subject matter to which it relates. Va. F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Morgan, 90 Va. 290, 18 S. E. Rep. 191.

Parties will not be held to have entered into a contract of warranty unless they clearly intended it, and if a policy is so framed as to render it doubtful whether the parties intended that the exact truth of the applicants' statements should be a condition precedent to any binding contract, that construction which imposes upon the assured the obligation of a warranty should not be favored. Morotock Ins. Co. v. Postoria Co., 94 Va. 261, 26 S. E. Rep. 850; Lynchburg F. Ins. Co. v. West, 76 Va. 575.

D. AS AFFECTED BY STATUTE.—In Virginia it has been provided by act of assembly approved February 26th, 1900, that no answer to any interrogations made by an applicant for a policy of insurance shall bar the right to recover upon any policy issued upon such application, by reason of any warranty in said application or policy contained unless it be clearly proved that such answer was wilfully false or fraudulently made, or that it was material.

E. WARRANTY AND REPRESENTATION DISTINGUISHED.—A stipulation on the face of the policy, by the assured for the absolute truth of a statement, is a warranty in the nature of a condition precedent, and on its literal truth, or fulfillment the validity of the policy depends. A representation is a statement incidental to the contract. If false, and material to the risk, whether wilful or by mistake, the policy is avoided. Lynchburg Fire Ins. Co. v. West, 76 Va. 575.

APPRENTICES.

Who May Bind.—A father may bind his infant child apprentice by indentures to which the child is a party, but indentures of apprenticeship executed by the father, without the child's concurrence, are not only voidable, but void. Pierce v. Massenburg, 4 Leigh 493. See State v. Reuff, 29 W. Va. 751, 2 S. E. Rep. 801.

And overseers of the poor, under a proper order of the county court, may bind out children within their jurisdiction. Brewer v. Harris, 5 Gratt. 285.

Proceedings—Requirements of Statute.—A minor can only be bound as an apprentice by his father, or, if none, by his guardian, or, if neither father nor guardian, by his mother with the consent, entered of record, of the county court of the county in which the minor resides; or, without such consent, if the minor being fourteen years of age agree in writing to be so bound, or unless such minor be found beggaring in such county, or is likely to become chargeable thereto, and, if not so bound, the indentures of the apprenticeship are void. State v. Reuff, 29 W. Va. 751, 2 S. E. Rep. 801. See Code of Va., § 2581; Code of W. Va., p. 719.

Same—Under Order of Court—Appeal.—And, if infants are bound as apprentices pursuant to an order of the county court, no appeal lies from such order. Cooper v. Saunders, 1 Hen. & M. 413. See Code 1887, § 2681.

Same—Same—Certiorari.—But, where, pursuant to an order of the county court, infants are bound apprentices, though there be no appeal from such order, a writ of certiorari lies to bring up the record and correct the proceedings. Cooper v. Saunders, 1 Hen. & M. 415.

The Contract—Parties—Remedies.—Where the indentures of apprenticeship contain covenants by the master in favor of the mother of the apprentices, and also in favor of the apprentices, but the latter are not parties to it, it is valid, and the remedies will be adapted to the case. Brewer v. Harris, 5 Gratt. 285.

Same—Same—Sufficient Execution.—Where the order of court directs a child to be bound out by the overseers of the poor, and only one of the overseers executes the indenture it is sufficient. Brewer v. Harris, 5 Gratt. 285.

Same—Binding for Shorter Period.—And, when the statute directs that apprentices shall be bound out till they are eighteen years of age, a binding out till the age of seventeen is valid. Brewer v. Harris, 5 Gratt. 285.

Rights and Liabilities—Medical Attendance.—A master of an apprentice is bound to pay for medical attendance on the apprentice, from the very nature of the relation between master and apprentice; and the father of the apprentice is only bound when the services have been rendered at his instance. Easley v. Craddock, 4 Rand. 433.

Same—Enticing Away.—Where a child is apprenticed without its concurrence, the contract being void, a party who entices the child away from its master is not liable in damages. Pierce v. Massenburg, 4 Leigh 493.

Actions—Proper Parties.—Covenant will not lie in the name of the apprentice on the indenture of apprenticeship entered into by the overseers of the poor without any previous order of court for binding out the apprentice. Such indenture is not a statutory deed, and, therefore, covenant can only be maintained on it in the name of the overseers who are parties to it. Bullock v. Sebrell, 6 Leigh 500. See Poindexter v. Wilton, 3 Munf. 183.

Same—Same.—An action in behalf of an apprentice, upon his indenture of apprenticeship, should not be brought in the name of the overseer of the poor, but in his own name. Poindexter v. Wilton, 3 Munf. 183. See Bullock v. Sebrell, 6 Leigh 500.

Quere—Removal—Legal Settlement.—If the apprentice is removed out of the county or corporation in which he was bound, can the court thereof direct the overseer of their poor to send for and bind him to another master; and whether an apprentice so moved obtains legal settlement in the county wherein he is moved by remaining there twelve months during his apprenticeship? Cooper v. Saunders, 1 Hen. & M. 413.

F. DESCRIPTIVE EXPRESSIONS.—The expression in a policy, viz.: "a two-story frame building standing on leased ground 20x50 feet, also one story frame, 12x16 feet, occupied as a hardware store and dwelling, situated in the town of Antwerp, Clarion Co., Pa." is merely a description of the subject insured, and not a designation of the uses it should be put to, and is no warranty, within itself, that it should be so occupied, during the risk. Bryan v. Peabody Insurance Co., 8 W. Va. 605.

G. KINDS OF WARRANTIES.

1. AFFIRMATIVE.—According to the authorities, warranties are of two kinds, viz.: (1) Affirmative, or warranties in present, as they are sometimes called, which affirms the existence of certain facts pertaining to the risk at the time of the insurance: an instance of this class is Va. Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Buck, 88 Va. 517, 13 S. E. Rep. 973. There the insured, in answer to a question in the application, stated that a watchman slept on the premises at night. On the night of the fire the watchman was absent, but it was held that the policy was not thereby avoided, because the answer related to the present, and not to the future—in other words, that the statement was manifestly intended as affirmation of the usual and existing state of things, and had nothing promissory as to the future. Va. F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Morgan, 90 Va. 290, 18 S. E. Rep. 191.

2. CONTINUING.—The second kind of warranty, continuing or promissory, is one which requires something to be done or omitted after the insurance takes effect, and during its continuance and if not complied with according to its terms avoids the contract. In the case at bar, the promise of the insured to keep his books in an iron safe or secure in another building falls within this category. The contract is express that the books would be thus safely kept; and if, as is admitted the promise has not been fulfilled, there can be no recovery. Va. F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Morgan, 90 Va. 290, 18 S. E. Rep. 191.

3. CONSTRUCTION OF COURT.—The rule is that the court never construes a warranty as promissory and continuing. If any other reasonable construction can be given. Va. F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Buck, 88 Va. 517, 18 S. E. Rep. 973.

H. APPLICATION MADE A PART OF POLICY.

1. GENERAL STATEMENT.—It would seem, "that whenever the application is incorporated in the policy as a warranty, the warranty should be regarded as relating only to matters of which the assured had, or should be presumed to have had, some distinct, definite knowledge, and not as to such matters as depend wholly upon opinion and judgment. STAPLES, J., in Lynchburg F. Ins. Co. v. West, 76 Va. 575.

2. CONTINGENT RIGHT OF DOWER.—If the application for a policy is made a part of the policy, and is a warranty and covers the applicant's interest in and title to the property, and his answer to the question "what is your title to or interest in the property to be insured?" is "fee simple." Held, the fact that the wife of a former owner of the property who is still alive, has a contingent right of dower in it, does not affect the applicant's interest in or title to the property. Nor is it such an incumbrance as, not being mentioned in his answer, will be a breach of the warranty. If in such case the application is not a warranty, the failure to mention the existence of such a contingent right of dower, is not such a misrepresentation as will avoid the policy. Southern Mut. Ins. Co. v. Kloeber, 81 Gratt. 799; Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Kloeber, 81 Gratt. 749.

I. AGENT'S KNOWLEDGE IMPUTABLE TO THE PRINCIPAL.—The agent's knowledge of the real condition and situation of the risk is imputable to the principal and estops the latter from setting up a warranty inconsistent therewith. Lynchburg Fire Ins. Co. v. West, 76 Va. 575.

K. BURDEN OF PROOF.—In an action upon a fire insurance policy the burden of proof is on the defendant to show a breach of affirmative warranties—mere statements of existing facts—by the plaintiff in his application for the insurance. It is not incumbent on the plaintiff to allege such warranties and aver their performance. They are not conditions precedent to his right of recovery. Morotock Ins. Co. v. Fostoria Novelty Co., 94 Va. 261, 26 S. E. Rep. 850.

Saunders v. Pate and Others.

January, 1826.

Sheriffs—Sale under Execution—Liability as to Title.—A Sheriff selling under execution, with good faith,

*Public Sale.—To What Purchaser Entitled.—A purchaser at a public sale of land, made by a trustee incurs no responsibility as to title; there being no implied warranty, raised by law, under such a sale. The rule caveat emptor applies to such a case.

Same—Return on Execution—Evidence.—Quære, whether the return of the Sheriff, on an execution, can be used as evidence for him, in a suit by the purchaser of property sold under execution?

Same—Sale under Execution—Indemnifying Bond—Rights of Purchaser In.—Quære, whether the purchaser of property sold under execution, can have the benefit of an indemnifying bond, given to the Sheriff, on the principle of substitution?

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Lynchburg.

The bill was filed by Saunders, setting forth the following case: That John Pate obtained a judgment against James Wright, and sued out a Ca. Sa. which was levied by a Deputy of Samuel Hancock, Sheriff of Bedford county; upon which Wright delivered to the said Sheriff, two negro men, named York and Primus, in discharge of his body: that the said negroes were about to be set up to sale to satisfy the said execution, when the sale was forbidden by Read and Robertson, who claimed them, by virtue of a deed of trust, in which they were trustees, to secure the payment of certain debts therein specified: that the Sheriff refusing to proceed, unless he was indemnified, John Pate tendered to the said Deputy Sheriff his bond, with Edmund Pate as his surety, and the said Deputy *proceeded with the sale: that the complainant was the highest bidder, at about $500; and the negroes were cried out to him, and delivered into his possession, and the purchase money paid: that Read and Robertson brought a suit against the complainant, for the said negroes; in which the plaintiffs proved a superior title, and recovered the said negroes; which judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeals: that the complainant has fully discharged the said judgment; so that he has twice paid the price of the negroes: that James Wright, the original proprietor of the slaves, is utterly insolvent. He therefore prayed that Hancock the Sheriff, Goggin his Deputy, John Pate, and Edmund Pate his surety, might be made defendants, and that they might be decreed to pay the amount paid upon the purchase at the Sheriff's sale, with interest, &c.

The answer of Goggin, the Deputy Sheriff, states, that he only sold Wright's right and title in the said slaves, and no other: that Wright had previously obtained an injunction to stay Read and Robertson from selling the said slaves under the deed of trust aforesaid; and that he had given the said Saunders, amongst others, as his surety on the injunction bond: that the creditors in the said deed exhibited the deed at the sale; when the complainant purchased the slaves, as the respondent believes, to save himself from the consequences of his suretyship, and prevent the slaves from being carried off by must look to the title of the grantor of the land; and he is entitled only to a deed with special warranty of title. He cannot look to the trustee for a good title, for in making the sale he is but an agent; he cannot look to the creditor, for he sells nothing, and is merely to receive the proceeds of the sale. To such a sale the principle of caveat emptor applies. Fleming v. Holt, 12 W. Va. 162, citing principal case as authority. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Petermans v. Laws, 6 Leigh 529; Jones v. Thorn, 45 W. Va. 193, 32 S. E. Rep. 176.

any other purchaser: that at the pressing instance of Pate, and, he believes, of the plaintiff's attorney also, the respondent agreed, upon being indemnified, to sell the property; and he accordingly took John Pate's bond, with Edmund Pate as his surety: that the slaves sold for $506 50, on a credit till the 31st of May: that the injunction aforesaid was afterwards dissolved, as the respondent understood: that Read and Robertson brought a suit for the said slaves, and recovered them, if to be had, or the said sum of $506 50, and a sum in damages, equal to the interest of the said sum: that the slaves were proved to have been worth $150 per annum.

10 *for hire, during the six and a half years that they were kept by the complainant, by virtue of the title he purchased, which would amount to near $1000: that he conceives he ought not to be compelled to pay the said sum of $506 50, with interest, as he has never been benefited by the use of it, &c.

The answer of John Pate agrees with that of Goggin, with the additional allegation, that the Sheriff returned the execution with a statement that he had sold the right of the defendant Wright, in the said slaves; and that he offered to pay the complainant the original purchase money, ($506 50,) with interest from the 10th of March, 1810, and the further sum of $506 50, with interest from September, 1816, and receive from the complainant the said slaves, and their reasonable hire since he had them; and further, that there is no claim, in law or equity, against a creditor, if the title to property sold under execution, proves defective; as the purchaser takes the right of the debtor, and no other: that a bond of indemnity does not alter the case; because it is taken for the security of the Sheriff or claimant, and not for that of the purchaser, &c.

The return on the execution states, "that James Wright's property in them, (the slaves in question,) only was sold."

The Chancellor dismissed the bill; and the complainant appealed.

Johnson, for the appellant, contended: 1. That Saunders might maintain a suit, because he purchased the slaves at the Sheriff's sale, without any stipulation that he was to get only Wright's title: that the Sheriff's return is not admissible evidence, in his own favor, to prove that he only sold the title of Wright. Besides, having taken an indemnifying bond, he was not at liberty to restrict the title of the property sold, but was obliged to sell the complete title.

2. What remedy has the purchaser?
11 *At common law, the Sheriff was not bound, unless he sold with a knowledge of the defects of title. If he had such knowledge, he would be charged with an implied warranty. Peto v. Blades, 5 Taunt. 657. But, he might go into equity, and compel the parties to interplead.

Our Statute gave the Sheriff another remedy to accomplish the same object, viz: an indemnifying bond. The owner is turned over, in the first instance, to the indemnifying bond, unless it proves insufficient by insolvency. 2 Old Rev. Code, 160; Acts of 1812, p. 25, ch. 16; Carrington v. Anderson, 5 Munf. 32. These laws were intended to afford, both to the Sheriff and the true owner, a simple and adequate remedy. Stone v. Pointer, 5 Munf. 287, proves that in such case, the Sheriff was bound to sell. The purchaser of the property is protected under the Act of Assembly, as much as he would have been at common law. The plaintiff in the execution is alone liable to any risk, which he has the choice of taking upon himself, or not.

Equity, therefore, has jurisdiction, that the several parties may be brought before the Court, to ascertain on whom the liability may fall. On the ground of substitution, the purchaser has become invested with all the rights of the trustees, who have recovered the slaves; and if they could have sued on the indemnifying bond, so may the purchaser, who has discharged their claim.

Call, for the appellees, contended: 1. That the sale changed the property, because the owner had no redress but by suit upon the bond. He cannot sue the Sheriff, who is liable to nobody. Stone v. Pointer, 5 Munf. 287. The Act of 1813, ch. 16, compels the Sheriff to sell, and therefore, secures the purchaser. Dalt Sh'ff. 148. In this respect, it is like a venditioni exponas.

2. The purchaser should have defended himself at law; and his failure to do so, cannot give a cause of action against other persons.

12 *3. The purchaser bought without warranty. That this is the general rule of law, appears from the case of Peto v. Blades, 5 Taunt. 657. Besides, he was apprised of the claim of the trustees.

4. If the plaintiff was entitled, he had redress at law; for, an action for money had and received would lie.

5. This suit cannot be maintained on the ground of substitution; because, neither the owner nor the Sheriff had a right to sue for the property, as the bond was a bar to such an action. And, therefore, there was no person through whom the complainant could claim.

6. The complainant was surety in the injunction bond, and therefore liable.

7. Lastly, the plaintiff purchased the slaves much below their value, and seeks to make a gain against one who seeks to avoid a loss. The offer made by the appellee Pate was as liberal as the appellant had any right to expect.

January 28. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

John Pate issued a Ca. Sa. against James Wright, which being executed, he delivered two negro men in discharge of his body. At the day of sale of these negroes, Read and Robertson, as trustees, exhibited a deed, by which these slaves were conveyed to them, to secure certain claims; and though they did not forbid the sale, the Sheriff required indemnity. Pate gave it; the property was sold; and the plaintiff was the purchaser. The trustees brought detinue against him, and had a recovery. The plaintiff paid the value assessed, with the damages, and files this bill for the recovery of this money, either from the Sheriff or his Deputy, or from Pate and his surety in the indemnifying bond. Wright, the debtor, is made no party; but it is stated that he is utterly insolvent.

It seemed admitted in the argument, that at common law, a Sheriff selling under execution, with good faith, incurred no responsibility as to title: that there was no

 13 implied warranty *raised by the law on such a sale. This, indeed, seems to be clear. In the case of the Monte Alegre, 9 Wheat. 616, Thompson, J. delivering the opinion of the court, says, "generally in all judicial sales, the rule caveat emptor must apply, from the nature of the transaction, there being no one to whom recourse can be had for indemnity;" and though this is not, strictly speaking, a judicial sale, the reasoning applies. In 2 Bay's Reports, 170, (a case which I have not had an opportunity of reading, but which is cited in the above case,) the Court decided, that at a Sheriff's sale, caveat emptor is the best possible rule that can be laid down; stating emphatically, that all who attend such sales ought to take care, and examine into the title: that no warranty, express or implied, can be raised on the part of the owner, as to whom the proceeding is compulsory, nor of the Sheriff, who is the mere agent of the Court, nor of the Court itself. In 5 Serj. & Rawle, 225, Duncan J. delivering the opinion of the Court, says, that a sale by a Sheriff excludes all warranty. The purchaser takes all risk. Caveat emptor applies, with all its force, to him. The case cited in the argument from 5 Taunt. Rep. 675, Peto v. Blaes, turned entirely on the fraud of the Sheriff in selling property as belonging to the debtor, and concealing the fact, well known to him, that the property was then in possession of the messenger of the assignees of bankrupt; and Ch. J. Gibbs says, if the action lies at all, it lies upon the ground that the plaintiff has been deceived, and is the worse for the deceit.

It is clear, that upon the ground of fraud or deceit, no action would lie against the Sheriff, in the case before us; for the plaintiff, in his bill, states, that when the sale of the slaves was about to take place, the deed of trust was exhibited. The plaintiff then, when he bought, knew perfectly that he was buying property to which there was a claim, and he had the ground of the claim before his eyes. He knew, too, that the Sheriff refused to sell, until he was indemnified. Being thus forewarned, he can claim

14 nothing *on the ground of deception

It is stated, indeed, by the Sheriff in his return, and also, in his answer, that he sold nothing more than Wright's interest in the slaves.

The counsel for the plaintiff acknowledged, that if this were in proof, the Court must consider the plaintiff as buying at his own risk, and, therefore, bound to stand by it; but, he contended, that the return was no evidence, because no part of what the Sheriff is bound by law, to return; and he cannot, by his return, make evidence for himself, or affect the rights of the parties. With respect to the answer, too, that (it was said,) was a substantive, affirmative fact, and must be proved as other facts.

Without canvassing the soundness of these objections, it seems to me clear, that the plaintiff did buy nothing more than Wright's interest in the slaves, and knew well at the time, that he was doing so. The property was set up as Wright's. A deed of trust, which he had given on this property, was brought forward and exhibited. All were told, (the plaintiff among others,) "Gentlemen, here is a lien." I do not mean that these very words were addressed to them; but, the exhibition of the deed proclaimed this in the strongest terms. The Sheriff, after this, selling the property, whether he declared it or not, sold only Wright's interest; that is, he sold them as Wright's, subject to this lien. This state of things would, of necessity, operate strongly upon the price of the property. Every one would judge for himself. If he thought the deed fraudulent, or, that if fair, there was more property than would pay the debts it was bound for, he would be encouraged to bid something; and he would be regulated by his own judgment, weighing the price against the chances of losing the property, or part of it, under the lien. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff bought two negro men for $506 50, which are said to be worth $800 or $900. He held them six years, the hire being worth, it is said, 150 dollars per annum; and then, when the recovery was had, it was merely the price he had given, with interest on the 15 *money; and the defendant, Pate, offers, in his answer, to take the bargain off his hands, paying up both the sums which he has paid, with interest from the dates of the payments, and receive from him the slaves, with a reasonable hire. And, as the defendant might have been held to this offer, if the plaintiff had closed with it, we must suppose him serious in making it. Taking all these things into view; that it is the settled law of the contract, that a Sheriff, dealing fairly, makes no warranty; that the sale was fair here, and the plaintiff purchased only Wright's title, well knowing what that was; that in consequence, he got the property for about half its worth, and his bargain was offered to be taken off his hands, placing him where he stood; I think he has no right, either at law or in equity, to ask more of any body.

I do not, therefore, think that a case is made, which raises the question of substitution

JUDGE COALTER.

It seems to me that the points made in the argument of this case, as arising under the Act of Assembly, do not arise, and need not be decided.

In the first place, it may be remarked, that this case is not one in which property was levied by the Sheriff, at his own risk, on a Fi Fa. against the goods. The execution levied was a Ca. Sa. and the debtor being taken, he delivered the slaves in discharge of his body, under the Act of Assembly, which provides, that a debtor in such case may tender to the Sheriff, property to the value of the debt and costs, which he shall receive and proceed to sell, in like manner as in case of goods taken on a Fi Fa. But in this case, the law goes on further to provide, that if the property shall be under any lien or incumbrance, so that the whole cannot be sold, (by which I understand to be meant, that the whole title cannot be sold,) a new Ca. Sa. or Fi. Fa. shall issue for the 16 balance; and the Clerk of the *Court shall, on the return of the Sheriff of the insufficiency, or incumbrance, issue a new Ca. Sa. or Fi. Fa. if required. But when such property shall have been under incumbrance, the debtor shall not be at liberty to tender slaves, or personal estate, on a second Ca. Sa. being served.

According to the bill itself, this was a case in which, on a Ca. Sa. executed, the property tendered and received by the Sheriff, was under an incumbrance. It does not allege that any notice had been given to the creditor even of this incumbrance; but states, that on the day of sale, the sale was forbidden by the trustees of the creditors; so that this, at most, was a notification by the incumbrancers, of the incumbrance on the property, that purchasers might know that their purchase must be subject to it. It also alleges, that the Sheriff refusing to proceed, unless indemnified under the Act, the creditor gave bond and security, and the sale went on: that the appellant became the purchaser; after which the trustees brought detinue against him, recovered judgment, which has been affirmed in this Court; and he has paid the value and damages assessed. It appears that the value fixed on the slaves is precisely the same at which they were struck off to the appellant; and that the interest on that sum was taken as the criterion of damages for detention. How these estimates, so advantageous to the appellant, could have taken place, without consent, does not appear, and it may be unnecessary even to conjecture.

How does the case stand on the proofs? The record says that certain exhibits were filed, but by which party is not stated. One of them is a copy of the judgment in detinue, and is the only evidence of that allegation in the bill; of course it must have been filed by the appellant. The other is the copy of the execution and Sheriff's return, and, except the statements in the answers as to that matter, is the only evidence of a sale of the slaves by the Sheriff. Without resorting to one or the other, or indeed to both of these, there is no proof of that allegation in the bill. Indeed, *the return does not prove a purchase by the appellant. Whether this exhibit was filed by the appellant or not, (though it may fairly be presumed to have been filed by him,) he must resort to it to prove that important allegation, or he must rely on the answers for that purpose; and, in this latter case, must take them entire, at least so far as relates to this point. So too, if the return is relied on as to this matter, it must be taken entire, as the return of a sworn officer. Admit that he would not be bound to take it as true in all its parts, but might have contradicted that part of it which states that the debtor's "right and property only was sold," yet the bill neither suggests a falsehood in this part of the return, nor is there any proof that it is false, although both the answers aver the truth of it. This return then, if used by him as proof of a sale of the slaves, must be taken entire, and as true, until properly contradicted. But, this return neither proves that the appellant became the purchaser, nor that a bond was taken to indemnify the Sheriff; nor is there any proof of these facts, except what is derived from the answers. These, also, if resorted to for this purpose, must be taken entire as to these matters. The Sheriff says that the sale was not forbidden in the usual way, and that no notice had been given to the creditor; that the only way in which it was forbidden, was by an exhibition of the deed of trust on the day of sale; and that even that was done at the instance of the appellant, who, it was understood, was one of the sureties in an injunction obtained by Wright to stop a sale under that deed; that under these circumstances, and at the instance of Pate, the creditor in the execution, and also, he believes, at the instance of the appellant, he agreed to proceed with the sale, on being indemnified.

But, take the case as stated in the bill, what does it amount to but this? That slaves, not absolutely sold, but only incumbered, had been delivered in discharge of the debtor, who had been taken in execution; and that on the day of sale, this incumbrance was made known. The debtor, then, had the equity of redemption, which the Sheriff was perhaps bound, under the Act, to sell. The debtor, surely, could not complain of this; and no objection to the sale was made by him. Pate, the creditor, might have stopped. He might have had the merits of this incumbrance investigated, and a sale finally made under it, if so decreed, so as to give him the balance, or get the whole, if he could set it aside; but he was not bound to contest it. He might be satisfied of its justice, or that the property would sell, subject to it, for enough to satisfy his claim. He had a right to force the sale, and purchase in the property, subject to the incumbrance; at least, if not objected to by the debtor, or any one else. He says, he attended for this purpose; but the Sheriff having doubts, whether to proceed or not, he agreed to give bond, &c. The sale proceeded; he bid for the property, it being proclaimed that the debtor's right in it alone was sold; but the appellant outbid him, and became the purchaser. It seems, then, that this bond was given to quiet the Sheriff, and to induce him to do, what it would seem to me, under these circumstances, it was clearly his duty to do, if it had not been given. The return, then, simply shews, that the Sheriff proceeded to do what the law required. There being an incumbrance, he sold only the rights of the debtor, or his equity of redemption.

The sale then, not being forbidden in the usual way, and the bond not being given in the usual way, and the sale being only of the debtor's interest, the trustees very properly brought their suit against the purchaser. The bond is not in the record, and would probably shew that it was not taken under the Act, as, it seems to me, it could not be. Be this as it may, the only proof in the cause, of a sale of the property, shews that the rights of the debtor only were sold. And then, more effectually to shew this, and still further to relieve the case of any doubt, Pate, the creditor, in his answer, offers to step into the shoes of the appellant.

19 *For these reasons, I think the decree must be affirmed.

The other Judges concurred in affirming the decree, and it was accordingly affirmed.

Oswald, Deniston & Co. v. Tyler, Adm'r of Hancock.

January, 1826.

Chancery Practice—Judgment—New Trial—Surprise.*
—Where a plaintiff suffers a verdict and judgment to go against him at law, he cannot apply to a Court of Equity to grant him a new trial, on the ground of his having been surprised at the trial at law, by unexpected evidence, unless he was prevented by fraud or accident from suffering a non-suit. Decided by two Judges out of three.

Appeal from the Chancery Court of Fredericksburg.

The bill was filed by Oswald, Deniston & Co. against Tyler, administrator of Hancock, praying that a new trial might be granted them, in a case in which they were plaintiffs, and the said Tyler defendant. The history of the case, and the various topics of argument are so fully displayed in the following opinions, that any other report would be superfluous.

Stanard, for the appellants.

Leigh, for the appellee.

January 28. The Judges delivered their opinions.*

20 *JUDGE COALTER.

On the facts as they are in proof, I consider it as most clear and apparent, that if the case had been before the Court of Law, as it is now before us, the appellants would have had a judgment for their debt.

The agent of the appellants had put into the hands of their attorney, a bond to bring suit on, and which he knew to be justly due from the intestate of the appellee. He had no knowledge of the existence of the fact out of which the defence grew; nor had he the least suspicion that such fact existed, or cause to suspect that such defence could or would be relied on, otherwise he could have

Clements, 1 Pat. & H. 158. It is said: "The rule is that where a party litigant has been impleaded in a court of law, having a plain legal defense, which he has failed to make, and against whom judgment has been rendered, he will not be entertained in a court of equity, unless he allege and prove, (if denied or not admitted,) a sufficient excuse for the failure, no matter how clear his case upon the merits, and how great the hardship, (and in its nature penal, the consequence as involving the loss or forfeiture of a just defense,) of being denied relief in a court of equity. This rule, or principle, is so well settled by a uniform and almost unbroken series of decisions of our own court of last resort, early and late, coming down to the very last volume of Grat-tan, (the 10th,) as to render it unnecessary to do more than to refer to a few of the latest cases. See Oswald v. Tyler, 4 Rand. 19; Faulkner v. Harwood, 6 Rand. 125; Slack v. Wood, and Aller, Walton & Co. v. Hamilton, 9 Gratt. 40, 265; George v. Strange, and Meem v. Rucker, 10 Gratt. 46, 106, and the earlier authorities therein cited and approved."

And, in Slack v. Wood, 9 Gratt. 42, it is said: "In the case of Floyd v. Jayne, 6 John. Ch. R. 479, CHANCELLOR KENT states the settled doctrine and practice of the court of equity, as well as of courts of law, to be, that a party is not entitled to relief after verdict upon testimony which with ordinary care and diligence he might have procured and used upon the trial at law. And he adds that 'it would be establishing a grievous precedent, and one of great public inconvenience, to interfere in any other case than one of indispensable necessity and wholly free from any kind of negligence. This doctrine has been fully recognized in this court by repeated adjudications. Berne v. Mann, 5 Leigh 304; Oswald v. Tyler, 4 Rand. 19; Faulkner v. Harwood, 6 Rand. 125. *JUDGES GREEN and CARR did not sit: the former having decided the cause as Chancellor; and the case having been argued before the latter came into this Court.—Note in Original Edition.

met and defeated it. He was not only kept ignorant thereof, but lulled into security, (whether intentionally or not, it is not material to decide,) by the acts and declarations, as well of Hancock, in his life-time, as of his administrator after his death. The defence, therefore, was a complete surprise on him.

If Hancock himself had made this defence, it would not only have been a surprise, but a palpable fraud; and if intentional fraud cannot be brought home to the appellee, Tyler, his administrator, yet the effect of the defence by him is the same, upon the appellants, as if it had been made by his intestate; and there is no more reason, that I can see, to protect his estate from the consequences of such defence in the hands of his administrator, than in his own hands. But, even the administrator, Tyler, is not altogether clear of blame in the premises.

But, moreover, this claim originated in trust and confidence. That trust was, at least, so far abused by Hancock in his life-time, as that papers were left by him, out of which this unjust defence grew; and thus, in effect, a breach of that trust and confidence has arisen; which furnishes, it seems to me, a distinct head of equity in this case.

The facts establishing these positions are as follows: Oswald, Deniston & Co. 21 residents of Great Britain, had several stores in this country, prior to the Revolution. They appointed Laird as their general agent, to wind up their affairs after the Revolution, and to collect and secure their debts, &c. It was necessary for him to have a sub-agent or collector of the concerns growing out of two of the stores; and, on the recommendation of one Muschett, he appointed Hancock, a relation of Muschett, (and concerned with him at that time or afterwards, in mercantile transactions,) to that trust; Muschett becoming responsible for his transactions therein. In consequence of this responsibility, Muschett took a mortgage on some slaves of Hancock, for his security, which was recorded. Hancock went on collecting, &c. until about the beginning of the year 1803; when, becoming intemperate, he could no longer be confided in, and a change of agency became necessary. A correspondence took place between Laird, Muschett and Hancock, on this subject; and it was ultimately agreed that Muschett should succeed to the agency, on the same terms that Hancock held it: and the books and papers were accordingly delivered over to him. It seems, however, that Muschett still anticipated employing Hancock in the business, as far as he should deem it safe to do so. Muschett accordingly proceeded with the agency. In May, 1804, a settlement took place of Hancock's agency, between him and Murdock, the clerk of Laird; and in April, 1805, he and Muschett gave their bond for 3991 2 6, the balance due, after correcting some small errors in the previous settlement, with interest from the 16th of May, 1804. This bond was delivered to Laird, and remained in his possession until it was delivered to the attorney to bring suit on. It was no part of the concerns which Muschett had an agency in; on the contrary, he was a co-obligor, and, as to the appellants, as much a principal in the bond as Hancock; though, as between them, he was security only. It of course was never put into his hands for collection; nor could it have been supposed that he would be employed as agent to collect a debt due from himself.

22 *This being the known and undoubted state of the case, Muschett and Hancock, who had been in trade together, make a settlement of their accounts in September or October, 1805; in which, Muschett falling in debt to Hancock, he charges himself with the whole amount of the said bond of 399l. 2 6; although, on the day of its date, he had paid 97l. 18 10½, part thereof, being commissions then due on his collections, and of course, as between them, took upon himself the payment of the balance of the debt.

This being the situation as between those parties, and Muschett now having his indemnity in his own hands, he gives Hancock a release of the mortgage on the slaves, which is proved and recorded on the 21st of October, 1805. This shews that the settlement was before that date, and as the interest between them is calculated up to the 1st of September, 1805, I conclude that it took place about the latter date. This release contains, on its face, a statement which was probably understood, on the trial at law, to be an acknowledgment by Muschett, the agent, that the collections by Hancock were fully paid off; whereas, in fact, it could only have had reference to the settlement of the accounts aforesaid; as it is no where pretended that the debt was ever paid by Hancock, otherwise than by Muschett charging himself there with it, as aforesaid.

On the 16th of December, 1805, and of course after this settlement, Hancock writes to Laird, and instead of informing him of that settlement, and that Muschett had thus, in fact, (if it was so considered,) collected that debt, he tells him he is going to Dumfries on the 26th, to make a final settlement, of all mercantile transactions, with Muschett and his sons; and asks to be furnished with a statement of interest arising on the settlement made in 1804, and also the amount of interest on the settlement in April, 1805; and also with a copy of the bond. This shews, conclusively, that he knew Muschett had not this document in his possession. On the 21st December, Laird answers his letter, and informs him that the bond 23 granted by him *and Muschett on the 2d of April, 1805, was for 399l. 2 6, bearing interest from the 16th of May, 1804. Interest to the 2d of April, 1805, is 21l. 1 6½; which makes the whole due on that day, 420l. 4 0½; when a payment was made by Muschett of 97l. 18 10½; leaving a balance due Oswald, Deniston & Co. "by you and Muschett," of 322l. 5 2, with interest. He then goes on to remind him how this debt originated, and to press him for payment.

From this time, until the death of Hancock, he was repeatedly pressed for payment, and as often promised it, as is in proof, by Laird, and Murdoch his clerk, and never once pretended or stated that he had paid it to Muschett, though he alledged that Muschett was in his debt. He well knew that the settlement between him and Muschett, was no payment; and it is the most charitable view that can be taken of his conduct, to say, that probably he forbore mentioning that settlement to Laird, not wishing his partner and friend to be pressed for the money. In fact, however, it is charged in the bill, and I do not understand it to be denied in the answer, that Muschett was at that time insolvent; though that state of his affairs was then only known to his partner Hancock. If this was the fact, there was a fraudulent intention in making this settlement and concealing it, if it was intended thereby to throw the loss on the appellees. The answer, after insisting on the power of Muschett and Hancock to make the settlement so as to discharge Hancock, admits the insolvency of Muschett, and says that that is the reason why the appellants now seek to charge Hancock's estate, &c.

Tyler, his administrator, was also pressed for payment, and invariably promised it, even down to within a few months before the suit, when he wrote a letter, proposing arrangements for the payment; and never before that refused payment; nor even after the suit, was this payment, as it is called, to Muschett, ever intimated to Laird, although, in his answer, he states that he had for a long time intended to insist on this ground of defence. It is true, he also states, that he made it known to the clerk of Laird, 24 *and that both he and his counsel knew the claim would be contested. But, so far from proving any such notice, the reverse is proved; and the fact is, that Laird had no intimation or suspicion, nor had his attorney, (as is proved by them both,) of this defence, until after it was made. In short, the attorney did not believe that any serious defence was intended.

It is true, that a motion was made for a continuance, at one time, in which some transaction with Muschett is mentioned; but no explanation is given; and the attorney for Tyler says it would have been refused, if asked for. As Muschett was a co-obligor, and had made the only payments that were made (for he made another payment besides that above mentioned,) the agent, if he had known of this motion, might well have supposed that some further discount was claimed as a payment by Muschett, or that something was supposed to be due to him or Hancock, as agent, which ought to be credited; the principal credits given, being payments in that way; and the agent knowing that nothing of this kind could be shewn, he would not have deemed it necessary to attend the trial. It does not appear, however, that he knew of that motion.

The agent, in his deposition, proves that he had no suspicion of any such defence, and that he believed the letter of Hancock, requesting a statement, was merely to enable him and Muschett to settle their accounts: that payment never had been refused, either by Hancock or Tyler; but that the latter, as late as May 21st, 1810, (shortly before the suit,) had, by letter, promised payment. This letter is in the record. The clerk of Laird also proves frequent applications to Hancock, who never alleged a payment to Muschett. The Judge who tried the cause, also proves, that the evidence satisfied his mind of the correctness of the verdict; and there was nothing to induce the plaintiff's attorney to suffer a non-suit.

groundless defence, is therefore clearly proved.

25 *The answer, though it states as aforesaid, that he told the clerk of Laird the nature of this defence, yet admits that it was only a few days before the trial, that he had found the settlement above referred to, and which evidently formed the chief ground of defence, though, he says, he had long before abundant proof of that settlement. Wherein that proof consisted, he does not state; and it is not pretended, that he gave notice after finding the settlement. In short, he proves no notice whatever; but the reverse is clearly proved, both by the agent, and the attorneys on both sides.

The intestate Hancock, had received the monies of the appellants, as their agent and collector; had failed to pay, and never has paid, the monies so collected; and they must lose this just debt, in consequence of a surprise in setting up an unjust and groundless defence, unless equity can relieve.

But it is said, this must be the result, because the attorney for the appellants failed to suffer a non-suit. It may be worthy of remark, as farther excuse for him, that the defendant had wished for a continuance at the trial Court, in order to make his defence yet stronger; and he might have supposed it safer for his clients to take the chance of a trial on the then evidence, (which the Judge proves was altogether circumstantial,) than to suffer a non-suit. But be this as it may, shall a mistake of an attorney, in this respect, arising from his total ignorance of the real facts of the case, subject a party to the loss of his debt, where a surprise, if not a fraud, is clearly proved? In other words, is there no case in which a plaintiff at law can excuse himself for not suffering a non-suit? The attorney for the appellants states, in his deposition, that he did believe after the trial, that Muschett had a right to collect this debt, and that Hancock had made a proper payment: that he was entirely ignorant of the manner in which it originated, &c. and believed that there could be no chance thereafter to resist the evidence, and 26 therefore he did not *suffer a non-suit, as he otherwise would have done. He denies that he moved for a new trial, as stated in the answer, as there was no ground for such motion.

Suppose a defendant to a suit on a bond, gives notice that he intends to rely on certain set-offs, but in a subsequent conversation with the plaintiff, who satisfies him that he can repel those set-offs, he agrees not to insist on them, but still makes the defence; and the attorney, not knowing of these facts, (his clients, as in this case, not being present,) fails to suffer a non-suit. Must the plaintiff lose his debt? This fraud could have been guarded against, by suffering a non-suit, as well as the surprise in this case. Surely, I think, equity would relieve against such fraud. The objection, then, if I am right in this, is not universal and inflexible. It must depend on the nature of the case that is made out.

This Court has uniformly, and in many cases, gone farther in extending their equitable relief, beyond what would be sanctioned by British decisions; on the reasonable and proper ground arising out of the nature of our Judicial jurisprudence, the dispersed situations of clients and attorneys, and the uncertainty when suits can be tried, &c. But I think, such a case as that above put, and indeed this very case, would be relieved against in England.

In Richards v. Symes, 2 Atk. 319, an issue had been directed out of Chancery, to ascertain whether the mortgage in question was given to the defendant. Of course, he was plaintiff in the issue. On the trial, the defendant in that issue, in order to discredit one Bere, the most material witness for the plaintiff in the issue, produced a person to swear that this witness was not in England, at the time he swore to the fact. Several affidavits were read, on the motion for a new trial, to prove that Bere was in England, when he swore to the fact; and it was insisted, that the credit of Bere being invalidated, as aforesaid, weighed greatly with the jury, and was the principal reason that induced the verdict, and that the plaintiff 27 was only *prepared to support his general character; otherwise he could have given the same answer he is now prepared to do, had he been aware of the objection. The Lord Chancellor says, this application comes after a long time, &c. The ground for a new trial is surprise, &c. A great many objections have been made to the motion, and amongst others, that this is an application for a new trial, after a verdict, found by a special jury, upon a trial at bar. He agrees that formerly some countenance was shewn to this objection, and a distinction taken between trials at bar, and at Nisi Prius; because the latter are subordinate to the former, and therefore not of so solemn a nature. But this objection has been over-ruled, &c.

But the main ground on which he goes, is, that it was proved that notice was given to the party, a fortnight before the trial, that they would, on the other side, attempt to prove Bere abroad, which, though it was not so particular as to point out the very place where they would shew him to be, was sufficient notice for the plaintiff to prepare to encounter this evidence. Another reason which weighed (though that does not appear to have been insisted on by the counsel) was, that the new trial is asked by the plaintiff at law; and if it had been better made out, he would not have inclined to grant it, because it was in his power to have been non-suited; for, if his counsel had been of opinion that there was evidence, of which they were not apprised, and too strong then to encounter, he might have advised him to suffer a non-suit, and then he might have come back for new directions, &c. The Lord Chancellor, however, does not pretend to say, that no new trial can be granted, where the party might suffer a non-suit. But, the execution of the mortgage to the defendant, the plaintiff in this issue, was the very point in dispute, and Bere was the principal witness; so that if he had not been notified that he would be discredited, and had been surprised in that respect, he could not fail to see the propriety of a non-suit. He was present too, to aid his counsel. 28 *Moreover, he had notice, and a fair opportunity to meet the evidence. I can see no more danger in relieving a plaintiff, in a case of surprise properly made out, than to relieve a defendant in such case.

But, suppose the agent of the plaintiffs had been informed of the verdict, in time to apply for a new trial at law, and had made out the case that now appears before us. Would he have been correctly told, that although he knew of no defence, much less of that which was set up, that he should have attended from Court to Court, in order to aid his counsel in this suit on a plain bond, the payment of which had never been refused, but always promised; and because he did not do this, although completely surprised by the evidence and defence set up, the verdict must stand, though manifestly against justice? And would not this decision have been the more extraordinary, if the Judge had certified, as he has proved in this cause, that there was nothing in the case to admonish the counsel of the propriety and necessity of suffering a non-suit? I should rather be disposed to think, that had a non-suit been entered, and the whole matter had appeared to the Court afterwards, and before the end of the Term, the non-suit even ought to have been set aside, and a new trial granted, instead of putting the party to begin de novo. I think I have seen such practice in the old District Courts.

In Bright, executor of Crisp v. Eynon, 1 Burr. 390, an action was brought on a note for the payment of money. The defence set up was a discharge by the testatrix under her hand, as it was alleged, though the body of the paper was written by the defendant. He called two witnesses, who said they believed the name subscribed to be her hand; but their knowledge of it was slight; one of them having only seen her sign a receipt. The question on the trial was, whether it was forged or not? There were various circumstances proved on both sides; and though that fact is not stated, they serve to shew, that the nature of the defence was known to the plaintiff. The two witnesses, however, *who believed it to be her hand, were not opposed by any witnesses to the contrary, and the reason given was, that the plaintiff had no opportunity of getting it inspected. Two questions were left to the jury; first, whether it was forged? secondly, whether it was not obtained by fraud, and without her knowing the contents, and effect of the discharge? The plaintiff took his chance with the jury, who found a verdict for the defendant, and then moved for a new trial. Lord Mansfield says, "Trials by jury could not subsist now, without a power somewhere to grant new trials. A general verdict can only be set right by a new trial, which is no more than having the cause more deliberately considered by another jury, when there is reasonable doubt, or perhaps certainty, that justice has not been done." In our case that certainty exists.

He enumerates several causes for setting aside verdicts, and amongst others, "that the parties may be surprised by a case falsely made at the trial, which they had no reason to expect, and therefore, could not come prepared to answer." He does not confine such case of surprise to the defendant alone. The parties may be surprised; and the very case was a motion by the plaintiff for a new trial, who might have suffered a non-suit, so as to have taken time to inspect the paper. He goes on to say, "that for a good while, the granting of new trials was holden to a degree of strictness so intolerable, that it drove the parties into a Court of Equity, to have, in effect, a new trial at law, of a mere legal question, because the verdict, in justice, under all the circumstances, ought not to be conclusive; and many bills have been entertained on this ground, and the question tried over again at law, under the direction of a Court of Equity; and therefore, of late years, the Courts of Law have gone more liberally into the granting of new trials, according to the circumstances of the respective cases." He goes on then to consider the case. "If the matter in dispute was of great value,"

(it was only 60l. there, but from one to 30 two thousand dollars here.) "I will *not say that all the suspicious circumstances might not be a ground for a new trial, to give the plaintiff an opportunity of getting the instrument inspected, by persons acquainted with her hand; though, I think, upon the evidence laid before the jury, the verdict, in that respect, was right. What I go on, is, the apparent fraud &c. in obtaining the discharge, if she really signed it." He then goes into the circumstances in proof on both sides, and finally says: "The attention of the jury was artfully drawn to the heinous nature of the charge of forgery only; and I left the question of fraud to them, without any express direction, that the circumstances spoke fraud apparent. The same jury might, on re-consideration, find a different verdict." On the whole, he was for granting a new trial, in which the other Judges concurred.

If Lord Mansfield would have been right in granting a new trial, even as to the point of forgery in this case, had it been a matter of great value, in order that the plaintiff, who was present, and might have suffered a non-suit, might come better prepared; surely in this case, where he was not present, where he proves, that a false case was made (innocently or not by the administrator, makes no difference,) which he had no reason to expect, and therefore could not come prepared to answer, he ought to have had a new trial at law, had he come in before the adjournment, and made out his case there. Shall it be said that he would have been repelled there, because he did not attend the trial, though being apprised of the event, he came in during the Term? I hope not. If he would have been excused at law, and obtained a new trial there, (as I cannot doubt that he would,) whence comes it, that a Court of Equity will be more rigid and less inclined to protect a party against surprise and the most manifest injustice, than a Court of Law would and ought to be? Courts of Law had formerly held parties to intolerable strictness, (says Lord Mansfield,) in consequence of which, equity interfered. They, however, afterwards pursued equity in this *respect. Are they now to take the lead, and is equity even not to go as far as they would and ought to go?

The excuse is as good for not appearing during the Term, as at the trial; and if Equity will not relieve when a Court of Law would, it must be for reasons, of which I am not able at present to appreciate the weight. Doubtless, should that be the decision of this Court, it will be right. But, until better advised my opinion is, that even in England, where their judicial system is such as to guard against surprise and accidents of this kind, infinitely more than we can, a new trial would be granted in this case, either at law or equity; at law, if the case could have been presented there; or in equity, if the party, without culpable neglect, (as in shewn in this case,) could apply no where else. We, necessarily, in my humble opinion, go farther than in England, in granting equitable relief against judgments at law. It would be no difficult matter, to shew this to have been the uniform course of this Court, from the earliest reports of its decisions, to the present day. The decisions have not been entirely uniform, I admit; sometimes more liberal of relief, and again less so. But, the uniform course repeatedly declared by our ablest and most experienced Judges, as necessarily arising out of our jurisprudence, and the nature of our territory &c. has been to enlarge the equitable jurisdiction. I admit that it ought not to be too latitudinous; and the latter decisions seem to me to be more properly guarded than the earlier.

I am not disposed to depart too hastily from those landmarks; and at all events, if I have at all succeeded in shewing that this would be relieved against in England, or even to raise a great doubt, whether it would or would not, I will be borne out by the great current of our own decisions, in granting relief here. Why is it that we see a great pressure in this State to get into Courts of Equity, in all cases requiring considerable investigation and patience of enquiry, but because of the circumstances aforesaid, so often recognised by this Court? I think, therefore,

32 *it holds a fortiori here, that the inestimable trial by jury will cease to be the favourite tribunal in civil causes, unless it is supported both by Courts of Law and Equity, by a liberal hand in granting new trials, as heretofore has been the practice. Who will quietly sit down under the loss of thousands of dollars, because he has not attended from year to year, and at great expense, the progress of a suit on a bond, the payment of which had never been denied, in order to see whether some gun-powder plot may not blow him up at the trial, and defeat his just claim, unless his attorney suffers a non-suit; when that attorney, an able counsellor in this Court, and the enlightened Judge before whom this cause was tried, concurred in the opinion, that the safest and most proper course was, to submit the case to the jury, on the circumstantial evidence that was before them? Mankind ought not to be driven by the course of judicial proceedings, to such misanthropic suspicions of their fellow-men; and I think the argument by the counsel of the appellants, was very strong to prove, that no man should be bound to entertain such suspicions. Why that feeling in the country, evincing the necessity of interposition by Courts of Equity, which produced the late Acts of Assembly, giving this Court appellate jurisdiction, in cases of refusals of injunctions, even in the country, and appeals from their dissolution? Mankind will not sit down under the enormous injustice, presented by this and similar cases. They will call for arbitration laws, or some other means of escape from it.

In these general views of sound policy, I think myself supported by the great current of authorities in this Court, down to the present day, and which it would be too tedious now to pass in review.

There is one case, however, in this Court; Tarpley's adm'r v. Dobyns, 1 Wash. 185. There the bill alleged that the dealings were in specie; and on a settlement in 1779, a bond was given for 54l. current money: that afterwards, a payment of 6l. 10, was made in specie; and that 33 *the defendant still acknowledged himself further indebted, which could not have been, if the debt had been subject to the scale of ten for one: that the plaintiff brought suit; and not suspecting that the defendant would contend that the debt should be scaled, he was unprepared to prove the defendant's declarations, tending to shew that he considered it as a specie debt. The bill was demurred to. The demurrer was sustained by the County Court, and that decree affirmed in the High Court of Chancery. The President delivered the opinion of this Court:

"We feel no difficulty in declaring that both decrees are right. Although the appellant might have resorted to a Court of Equity in the first instance, if his case would bear it, it is now too late, after having made his election to take a trial at law. As to the surprise, which is made the pretext for this application to a Court of Equity, it ought not to benefit him; since, when he discovered a disposition in the appellee to avail himself of his legal advantage at the trial, he might have suffered a non-suit."

Although, in this case, the bond was given for current money, and not specie, yet I presume, that under that clause of the fifth section of the Act of 1781, commonly called the scale of depreciation, which provides, "that where other circumstances arise, which, in the opinion of the Court before whom the cause is brought to issue, would render a determination agreeable to the above table unjust, it shall and may be lawful for the Court to award such judgment, as to them shall appear just and equitable," the party had his remedy at law to recover what was just, on proving those circumstances; or, as would seem to be insinuated by the Court, might originally have come into equity, in order to shew the mistake in giving the bond for current money instead of specie. Yet, having elected his remedy at law, it was decided to be too late to resort to equity. It would seem, too, that in that case, 34 the party was not surprised. *The defence at law lay on the surface of the paper, and when he discovered, (being present, as we must presume from the case,) that the defence was to be made, he proceeded to take his chance before the jury. The attorney, too, when he brought the suit, must have seen, from the face of the bond, that this debt was paid.

In Hawkins v. Depriest, 4 Munf. 469, the failure to suffer a nonsuit was expressly insisted on. The bill alleges that the appellee sold to the appellant a quantity of land, containing acres for £ , which he promised to pay: that he executed a deed, and being informed it was necessary to acknowledge the receipt of the money, he gave a receipt on the back of the conveyance, without having received it: that when he instituted a suit for the money, the defendant, taking advantage of the receipt, prevailed at law, and refuses to pay the money. The bill calls for a discovery of the land purchased, the price, and how much has been paid.

The defendant pleaded the judgment in bar; and also answering, admits the purchase, but says he made a full payment, and that the complainant had no legal or equitable claim on him for one cent.

A copy of the record of the suit at law, was produced; which was an action of assumpsit for the price of a tract of land, said to be sold and conveyed for the price of 300l. It appeared, that on the trial, on the plea of non assumpsit, the witnesses proved that the defendant agreed to give to the plaintiff 100l. for two tracts of land; that this evidence was objected to, as not supporting the declaration; and the Court refused to let it go to the jury: to which opinion, there was an exception, but no appeal taken.

Two certified copies of deeds, both recorded in July, 1791, were filed; shewing, that the plaintiff in fact sold and conveyed two tracts of land to the defendant for fifty pounds each, on one of which a receipt was endorsed, but none on the other.

35 *Sundry depositions were taken in the Chancery suit, from which it appeared that no money was paid at the time of writing the receipt, which a subscribing witness considered a mere matter of form: that afterwards, the defendant paid about 52l. and claimed credits for some tobacco and corn, and also for work done; which credits, except the tobacco, being disputed, he determined to stand a suit. The County Court allowed a credit for 6l. for tobacco, and decreed the balance of 42l. with interest. This decree was affirmed by the Superior Court of Chancery in Richmond, and that decree was affirmed in this Court.

In this case, the plaintiff at law had failed, as well from the badness of his declaration, on which, if not the whole, at least some of his evidence, was excluded; and also, because a groundless and unjust defence was set up. He was thus doubly admonished of the propriety of suffering a non-suit. How could he doubt of the propriety of a non-suit in such a case? If the evidence was improperly rejected, he could also have appealed. But, after failing to do either of these, he comes at once into equity, to recover his debt thus lost at law. It is there insisted upon, that he should have suffered a non-suit at law; that the merits had been tried there, &c. He gets relief, however, and why? Because the defendant had set up what he must have known to be a groundless and unjust defence; and the plaintiff is not to be punished by the loss of his debt, because, even with all these circumstances in his case, he failed to suffer a nonsuit.

The receipt, in that case, on the deed, was under the usual acknowledgment of livery of seisin, and is in these words: "Received, on the day of the within indenture, of Robert Hawkins, for said land, full satisfaction;" and opposite to the signature is a scroll. It does not state that it is sealed. It is evidently a mere formal matter on its face; no sum mentioned, and, I presume, on every ground, was no estoppel at law. The bill is not framed on that ground. The counsel says, it might, perhaps, have been an estoppel.

36 *The ground of the decision is not stated in the report; but, from the arguments set up on both sides, and the manner in which the failure to suffer a non-suit was relied on, I presume no such grounds was seriously insisted on, as giving equity jurisdiction. In fact, he was unprepared to meet the defence. If he had offered the evidence that was before the Court of Chancery, and his other evidence had been received, can any one say he ought not to have prevailed at law? I think not. It could not have been rejected, for the instrument in fact was not sealed.

If that decision is law, surely relief ought to be granted in this case.

Why does a Court of Equity relieve a defendant at law, who has paid part of the debt, and has a receipt, but who fails to make defence and produce it on the trial? Because he was not bound to suspect that the plaintiff had failed, or would be so unjust as to refuse to give him credit; and the immorality and want of conscience, in taking this legal advantage, is too shocking to the moral sense of mankind, to be tolerated in any country, or under any circumstances.

This was probably the ground of the last case. The defendant at law had obtained a receipt, as a matter of form, on the back of the deed, when not one cent of the money had been paid; and it might have been bad law, (though I give no opinion on that point,) if the jury had been instructed, that such receipt, even if under seal, without further proof of payment, was not to be received as evidence of that fact. But, without these efforts at law, he gets relief here against this fraudulent defence. So here, if the fact be that this debt is unjustly lost, in consequence of a defence, which, if made by Hancock himself, would have been a palpable fraud in fact, and by which he ought not to gain; what more can his administrator say, than that he found the papers out of which the defence grew; that he made it honestly, believing it to be a just defence? But, if it is not so in fact, and if the consequences are

37 the same to the appellants *as if he had known the injustice of the defence, how can he, in conscience, claim these unjust consequences? Is it conscientious to do so, if the defence was in fact unjust? He does not stand as an innocent purchaser. He represents the man whose estate justly owes this debt; and who, himself, could not have benefited that estate, by making this defence.

But, Hancock was a trustee; and if he really intended this settlement with his co-obligor, (an insolvent man, whose circumstances were probably known to him,) to operate as a discharge of himself, and thus to save, out of the wreck, his own debt due from Muschett, it was a fraud; and this in fact, is the amount of the defence. This settlement, having this effect, it is now insisted on, that it was competent for them to make; and if he is to be supposed to intend the consequences of his acts, it was an intended fraud. In such case of trust and confidence, although more might have been done at law, yet this Court has recognised the principle that relief is proper in equity, on account of the appropriate jurisdiction of that Court in such cases. Spencer & White v. Wilson, 4 Munf. 130.

In Fenwick v. M'Murdo, 2 Munf. 244, this Court reviewed many of the leading cases of injunctions, and lay down the general doctrine thus.

The principle, settled on solemn argument, and due consideration of those cases, ought not to be disturbed, which is, "that where a cause has been once fully heard and decided in a Court of Common Law, having competent jurisdiction of the cause, a Court of Equity ought not to interfere, unless fraud, or surprise be suggested and proved, or some material and adventitious circumstance had arisen which could not have been foreseen or guarded against."

This defence could not be foreseen nor guarded against. The facts, from which it arose, were altogether in the knowledge of the other party. The only negligence that could be charged on the agent, is, his failure to attend, from Court to Court, a trial of an action on a bond, without 38 knowledge *even that it was defended seriously. It had been continued for years, during the war, on the ground that the defendants were alien enemies; and the letter, a few months before the suit, promising payment, was well calculated to induce a belief that no serious defence was intended. That merely asked some further delay, until some negroes could be sold, which the distributee of Hancock wished to purchase.

On the whole, I am of opinion that the decree ought to be reversed.

JUDGE CABELL.

The appellants residing in Great Britain, and having many debts due to them in Virginia, contracted at various mercantile establishments, in this State, before the Revolutionary war, employed John Laird as their general agent for the settlement and collection of the said debts. Laird, in the year 1796, appointed Mungo M. Hancock, the intestate of the appellee, as a sub-agent, for the settlement and collection of that portion of the debts aforesaid, that had been contracted at Aquia and Colchester. This appointment was made on the recommendation of James Muschett, who became responsible to Laird for the fidelity of Hancock's agency. In January, 1803, Hancock having become addicted to irregular habits, was dismissed from the agency, and the said Muschett was appointed to succeed him, and to complete the collections which he had begun. More than two years thereafter, viz: on the 2d of April, 1805, a final settlement was had between Laird and Hancock, on account of his collections for Oswald, Deniston & Co. and he was found in arrear 399l. 2 6, for which sum he executed his bond to them, with the aforesaid James Muschett as his surety. This bond was never entrusted to Muschett; for, being one of the obligors, it was rather his duty to pay, than his right to receive, the money for which the bond was given. It always remained 39 with Laird *or his clerk Murdock; a fact well known, both to Hancock and to Muschett. When Tyler, the administrator of Hancock, was first applied to, after his qualification, he made no objection to the payment of this bond; but becoming afterwards convinced that the claim was unjust, he determined to stand a suit; which was brought in the Superior Court of Fairfax county. He put in the plea of payment, on which issue was joined. Judge Dade, who instituted the suit, says in his deposition, that he always understood it was a case which was to be defended on its merits. The attorney, however, to whom the cause was afterwards consigned, seems not to have been apprized of that understanding; and although the cause was continued once, if not oftener, at the instance of the defendant, on the ground of the absence of a material witness, he informs us in his deposition, that until the trial of the cause, he considered the plea of payment as "sham plea, and thrown in as a matter of course, and for delay; except so far as to cover some credits, which he knew the defendant was entitled to." When, therefore, the cause was called for trial, he went into it in full confidence that he wanted no evidence but the bond; and that the defendant had no evidence to resist the judgment he was disposed to demand. On the trial, however, the defendant introduced evidence, which proved that James Muschett (surety in the bond) was a collector for Oswald, Deniston & Co. under John Laird; and he then introduced a statement, proved to be in the hand writing of the said Muschett, purporting to be an account between Hancock and the said Muschett, in which Muschett charges Hancock to John Laird, for the amount of the bond now in controversy. He farther introduced the copy of a release, executed on the 21st of October, 1805, by Muschett to Hancock, of a lien which Muschett had taken from Hancock, in August, 1802, on some slaves, to indemnify him for the responsibility he was under, as surety for Hancock's faithful discharge of his agency. The consideration of the release, as expressed in the release itself, is, that Hancock

40 *had made "a satisfactory settlement with John Laird, agent of Oswald, Deniston & Co." There does not appear to have been any other evidence whatever, introduced on the trial; nor shall I enquire, whether the evidence was or was not sufficient to defeat the plaintiff's action. Their attorney seems not to have doubted its sufficiency; and instead of suffering a nonsuit, submitted the case to the jury, who found for the defendant.

The appellants filed their bill in the Court of Chancery for the Fredericksburg district, praying for a new trial of the cause. The bill was dismissed. The appellants appealed to this Court; and the only question is, whether a new trial ought to be granted.

One of the grounds on which the appellants rest their claim for a new trial, is the allegation in the bill, that the settlement of accounts between Muschett and Hancock, and the pretended payment by the latter to the former, of the bond in controversy, was designed as a fraud upon the appellants. This charge is not only unsupported, but is contradicted by the evidence adduced by the appellants themselves. Hancock was the nephew of Muschett; had lived in his family for many years; and appears to have been extensively connected in merchandize with him and his sons. The appellants have produced a letter, written in December, 1805, by Hancock to Laird, informing him that he intended in a few days to go to Dumfries, for the purpose of making a final settlement of all his mercantile and other transactions with James Muschett and his sons, and requesting Laird to send him a copy of the bond in controversy; in which, it will be recollected, that Muschett was his surety. The statement, or account, which the appellants complain of as being fraudulent, is not dated; but there can be very little doubt, that it was made at the time indicated in this letter. The account embraces individual and mercantile transactions; transactions with James Muschett, (described as James Muschett, sen.)

with John M. Muschett, with Charles H. Muschett, with James *Muschett, sen. & Co. with John M. Muschett & Co. and with H. M. & Co. (probably Hancock, Muschett & Co.) and it appears that Muschett fell deeply in Hancock's debt. It will be recollected, that Muschett had then been nearly three years, and was at that time, collector for Laird, as the agent of Oswald, Deniston & Co. to whom Hancock's bond was due; and as it was ascertained that he was thus deeply indebted to Hancock, what could be more natural than that he should undertake, in consideration thereof, to pay to Laird the debt due by Hancock, and for which he was surety; and that, in consequence of such undertaking, he should introduce it in the settlement, and charge Hancock with the bond which he was thus to pay? Where was the fraud in this? They do not pretend, that this settlement between them amounted to a payment or discharge of the bond. They both knew they possessed no such power. Hancock took no receipt against the bond, and no evidence even of the settlement. The settlement does not appear to have been entered on either of their books; although, being merchants, they may be presumed to have kept regular books, in which were entered all transactions deemed important. It was found, after Muschett's death, on a loose sheet of paper, without date or signature, pinned to the folio of Muschett's ledger, in which Hancock's account was kept. From all these circumstances, it would appear, that even as between the parties, it was not intended as an actual settlement, but merely as a statement to shew how the accounts would stand, in case Muschett should, according to his engagement, pay Hancock's debt to Laird. The release executed by Muschett to Hancock, on the 21st of October, 1805, of the lien on the negroes, which had been given in 1802, does not vary the aspect of the case in this particular. The lien, it may be observed, was given shortly before Hancock's irregular habits had caused his removal as agent; before he had had any settlement with Laird, and when the balance due from him on account of his collections, not being ascertained, *may have been apprehended to be very large. But when, on the 2d of April, 1805, the precise balance due to Laird was ascertained, and when in October of the same year, it became manifest to the parties, that Muschett owed Hancock more money than Muschett was bound for as his surety, to Laird, it would have been highly unjust to continue the incumbrance on Hancock's property. Muschett's proper indemnity was in his own hands; in the greater debt that he owed Hancock. The settlement referred to in the release, was the settlement between Hancock and Laird, of the 2d of April, 1805, and not the settlement between Hancock and Muschett. The subsequent conduct of Hancock is a proof of the rectitude of his intentions. Murdock, the clerk of Laird, made frequent applications to him for payment of this bond. On these occasions, Hancock informed him that Muschett owed him money; and from this circumstance, taken in connexion with the circumstances above mentioned, I think it highly probable, that he also told him of Muschett's agreement to pay the bond for him; but he never intimated that Muschett was authorized to collect the bond from him, nor that he himself was released from the obligation to pay it.

There was no fraud on the part of Muschett or Hancock; and I have gone into this branch of the subject, not because I think it necessary to the correct decision of the cause, but for the purpose of removing unmerited imputation from the memory of two men long since consigned to the grave.

I come now to those grounds for a new trial, alleged in the bill, and supported by testimony, or which may be admitted to be so supported. And here it will not be necessary to go minutely into the evidence; it will be sufficient to state the general results, or the facts which, it is contended, the testimony establishes.

Let it then be considered that the verdict of the jury, although it may have been correctly found, according to the evidence exhibited on the trial, will, nevertheless, work injustice between the parties, if not set aside. Let it be conceded that the appellants, their agent Laird, and their attorney, had no intimation of the nature of the evidence, which the defendant intended to adduce in support of his plea of payment. Let it even be conceded that they did not believe, that the defendant intended any opposition to the judgment which the appellants were in pursuit of. And let it be farther conceded, that they had been previously apprised of the real intentions of the defendant, and of the nature of the evidence on which he relied: that they could and would have introduced such evidence on their part, as to deprive the testimony of the defendant of all its weight, and to establish, clearly and incontrovertibly, their right to the judgment which they demanded. Let all this be conceded; and I am still decidedly of opinion, that the new trial ought not to be granted.

Applications to Courts of Equity for new trials, are extremely rare in England, even on the part of defendants at law; since the Courts of Law exercise the same jurisdiction, and to the same liberal extent. As early as the reign of Charles 2d, (Curtis v. Smalridge, 1 Ch. Cas. 43,) the rule was distinctly laid down, that a Court of Equity will not award a new trial to avoid a judgment at law, "on account of any evidence or matter which might have been used in the first cause, and of which the party then had knowledge," unless some satisfactory reason be assigned, why the party did not avail himself of it, in the trial at law. And I understand the same principle prevails, where the application is not to avoid the whole judgment, but seeks partial relief only. It cannot be necessary to refer to cases to establish this principle. It is to be found every where. The English Courts have very rarely departed from it. Our own Courts, whilst they have never denied its obligation, have, unfortunately, (I humbly think,) been too often seduced into forgetfulness of it, by a tender regard to the hardship of particular cases.

44 Hence, the variation "to be found in the decisions of this Court, and which has sometimes exposed us to the imputation of having no certain system. Hence the course, which has been sometimes pursued, of allowing the defendant to come into equity, to get relief for a payment, on the ground that the payment having been in the knowledge of the plaintiff, it was against conscience in him not to allow it. Hence, also, the practice of allowing the defendant to come into a Court of Equity, after a trial at law, to demand a disclosure of facts from the plaintiff, instead of holding him to demand the discovery before the trial, to be used at the trial.

These remarks are not necessary to the decision of this cause; but they are suggested by the occasion, and they are thrown out as indications, that I am disposed to return to and guard with greater caution, the line which has been wisely drawn between the jurisdictions of Courts of Law and Equity.

But, a new trial or other relief, will frequently be extended to those who were defendants at law, under circumstances where it would be refused to those who were plaintiffs; and this, not because defendants are greater favourites than plaintiffs with Courts of Justice; but because of the different ground which they occupy. Relief is granted to defendants, because they cannot redress themselves. Thus, if the trial of a cause once commences, there is no mode by which a defendant can escape from it, whatever may be the circumstances which forbid him to expect a just decision. He must await the verdict; and then, if the Courts do not afford him relief, he is without redress. But, the situation of plaintiffs at law is very different. If they find themselves deceived in their own testimony, and think they can strengthen it; or if they be surprised by the introduction of unexpected testimony on the part of the defendant, and believe that it will be in their power at some other time, to explain, rebut or disprove it; they can afford themselves the opportunity of doing *so, by suffering a non-suit, and commencing their action de novo.

The case before us, is one in which plaintiffs at law are seeking to be relieved from a judgment, which they voluntarily permitted to go against them; and this of itself, is sufficient to shew the inapplicability of all, or nearly all the cases, which have been referred to on their behalf.

The allegation of fraud being put out of the case, the only remaining ground on which the appellants can rely, is the surprise at the trial by the introduction of unexpected testimony.

If the case of the plaintiffs applying for a new trial on such ground, be not materially different from that of a defendant, making the same application on the same ground, whence comes it that no case has been found, where the English Courts have granted a new trial on the ground of surprise? The case of Bright, ex'or of Crisp v. Eynon, 1 Burr. 390, may, at first view, be supposed to sanction the granting a new trial to a plaintiff, on this ground. But, if that case be examined, it will be found, that it was decided expressly and solely, on the ground that it was contrary to evidence. None of the Judges but Lord Mansfield said any thing on the ground of surprise; and even he gave no opinion on it, farther than to say, that "if the matter in dispute was of great value, I will not say that the suspicious circumstances might not be a ground for a new trial." If this, and some other general expressions of his, be regarded as the expression of an opinion by that great Judge, that a new trial ought, in any case, to be granted a plaintiff on such ground, I have only to say, that neither he, nor any other Judge in England, has ever acted on that opinion, so far as I am informed. Nor am I aware of any such case in our own Courts.

The only case that looks that way, is the case of Hawkins v. Depriest, 4 Munf. 469. But that was not the case of an application to equity for a new trial, but a bill for substantive relief on the merits of 46 a case originally and *exclusively proper for the Chancery jurisdiction. The ground of the decision were not given by the Court. But it is believed, that the Court must have gone on the ground I have mentioned, viz. that the case was originally and exclusively proper for the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity; for, the party there, having given a deed acknowledging the receipt of the purchase money, he was estopped in a Court of Law, from saying that he had not received it; and therefore, never could have recovered at law; and the Court of Equity rightly decided, that it was not deprived of its jurisdiction by a previous nugatory and improper resort to a Court of Law.

There is not only no adjudication supporting the claim of the appellants, but there is direct authority against it. The case of Richards v. Symes, 2 Atk. 319, was an issue out of Chancery, in which a new trial was prayed for on the part of the plaintiff. The Chancellor observed, "there is another reason that weighs with me; that the new trial is prayed for on behalf of the plaintiff at law; and if it had been better made out, I should not have inclined to grant it; because it was in his power to have been non-suited; for if the counsel had been of opinion, that there was evidence they were not apprised of, and too strong for them to encounter, they might have advised him to suffer a non-suit; and then he might have come back to this Court for new instructions, who would have ordered another issue at law, notwithstanding the non-suit." It is impossible not to be struck with the resemblance, or rather the identity of the case supposed by the Lord Chancellor, and that under consideration. In this case, as in that, the plaintiffs were met by "evidence they were not apprised of, and too strong for them to encounter." In this case, as in that, the counsel "might have advised them to suffer a non-suit."

The case of Tarpley's adm'r v. Dobyns, 1 Wash 185, strongly resembles this in principle. There, the plaintiff at law had failed to produce evidence, (which 47 evidence *was in his power,) merely because he did not suppose the defendant would make such defence as would render that evidence necessary. But, being surprised in this particular, by the defendants unexpectedly making a defence, which made that testimony indispensable, he, like the appellants in this case, did not suffer a non-suit, but submitted the case to the jury, who found against him. He then filed his bill in equity, stating all the circumstances, and praying that the defendant should be decreed to pay him his debt. There was a demurrer to the bill for want of equity, which demurrer was sustained. Judge Pendleton, in delivering the opinion of the Court, says; "although the appellant might have resorted to a Court of Equity in the first instance, if his case would bear it, it is now too late, after having made his election to take a trial at law. As to the surprise which is made the pretext for this application to a Court of Equity, it ought not to benefit the appellant in the present case; since, when he discovered a disposition in the appellee to avail himself of his legal advantage at the trial, he might have suffered a non-suit."

It is no objection to the application of this case to the one under consideration, that in Tarpley's adm'r v. Dobyns, the plaintiffs ought to have known, from the very terms of the bond, that it would be incumbent on him to prove, at the trial, the very fact which the course of the defendant made it necessary for him to prove. He was, in fact, surprised; and the surprise, whether produced with, or without cause, ought to have admonished him of the propriety and necessity of a non-suit. Nor do I think the case would be varied, even if the surprise were produced by the fraud of the defendant; for even in such case, I would say, in the spirit, if not in the very words, of Mr. Pendleton, "when the plaintiff discovered a disposition in the defendant to avail himself, at the trial, of the advantage which his fraud had given him, he ought to have suffered a non-suit."

48 *Although I am decidedly of opinion, that a new trial ought never to be granted by a Court of Equity to a plaintiff at law, merely on the ground of surprise at the trial, from whatever cause that surprise may have arisen; yet, there are cases, in which a new trial ought to be granted to him. I would grant it where the verdict was against evidence; as in the case of Bright, ex'r of Crips v. Eynon, 1 Burr. 390; and as is done in every day's practice; I would grant it, where the damages given by the jury are very inadequate to the injury he had sustained. I would grant it, where there had been any improper conduct on the part of the jury. In short, I would grant him a new trial in all cases, in which, under similar circumstances, I would grant one to the defendant, except where, from the nature of the case, he might have redressed himself by suffering a non-suit. This exception excludes cases where the application, as in the present instance, is founded on mere surprise, produced by the introduction of unexpected testimony at the trial. I would not grant a new trial in any such case, unless the party was prevented by fraud or accident from suffering a non-suit.

But, if there be any case, in which a plaintiff who has failed to suffer a non-suit, is entitled to a new trial on the mere ground of surprise at the trial, I should not think that this is one of them. As to the appellants being out of the country, that is entitled to no consideration. They had an agent, Laird, to whom was committed the management of all their concerns. He lived in George Town, but a few miles from the Court of the county where the cause was tried. From the time that he committed the bond to the hands of the attorney, he took no care, and made no enquiry, concerning the suit. The attorney who instituted the suit, "always understood it was to be defended on its merits;" and he who succeeded him, ought to have known it; for, the cause was once, if not oftener, continued at the instance of the defendant, on the ground of the absence of a material witness. That

49 witness was the clerk of *Muschett; and the object of his testimony was announced to be the verification of some accounts between Hancock and Muschett, on which the defence rested. This circumstance ought to have shewn, that the plea had not been thrown in as a sham plea, and for mere delay, and was well calculated to indicate the nature of the defence. If this fact, together with the opinion of the first counsel, had been communicated to Laird, it would have been his duty to attend to the trial of the cause; and if either he or his clerk Murdock, had attended, the result would have been different; for both of them, as appears from their evidence in the cause, were acquainted with facts, sufficient to insure a verdict for the appellants. In the case of Bateman v. Willae, 1 Sch. & Lefr. 201, Lord Redesdale said, that "a bill for a new trial is watched in equity with extreme jealousy, and it must see that injustice has been done, not merely through the inattention of parties." I entirely concur in this opinion. Men must bear the consequences of their own acts; and those who shut their eyes to the light, ought not to be permitted to complain that they do not see. In this respect, I cannot distinguish between the parties and their attorneys.

I am for affirming the decree of the Chancellor.

The PRESIDENT.

The application to the Court of Chancery, in this case, is, to be relieved against a verdict which was found for the defendant, upon what was conceived, at the time, by the parties, a fair trial at law. No objection was made to it in the Court of Law; nor did the plaintiffs complain of it then. The material allegation in the bill is, (although the plaintiffs went to trial, on the plea of payment,) that they did not dream that any attempt would be made to prove the payment insisted on; and that no instruction was given to their counsel, nor did they, or their agent, attend the trial. Upon the facts in the case, it

50 does not appear that "any fraud was practised by the defendant, by which this negligence, on the part of the plaintiffs, was produced; nor does it appear that there was any obstacle, imputable to the defendant, to prevent their counsel, after the testimony was disclosed, from suffering a non-suit. He freely submitted the case to the jury, and took the chance of a verdict in his favor.

The application, then, for relief, is solely on the ground that great injustice has been done them, in the trial at law. It seems to me very clear, that if a party neglects to avail himself of his remedies for injustice done there, a Court of Equity ought not to interfere; nor ought a plaintiff to be permitted to deprive his adversary of his trial at law, when nothing is imputable to him. Otherwise, the jurisdiction of a Court of Law would soon be supplanted by that of the Courts of Equity. Neither the neglect of a party, nor his ignorance of his rights at law, furnish any ground for the interposition of a Court of Equity. This doctrine is the more reasonable in its application to plaintiffs at law than to defendants. The former always have it in their power, in a case like the present, to be relieved against surprise on the trial, if any, by suffering a non-suit. They are not compelled, as defendants are, to submit their case to the jury. Though the case of Tarpley's adm'r v. Dobyns, 1 Wash. 185, is not, in its circumstances, like the case before us, the principle on which it was decided, is strictly applicable. The Court went on the ground, that the relief asked for in equity, might have been had by suffering a non-suit; and no sufficient excuse for omitting it, being alleged and proved, they affirmed the decree, and dismissed the bill. I admit that this Court, in their solicitude to do justice, may, in some cases, have encroached upon these principles; but they have never been directly over-ruled.

I am of opinion, therefore, to affirm the decree.

Decree affirmed.

January, 1826.

Chancery Practice—Dissolution of Injunction.—It is a correct course of proceeding, for a Chancellor to dissolve an injunction, upon the defendant's tendering a deed to the plaintiff, or filing it with the papers, without requiring it to be approved by the Court, before the injunction shall be dissolved.

Evidence—Parol Evidence Rule.—The general rule is that parol evidence cannot be admitted to contradict, explain, or alter a written agreement; but may be received to prove fraud, mistake or surprise, in the execution of it. But in the latter case, the evidence must be strong and clear.

Same—Affidavit.—An affidavit taken by a party, may be read in the cause, although the party taking it may wish to suppress it, because it operates against him.

This was an appeal from the Staunton Chancery Court. The following opinion will give a complete history of the case.

Wickham, for the appellant.

Johnson, for the appellee.

January 31. JUDGE CARR.

The defendant Spangler and his sister, the wife of Key, were each entitled to an undivided moiety of a tract of land descended to them from their father. Spangler was desirous to sell his share, and offered it to different persons. At length he made a contract with the plaintiff M'Mahon, which is in writing, signed and sealed by the parties, and dated the 15th of July, 1819. This contract expresses that Spangler had sold to M'Mahon, "all his right, title, interest and claim, in and to a certain tract or parcel of land, in the county of Rockingham, on the North river, adjoining Major Robert Grattan, containing by estimation 300 acres, and which formerly belonged to Frederick Spangler, deceased, (a division of which, is hereafter to be made, and it is understood, that when the division is made, †Contracts—Construction—Parol Evidence.—It may be laid down as a rule of construction established beyond question, that a written contract must be construed by the terms used therein if plain and intelligible; that extrinsic proof is not admissible for the purpose of adding to, or detracting from, or explaining, or in any wise varying the plain meaning of the instrument itself; that extrinsic proof may be heard only for the purpose of explaining a latent ambiguity or of applying ambiguous words to their proper subject matter. It may be further laid down as equally well settled, that if parties in making a contract, use words of definite legal signification, they must be understood as using such words in their definite legal sense. Findley v. Findley, 11 Gratt. 437, 438, citing the principal case to the point. The principal case is also cited in Weidebusch v. Hartenstein, 12 W. Va. 764.

the improvements are to be on that part of the land hereby intended to be secured to the said M'Mahon,) together with all 52 *the appurtenances, &c. for and in consideration of the sum of $2600, to be paid, $700 in hand, $100 by the 19th instant, $400 on the 1st of May, 1820, $300 in a gig and harness worth that amount, by the 1st of October, 1820, $550 by the 1st of October, 1822, and $550 by the 1st of October, 1824;" Spangler to make a deed, after the division should be confirmed by the Court of Chancery. In execution of this contract, the plaintiff gave his bonds, and has paid the $700, (which was a payment in hand,) the $100 and the $300. A division was made by the commissioners, and Spangler having gotten the part which had the improvements, delivered it over to the plaintiff who still holds possession of it. Upon the division, the commissioners found that the whole tract contained only 269 acres; and of this, they considered 119 acres, with the improvements, an equal share. Spangler removed to the State of Ohio, without executing a deed to M'Mahon for the land. He assigned the $400 bond to the defendant Clayton, who sued on it, and recovered judgment. It is to injoin this judgment that the bill is filed.

The grounds of injunction are two: 1st. That there was a mistake made by the scrivener in drawing the agreement, the real contract being, that Spangler sold to M'Mahon, not his interest in the land for \$2600, but that he sold him 150 acres of land, with the improvements, at \$17 $\frac{1}{3}$ per acre, making the sum of \$2600. 2d. That even if the contract be rightly expressed, the whole tract was estimated by both parties at 300 acres, and being found 31 acres deficient, the plaintiff is entitled to a deduction for the deficiency, which ought to come out of the bond first due after the discovery: Spangler answered, denying directly and positively, that there was the slightest error in the written contract; or that he sold by the acre; but that he sold his moiety, whatever it might be, for the gross sum of \$2600: that he had given Key a full power to make a deed, and supposed it had been done: that he would make one with all convenient speed.

53 *On a motion to dissolve, the chancellor considered that the written contract must stand, there being no sufficient evidence of mistake; and ordered, that on Spangler's executing and tendering to the plaintiff, or filing among the papers in the cause, a deed with a general warranty for the 119 acres of land, the injunction be dissolved. The appeal is from this order.

The first objection taken to the order was, that however the case might be upon the merits, the chancellor ought not to have dissolved the injunction, upon the tendering a deed to the plaintiff, or filing it with the papers, because this did not give the plaintiff that security and safety on the subject of title, which he was entitled to; that neither the parties, nor the clerk, were judges of the sufficiency of the deed; and that the Chancellor should have refused the motion to dissolve, with leave to renew, when a deed should be filed, and submitted to him for inspection.

I think this objection rather specious than solid. It will be remarked, that there was never any difficulty between the parties, on the subject of title. Though the injunction was dissolved, yet the cause remained in Court. When the deed should be executed, if the defendant tendered it to the plaintiff, he would of course consult his counsel, and unless he thought it a sufficient deed, would reject it. If he did, the defendant would either make another, according to the requisition of counsel, or he would file the deed he had made, with the clerk, and demand the order of dissolution from him. Suppose the clerk to grant it, and the execution to issue, M'Mahon might instantly apply to the Chancellor by petition, submitting to him the deed, and making his objections; and whether it should be in or out of Term, the Chancellor would examine the deed, and stop the execution at once, if he found it insufficient. Thus, no mischief could result to the plaintiff, and I do not think this objection can be sustained.

We come now to the merits, and first, as to the alleged mistake in the agreement. For the authorities on the 54 *subject generally, of admitting parol evidence in a case of this kind, I refer to Ratcliffe v. Allison, 3 Rand. 537, not long since decided. The general rule is, that parol evidence cannot be admitted to contradict, explain, or alter, a written agreement; but, may be received to prove fraud, surprise or mistake in the execution of it. But the books all tell us, that in this latter case, the evidence must be strong and clear. The solemn acts of the parties, under their hands and seals, are not to be blown away by loose and vague conversations. In the case before us, the bill asserts that the scrivener, having first written the heads of the agreement correctly, made the mistake complained of, in the copy; and that this was not perceived, until after the contract was executed. The answer is positive and direct, in contradicting this. The plaintiff, then, must make it out by satisfactory evidence, out-weighting the answer. To increase the difficulty of the plaintiff's task, there are some circumstances strongly corroborating the answer. The first of this is, that the bill itself shows, that there was never any claim made by Spangler, to more than an undivided moiety of a tract supposed to contain 300 acres; and that he wished to sell only his part, never expressing any intention of selling any part of the portion which would fall to Key. Another, and a very important circumstance, as it seems to me, is, that the contract as stated by the bill, is so widely different from that expressed in the agreement executed, that it is difficult to conceive how the one could be mistaken for the other. Observe; the bill states, that Spangler sold the plaintiff 150 acres of land, with the improvements, at $17 1-3 per acre; the contract says, that he sold him his right, title, interest and claim, in and to the land, for $2600: The one a sale by the acre of a specified number of acres; the other, a sale in gross of his interest. M'Mahon does not say, that he did not read over the contract, that he was intoxicated, or in any other way deprived of the use of his reason, for the time. And can we easily imagine, how a man who had made an important contract for 150 acres of land, at so much the acre, and had caused this contract to be reduced to writing, should read it over, or have it read to him, and not discover that it was set down as a purchase in gross of an indefinite quantity of land?

Let us see now what is the evidence to convict the scrivener of mistake. George Clack says, Spangler offered to sell to him his land, which he afterwards sold to the plaintiff, stating that his undivided moiety would be 150 acres; cannot be certain, but his impression is, that he offered the part with the improvements; has heard him make the same offer to others. Thomas Clack heard a conversation after the contract, between M'Mahon and Spangler, his recollection of which (after 2 years,) is, that Spangler did not positively admit, that Bush had made a mistake in drawing the contract; but said that if he had, it should be corrected. W. E. Clark was the plaintiff's bar-keeper; heard many conversations, before the contract, between the parties; in one of which, Spangler said, there were 300 acres in the tract: that one half was his; and that he would warrant to the plaintiff 150 acres. After the survey, and the deficiency discovered, Spangler came to the plaintiff's house, and told the affiant, that he would make satisfaction to the plaintiff. Mr. Williams says, that after the contract, Spangler asked him, in presence of the plaintiff, if he had not surveyed the land, and if it would not hold out 300 acres. He answered, he thought it would be thereabouts. He understood the defendant to say, he had sold the plaintiff 150 acres. Peter Roller. Spangler offered to sell him the land; said there were 300 acres, and he owned half, 150: that he could get either part, with or without the improvements. John Roller. The land was offered to him; rather thinks at 150 acres. He said the whole tract was 300 acres, and offered his part. This is all the evidence upon the subject of the mistake. I mean all, but those affidavits taken after the appeal; which, though if earlier taken, they would not change my opinion. I cannot think ought to be used to impeach a decree made before their existence. Now, I ask, does the evidence prove that the contract made, and the contract signed and sealed, were different? Not one of the witnesses pretends, that he heard the contract made. The conversations, at best, are loose and casual, related, after the lapse of two years, by persons not at all interested, in understanding or remembering them. Most of them may be explained, by adverting to the fact stated in the bill, that Key gave Spangler leave to sell either part; and if he sold the part unimproved, it would of course (on the supposition that the tract was 300 acres,) contain 150 at least. In all cases, he spoke of selling his part, his half, &c. In my opinion, if there were no other evidence in support of the contract but the answer and the circumstances, it would be unshaken by these affidavits.

But, there is other and important evidence; the affidavit of Bush the scrivener. It was objected by the counsel for the appellant, that this ought not to be read, because it was not taken by the plaintiff. How does this appear? The affidavit bears on its face, to be regularly taken by the plaintiff, and is qualified to before a magistrate. It is in the record with the other evidence. No exception is taken to it, and we see that the Chancellor acted upon it; for he notices it in his opinion. There is, to be sure, appended to it, a note signed by Bush; but whether this be taken as evidence or not, (for it is not on oath,) I do not think it affects the affidavit. Without it, the evidence stands, like every other, unobjected to. With it, we see, that the affidavit was written at the request of M'Mahon, and that after hearing it read, he refused to have it taken at that time. But I hold, that a party cannot suppress evidence which he has had taken, because he finds that it makes against him. After the witness is examined, his evidence is in the hands of the commissioner of justice; it belongs to the cause, and ought not to be withheld. But I take it, no party can object to the reading an affidavit, in the Appellate Court, which was read in the Court below, without objection. It was said, that there was no necessity for the plaintiff to except to this affidavit, because it was not taken by the defendant; but it was an affidavit filed in the cause, and which would of course be read, if not excepted to. The plaintiff, therefore, if he did not wish it read, ought to have excepted. If he had done so, the other party might, at once, have had it taken over again, or he might have shewn by other evidence, that it was in fact correctly taken.

I think, upon these grounds, that the affidavit is good evidence; and it is most decisive to shew, that there was no mistake. He states, that he first made a rough draft of the contract, altering it to suit the views of the parties: that then he wrote it over fair, and read it to them distinctly more than once: that they seemed perfectly satisfied, and executed it. The point was against the plaintiff, without this evidence; but this puts it beyond all question. It is but justice to this witness to say, that the counsel, I think, mistook in saying that he was contradicted, both by plaintiff and defendant, with respect to the written memorandum, from which he drew the agreement. They do not state, that they lodged with him a written memorandum to draw the contract by, but that Bush first drew the rough notes, under their direction, and then drew the contract from these; and Bush states the same substantially, in his affidavit.

With respect to the last point, that the land turning out only 269, instead of 300 acres, there ought to be a deduction; even supposing there ought, it would not disturb this decree. The whole deficiency would be 31 acres; half of this, 15½ acres. These, at $17½ per acre, would amount to $268 61; and there will be, after these $400, now in contest, are paid, $1100 of the purchase money still due. But, nothing is clearer than that this contract, as it is written, presents a purchase, not by the acre, but in gross. It is not now necessary to pronounce the law arising on this 58 *aspect of the contract. There is abundance, without touching it, to say that the order dissolving the injunction is right.

The other Judges concurred, and the order of dissolution was affirmed.

Coalter v. Hunter, &c.

Hunter v. Coalter.

February, 1826.

Watercourse—Right of Land Owner to Divert—Adverse Possession.*—No person has a right to divert a water-course on his own land, so as to turn it from the land of his neighbour lower down the streams; and if he claims that right from long enjoyment of it, he must prove that he has had adverse possession for upwards of twenty years.

Same—Diversion by Land Owner—Redress—Equity Jurisdiction.—If the party, who is injured by such an act, restores the stream to its original channel, Equity has not jurisdiction to grant redress, as it is a proper case for damages at common law. The only ground of equitable jurisdiction is, to prevent a threatened injury.

Tail-Race.—The law does not give any power to condemn land for a tail-race.

Mills—Establishment—Certainty Necessary.†—What degree of certainty is necessary, in an order for establishing a mill.

The first of these cases was an appeal from the Staunton Chancery Court; and the second, an appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Rockingham county. The subjects of the two were so connected, that they were argued and decided at the same time.

In the case Coalter v. Hunter, the bill was filed by Hunter, Crawford, Samuel Black and James Black, setting forth the following case: That about 26 or 30 years before the filing of the bill, Samuel and James Black having erected a saw-mill on their land, situate on the south fork of Shenandoah river; but finding that the stream which gave it motion was too small to make it useful, obtained leave of James

59 Crawford, (who owned the land immediately *above,) to change the course of a stream called Coles' run, and bring it into the stream which supplied the mill: that they accordingly obstructed the ancient course of Coles' run, and caused it to unite with the mill stream: that before Coles' run was so changed in its course, it passed through the lands of Frame, Stewart and Cocke; and when it was turned, the said Frame was present, (as the complainants believe,) and gave his consent: that the complainant Hunter purchased a tract of land, adjoining the lands of the complainants Samuel and James, below on the stream, united as before mentioned, from the heirs of Adair, on which there was a saw-mill, erected after the junction of the two streams; which circumstance was his chief inducement in making the purchase: that at the time of the purchase, the complainant Hunter knew of no claim of any person to divert the water, though he had lived in the neighbourhood for many years: that he has continued the saw-mill, and intends to build a grist-mill for the manufacture of flour, and has obtained leave of the County Court of Augusta, though opposed by a certain Thomas S. Coalter, who has purchased, about five years ago, the land formerly belonging to the said Frame; although the said Frame has not only consented to the union of the said streams, but has acquiesced for twenty years thereafter, during which he resided on the land: that notwithstanding, the said Coalter has assumed to himself the right of removing the obstruction, and turning the said stream into its ancient channel. This he does, by entering on the land of the complainant Crawford without any permission, and repeats it as often as the obstruction is replaced, for the purpose, (as the complainants have heard,) of building a saw-mill; in consequence of which conduct, the saw-mill of the complainant Hunter has been stopped for want of water. The complainants therefore pray, that the said Coalter may be perpetually restrained from removing the said obstruction, or in any manner interrupting the water as it has flowed since the union of the streams.

60 *Coalter answered, admitting that the Blacks owned the saw-mill mentioned in the bill, which has now gone to decay, and is entirely useless: that it is true, that Coles' run, was turned out of its ancient channel some twenty odd years ago, after the complainants Samuel and James had built their mill aforesaid, for the purpose of rendering it more useful to the proprietors; but he does not admit that it was so turned, with the consent of all persons concerned: that he is informed, that the said Cocke and those who claimed under him, and the said Stewart never did give any consent: that the permission given by Frame, and Crawford the ancestor of the complainant, was merely a temporary indulgence to the Blacks, who paid no consideration therefor, and who agreed to use the said water, merely at the will of the said Frame and Crawford: that their acquiescence is only to be referred to the use thus granted: that the respondent purchased the land he now holds, upon the information that the said Blacks had no title to the said water, but held it only as tenants at will: that in order to turn the said water into its ancient channel, nothing more is necessary than to remove a dam erected across it, made for the purpose of forcing the water into the new channel; and that dam has now been removed for about three months: that it was in this situation, when the bill was filed in this cause, &c.

An injunction was awarded upon filing the bill. Many depositions were taken, the purport of which was, that the use of the water of Coles' run, was originally applied for, and granted, as alone, without consideration; and its enjoyment afterwards, was never claimed as a right: that this alone continued for upwards of twenty years, when Coalter, who had acquired the land below the point at which the water had been diverted, removed the obstruction, and restored the water to its former channel.

The Chancellor perpetuated the injunction, and Coalter appealed to this Court.

61 *The case of Hunter v. Coalter, was an application made by Hunter to the County Court of Augusta, to establish a mill and dam, for which leave was granted by the said Court. An appeal was taken to the Superior Court of Augusta county, and afterwards removed to the Superior Court of Rockingham.

The writ of ad quod damnum recites, that "whereas Andrew Hunter is desirous of building a water grist-mill and dam, and other water works on Black's saw-mill branch in this county, he owning the lands on both sides of the said branch," &c. The inquiry of the jury states that "no dam will be necessary to take the water out of said creek: that the seat of said mill, &c. will be on said Hunter's land: that the greater part of the head race will also be on his land; but that the upper part thereof, for about seventeen poles from where the water will be taken out of the creek, will be on the land of Samuel Black, for which said Black has agreed to receive from said Hunter the sum of twenty dollars already paid, as appears from said Black's receipt, &c. This sum we consider a sufficient compensation for the damages, &c. We find that no grounds will be overflowed above the mill or head race. We find that there is a tail-race at present now used as such, and which has been so used for about ten or eleven years, and previous to Dr. Thomas S. Coalter's purchase of the land adjoining said Hunter, about seven years. The said tail-race returns the water into the creek from which it is taken. It passes through the land of said Hunter, for about twelve poles from the seat of the mill; after which it leaves said Hunter's, and passes through the said adjoining land of said Thomas S. Coalter, for about eleven poles, into the said creek. The said Hunter proposes to use said tail race, if permitted by the Court. In that case, we find that damage to said Coalter will be twenty-seven dollars, if the said tail race is kept sufficiently open, that water from the wheel will not overflow any ground out of the banks thereof. In case the said tail should not be established by the 62 *Court, said Hunter proposes to cut a new tail race from the mill to his line, which will pass through the lands of said Hunter about twenty-five poles. If said Hunter is permitted by the Court to continue such new tail race, through said adjoining land of said Coalter, into said creek, it will pass through the land of said Coalter about 32 poles, commencing &c. We find that the damage to said Coalter will be $230. But if said Hunter should not be permitted to continue said tail race, as last mentioned, then the water from where his tail race last mentioned would stop at his line, would overflow part of the said adjoining land of said Coalter, and passing near the line between said Hunter and Coalter, would cover some low and some marshy ground belonging to said Coalter, and finally pass into the South river. In that case, the damage to said Coalter would be $1000. We find that the water could not return into said creek, or pass into any other stream, except in the modes above mentioned; unless some other tail race should be cut, from which also, the water would have to pass through said Coalter's land; and we know of no other route, by which the water could be made to pass through said Coalter's land, by which he would receive less damage, than by the routes above mentioned. We further find, that in any of the plans before mentioned, no ground will be overflowed above or below the seat of said mill, and except as before mentioned, and that no mansion house, office, curtilage, garden or orchard, will be overflowed: that navigation or fish passage will not be obstructed; and that the health of the neighbours will not be annoyed, except in the last case, which we think the health of the neighbours may be annoyed."

The County Court decided, "that the said Andrew Hunter have leave to build his grist-mill and dam, and other water works, prayed for agreeably to the inquiry of the jury, heretofore returned."

The defendant Coalter appealed to the Superior Court of Law. That Court reversed the decision of the County 63 *Court, and denied the application of Hunter for leave to erect the mill, &c.

From that decision, Hunter appealed to this Court.

Leigh and Johnson, for Coalter, in both cases.

Attorney General, for Hunter, in both cases.

A great part of the argument turned upon the evidence; and it was contended by the counsel for the appellant in the first case, that the permission originally given to turn the water of Coles' run, was without consideration, and might be revoked at any time; and that the subsequent enjoyment of that privilege, must be referred to the original grant, and could not be considered adversary. Upon this state of facts, they argued that Hunter, and those under whom he claimed, could not acquire a right to the use of the water, by any length of possession. They contended, that the case of Bealy v. Shaw and others, (on which the Chancellor relied,) did not support the position contended for on the other side; but on the other hand, confirms the doctrine, that the possession must be adverse, to give a title to the enjoyment of a water right. This position is proved by Eldridge v. Knight, Cowp. 214. The Mayor of Hull v. Horner, Cowp. 108. Halcroft v. Heale, 1 Bos. & Pull. 400. Campbell v. Wilson, 3 East. 294. 2 Wms. Saunders, 175, note 2.

As to the case of Hunter v. Coalter, Hunter had no right to make the water pass through Coalter's land, and no jury can, under our law, grant such permission.

The Act of Assembly only gives permission to condemn land for an abutment. Besides, the inquisition is irregular, in finding several damages in three several aspects of the case. It ought to have been quashed.

The counsel for Hunter contended, in the case of Coalter v. Hunter, that the latter had the enjoyment of the use of the water in question, for more than 20 years; 64 and "that a jury might presume an adverse possession. The case of Bealy v. Shaw, fully supported the Chancellor's opinion. The pretended loan was indefinite, and amounted to a gift. It was sustained by a sufficient consideration, in the labor and expense which Hunter was induced to bestow, in the erection of various water works, and which would become utterly useless, if the permission were withdrawn. He referred to 1 Phill. Evidence, 128, to shew that a possession of twenty years will be presumed to be adverse. Denn v. Barnard, Cowp. 595, and Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. 153, establish this position. Hunter was a purchaser without any notice of this latent claim of Coalter; in which case he would take the property discharged from it. Sugd. 6. Ib. 512. Newman v. Chapman, 2 Rand. 93. Coalter was prohibited by the law against pretended titles, from buying this contested right.

As to the case of Hunter v. Coalter, it is true that the Act of Assembly does not give a right to condemn land, for a tail race, in express terms; but it is embraced in the enquiry which the jury are required to make, whether the land will be overflowed, &c. Whenever a grant is made, every thing passes under it which is necessary to its enjoyment. 1 Saund. 323, n. 6. Hawton v. Frearson, 8 Term. Rep. 50.

February 1. JUDGE CABELL delivered the opinion of the Court.

In the first of these cases, Hunter claims the right to the diversion and use of the water of Coles' run, and founds his claim on more than twenty years possession by himself, and those under whom he claims.

It is abundantly proved by the evidence in the cause, that the use of the water in Coles' run was originally applied for as a loan; that it was granted without consideration, as a loan; and that its 65 subsequent enjoyment was "never claimed, otherwise than as a loan; and the bill puts it on this ground. The loan continued for more than twenty years, when Coalter, who had become the owner of the land below the point at which the water of the run had been diverted, wanting the water for his own purposes, removed the obstruction which caused the diversion, and restored the water to its ancient channel. Hunter filed his bill to injoin this proceeding, and the Chancellor granted, and afterwards perpetuated the injunction.

The Chancellor founds his opinion on a dictum of Lord Ellenborough, in the case of Bealy v. Shaw, 6 East. 208, that "twenty years exclusive enjoyment of water, in any particular manner, affords a conclusive presumption of right in the party so enjoying it, derived from grant or Act of Parliament." This doctrine of Lord Ellenborough, understood as he intended to apply it, is perfectly correct; but the language which he uses, even in that case, and in the sentences immediately preceding, will shew that he never thought of applying it to a case like this. He says, "the general rule of law, as applied to this subject, is, that independent of any particular enjoyment used to be had by another, every man has a right to have the advantage of a flow of water in his own lands, without diminution or alteration. But, an adverse right may exist, founded on the occupation of another; and though the stream be either diminished in quantity, or even corrupted in quality, as by the means of the exercise of certain trades; yet, if the occupation of the party so taking or using it, have existed, for so long a time as may raise the presumption of a grant, the other party, whose land is below, must take the stream subject to such adverse right;" and then follows the remark on which the Chancellor relies. It is clear, then, that he meant an enjoyment adverse to the right of the other party. He meant an enjoyment that excludes the idea of its being founded and continued in the loan, leave or favor of the other party. It is of the very nature of presumptive proof, 66 *that it yields to that which is positive. When a loan is positively proved, now can we presume a grant?

The law on subjects of this kind is well laid down in Campbell v. Wilcox, 3 East. 294. That was a right of way. The party who had been obstructed in the use, had been in possession of it for more than twenty years. The Judge at Nisi Prius instructed the jury, "that if they were satisfied that the enjoyment of the way was adverse, and that it had continued upwards of twenty years, it was sufficient ground for presuming a grant; that the use of a road, as matter of right, by those who claimed it, and submitted to as matter of right, by the possessor of the land through which it passed, was to be considered as an adverse enjoyment; but, that if the enjoyment had been by leave or favor, or otherwise than under a claim of right, it would repel the presumption of a grant." This instruction was concurred in by the whole Court of King's Bench. If authority were desired, in a case so strongly supported by reason, it would be difficult to imagine authority more apposite.

Upon the merits, therefore, the decree of the Chancellor should be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

But, if the merits were otherwise, the bill should be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

If Hunter had been in the actual enjoyment of the use of the water, and had reasonable ground to apprehend that Coalter intended to deprive him of that enjoyment, an application to the Chancellor to prevent this threatened injury, might have been proper. But, Coalter had actually removed the obstructions in the bed of Coles' run, and had restored the water to its ancient channel, before the application made to the Chancellor. There was, then, no ground for his going into equity. A Court of Law was open to him, and was the proper forum for trying the right to the use of the water, and for giving damages for any obstruction of its enjoyment. On this ground, also, the decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed with costs.

67 *As to the case of Hunter v. Coalter, it is clearly not a case for a mill under the Act of Assembly. The law gives the Court no power to condemn lands for a tail-race; and this point is sufficient to put an end to the case, without deciding the other questions made in the argument.

But, if this were a proper case for a mill, the order giving leave to establish it was rightly reversed for its uncertainty. The jury suggested three plans, in each of which the damages were different, and in one of which the health of the neighbourhood would be injured. The County Court established the mill generally, without confining the applicant to either plan.

The judgment of the Superior Court is, therefore, correct, so far as it reverses that of the County Court, and gives the costs in the said County Court; but is incorrect in not having dismissed the petition. It is, therefore, reversed; and this Court proceeding, &c. dismisses the petition. But, the appellee, being the party substantially prevailing, is to recover all costs.

February, 1826.

Slaves—Importation—Statute—Application of.—The Act of 1778, prohibiting the importation of slaves into Virginia, applies only to those slaves who are brought in with the consent of the owner; and not to those imported by wrong-doers.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law of Montgomery county.

Ruth and her six children, brought an action of assault and battery against Sallust, to recover their freedom. The defendant pleaded that the plaintiffs were 68 slaves; on which *plea issue was joined. On the trial, the defendant filed a demurrer to the plaintiffs' evidence; all the material parts of which are fully stated in the opinion which follows. The Court decided in favor of the plaintiffs; from which judgment, the defendant appealed.

Johnson, for the appellees.

February 6. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

This is an action brought by Ruth and her children against Sallust, claiming their freedom. The ground on which they rest their claim, is, not that they were never rightfully held in slavery, but, that being slaves in the State of North Carolina, they were imported into this State, in violation of the Act of 1778, and are, therefore, under the third section of that Act, free. The defendant in the Court below demurred to the evidence; upon which demurrer, judgment was given for the plaintiffs, and the defendant appealed.

The case, as presented by the evidence, seems to be this: Some years prior to 1780, John May, residing in Anson county, North Carolina, owned a negro slave called Esther. He died, leaving this slave in possession of his wife Susanna May. What was the exact nature of Susanna's interest in this slave, we do not know, except from the evidence of Judith and Elizabeth Lowry, daughters of Susanna, who both say that she belonged to their mother. After the death of John May, Esther had a daughter called Ruth, the plaintiff in this action. Susanna May married Lewis Lowry; who, about the time of Gates's defeat (16th of August, 1780,) carried Esther and Ruth, (then about 5 years old) to South Carolina; with what intention, whether to avoid the enemy, or to sell the slaves, we are not informed. There, they were taken from his possession, and carried 69 *to Virginia. Elizabeth Lowry saw them in possession of Pigg, near Camden, and heard her mother claim and demand them. Pigg refused to give them up. He carried them to Pittsylvania, the county of his residence, (as his wife E. Gray tells us) and held them there as slaves, till his death. He had a bill of sale for them, which his wife, and Corder and wife, say, they saw; but neither of them tells us, by whom it was given. In 1784, Pigg made his will, in which he directs these slaves to be sold, and that the buyer should be told, that there was a dispute in the title, of which he was to take the risque. E. Gray tells us, that this provision was inserted in consequence of a claim set up to the slaves, by Lowry and May, about three years before the date of the will. After the death of Pigg, his widow administered on his estate. She married Adam Gray, who, in 1791 or 1792 (see Goodson and Wall's evidence) took Ruth to the county of Montgomery, and sold her to the defendant Sallust. In 1794, Robert Lowry went before a Justice of the peace to prove his right to Ruth; but the Justice refusing to act, he brought an action of detinue for her. The writ is dated, 19th of August, 1794. At the October rules, 1794, security for costs was required of the plaintiff; and not being given, at the November rules, it was ordered, that the suit be dismissed; which order, at April Court, 1795, was set aside, security entered, and the declaration filed; and at June Court, 1795, (the record shewing no plea pleaded, or issue joined,) a jury was sworn, and returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the slave Ruth, if to be had, if not, the sum of 64l. her value. The day after this trial, the slave was sold to the defendant Sallust. The bill of sale is signed by R. Lowry, John May, and John Lowry. The price was 80l. which, the witness Wales tells us, he saw paid. Lowry was never in possession of Ruth, after the sale of her by Gray to Sallust.

The first question arising on this case, is, did the importation of these slaves into this Commonwealth, by Pigg, 70 *amount to such a violation of the Act of 1778, as entitled the slaves to their freedom?

It was contended, (though, as it seemed to me, not with much confidence,) that by the act of importation, the forfeiture was incurred, and the slaves entitled to their freedom, though Pigg, the importer, should be found to have no property in them. This would be giving to the general words of the statute, a most harsh and revolting construction. The Act is highly penal. It inflicts on the importer 1000l. penalty, for every slave imported; and the loss also of all property in the slave. But, surely, these punishments were intended for the guilty violator of the law only, not for the innocent sufferer by that violation also. It could never be the intention of the Legislature to say, that if a man residing in another State, was so unfortunate as to have his slaves stolen from him, and brought into Virginia, he should incur either the penalty of 1000l. or the forfeiture of his property. Against such a construction, both reason and authority cry aloud. By the 1st chap. of the Statute of Gloucester, 2d Institutes, 283, is among other things enacted, "that the disseisee shall recover damages in a writ of entry founded on a disseisin, against him who is found tenant after the disseisor." Upon this clause, Littleton, sec. 685, puts this case. If a man be disseised of land, and the disseisor enfeof B. C. and D. and livery of seisin is made to B. and C. but D. was not present, nor ever agreed to feoffment, nor ever would take the profits, &c. and after B. and C. die, and the disseisee bringeth his writ in the per against D. he shall shew all the matter in defence, and the demandant shall recover no damages against him; though he comes directly within the letter of the Statute, being found tenant of the freehold. Upon which my Lord Coke observes, "Here it appeareth that Acts of Parliament are to be so construed, as no man that is innocent or free from injury or wrong, be by a literal construction, punished or endamaged."

71 *In South v. Solomon, 6 Munf. 12, a tenant for life of slaves, had brought them into the State, contrary to law; and the question was, whether this would entitle them to their freedom. The Act of 1792, under which this question arose, differs from that of 1778, with respect to the importation of slaves, in nothing but requiring a residence of 12 months to complete the forfeiture. The words of the 2d section are, in every other respect, equally broad with those of the law of 1778. Upon this case, Judge Roane, delivering the opinion of the Court, says: "The Court is of opinion, that the 2d section of the Act of 1792, only extends to cases of slaves brought in by the absolute owner of them, and not to such as are brought in by wrongdoers, or by those having only a limited interest in them. We are not disposed to give a construction to the general words of an Act, which would subject the property of innocent individuals to loss, by the acts of third persons." I conclude, therefore, that if Pigg, the importer, had no property in the slaves Esther and Ruth, his importation of them did not forfeit the right of the true owners, or entitle the slaves to their freedom.

How stands the question of Pigg's title? The record making part of the evidence demurred to, shews a recovery of Ruth from the vendee holding under Pigg by Lowry the North Carolina claimant. The admissibility of this evidence cannot come in question on the demurrer. Besides, it was produced by the plaintiffs themselves, as a part of their case. It was said, however, that it ought not to prejudice them, being res inter alios acta. Let it be remembered, that the plaintiffs, acknowledging that they were slaves before their importation, claim freedom solely through the violation of the law. To ascertain this violation, we are forced upon the enquiry, whose property they were; and it is upon this question of property, that we resort to the record. To establish that point, I think it not only admissible, but decisive evidence, unless the effect of it can be destroyed by the objection taken, that it was altogether *a fraudulent and collusive proceeding to evade the law. Looking into the origin, and tracing the progress of the transaction, I confess that I can see nothing like collusion in this North Carolina claim, but on the contrary, strong marks of an adversary title, seriously prosecuted. In the very commencement of Pigg's possession, we see that Mrs. Lowry claimed and demanded the property of him. We are told, that the claim was renewed about 1781 or 1782. In Pigg's will, dated in 1784, he considers it so serious a claim, that he directs the slaves to be sold with a disclosure of the dispute, and a sale of his right only. When R. Lowry, in 1794, came to Virginia to prosecute his claim, we hear of no communication with Sallust. He went to a justice, and when he refused to act, he employed a gentleman standing high in the profession, (Allen Taylor, if I mistake not,) and the suit was immediately brought. This did not look like collusion. At the October rules, security for costs was demanded, and not being entered, there was an order of dismissal at the November rules. This has very much the appearance of a real adversary proceeding. At the April Court 1795, this order of dismissal was set aside, security given, and the declaration filed. In the June following, the verdict and judgment were rendered. It is true, that we see nothing in the record of a plea or issue joined, and if the question were, whether this omission constituted such error as would reverse the judgment on appeal, I suppose there would not be much difficulty. But, where it is adduced as a proof of collusion, I confess that it has very little weight on my mind. We all know how loosely and carelessly these things are done in the hurry of a law trial; and the verdict of the jury proves, that they must in fact have been sworn upon the very point in issue between the parties; for they find for the plaintiff the slave in the declaration, if to be had, if not 64l. her value. The sale too, of the woman, has every appearance of a real transaction. The price was a full one, for a woman, at that day; 16l. more than the 73 *jury valued her at; and Walls, the witness states, that he saw the money paid. I cannot see any thing of collusion in all this.

It is objected, that Lowry himself said he was only one of the heirs who claimed the negro. The answers to this, seem to be, 1st, that the verdict (even if this hearsay of Lowry be received,) overweighs it; 2d, that whether the title be in Lowry alone, or in him jointly with others, it is equally decisive to shew, that Pigg had no title. Nor does the fact that the bill of sale was signed by John May, and John Lowry, as well as Robert, prove any thing as to property, in my mind. We know that a man often requires surety in such cases. Sallust might well have learned caution; for, this was the second time he was paying for the slave, in the course of three years. He might therefore have said to Robert, "you live out of the State; your right may be hereafter questioned; you must therefore give me surety;" and the other two may have signed the bill of sale with this view. If it be said that this is conjecture merely, I answer, that the transaction is one of that dubious character, upon which nothing but conjecture can be founded, and this seems quite as plausible as any other.

But it is objected, that this sale of the slave in Virginia, by Robert Lowry, connects him with the original importation: that it is a sanction of that importation; and subjects him to the forfeiture denounced by the Statute; and that, to permit such a proceeding, would open an easy door to the evasion of the law. I answer, that whenever a case is brought before us, shewing probable grounds to suspect such evasion, I shall be as prompt as any one to enforce the Statute. But we must not forget, that it is a penal law, and should be taken strictly. It seems clear from the whole context, that the prohibition to sell, extends to those cases only, where the original importation was in violation of the law, and forfeited the property. Here I have shewn (I think,) that it was not so; and when we consider, that between 74 the importation and the sale, there was a lapse of 15 years, and that the parties to the different transactions were wholly changed; it seems difficult so to connect them, as to make them one. A child of five years old, is brought from Carolina, without the consent of her owner. She grows up; passes through several hands; at length, her owner comes after her, and recovers her by suit. She has been 15 years an inhabitant of the State. This is her home; here are her connexions; and, instead of breaking up these connexions and carrying her to a strange land, her master sells her here. This certainly was no sin against humanity. It does not come within the letter of the law; nor do I think it opens such a door to the evasion of the Statute, as should induce us to stretch this penal law, so far as to take it in.

The other Judges concurred, and the judgment was reversed.

Equity Jurisdiction—Settlement of Title or Bounds to Land.—A Court of Equity has no jurisdiction to settle the title or bounds of land between adverse

Equity Jurisdiction—Settlement of Title or Bounds of Land.—A court of equity is not the proper tribunal to try legal titles, and a bill bringing before this court the dry legal title to lands is demurrable. Overseers of Poor v. Hart, 8 Leigh 8, citing principal case as authority. And in Davis v. Settle, 48 W. Va. 37, 36 S. E. Rep. 564, it is said: "Equity will not try conflicting titles to land, unless it is incidental in administering relief, under some known head of equity jurisdiction; and, to bring a suit under the claimants, unless the plaintiff has an equity against the defendant claiming adversely to him. An equity against other persons will not give such jurisdiction.

Chancery Practice—Partition—Principles Governing—Title to Land.—The power of a Court of Equity to decree partition, is governed by the same principles which govern cases of partition at law. It may decide on the rights of the parties to participate in the division, but not on the simple question of title to the land.

Same—Bill—When Multifarious.—A bill in equity, which includes many defendants who have dis-known head of jurisdiction to remove cloud from title, the plaintiff must be in possession, for, if not in possession, he may sue at law in ejectment. That equity will not settle title or bounds of land between adverse claimants is settled by a multitude of cases. Steed v. Baker, 13 Gratt. 380; Stuart v. Coalter, 4 Rand. 74; Lange v. Jones, 5 Leigh 192; Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 69; Cresap v. Kemble, 26 W. Va. 608. And the plaintiff must have an equity against the adverse claimant, no one else will do; an equity against other persons will not give jurisdiction. Davis v. Settle, 48 W. Va. 36, 36 S. E. Rep. 566. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Ambler v. Warwick, 1 Leigh 268; Lange v. Jones, 5 Leigh 192, 194, 195, and foot-note (in this case, the first headnote of the principal case is reaffirmed, and JUDGE CARR says that the case of Stuart v. Coalter was on a very much considered, and very correctly decided; and that he was entirely opposed to a departure from the principles settled therein; Steed v. Baker, 13 Gratt. 380; Sulphur Mines Co. v. Boswell, 94 Va. 485, 27 S. E. Rep. 24 (in this case, it was said that the principle enunciated in the principal case and laid down in its first headnote has been steadfastly adhered to); Collins v. Sutton, 94 Va. 128, 26 S. E. Rep. 415; Johnston v. Jarrett, 14 W. Va. 236; Hudson v. Putney, 14 W. Va. 573; Hitchcox v. Morrison, 47 W. Va. 206, 34 S. E. Rep. 966. And, it is no ground to come into equity to settle a land title, that there is another party claiming a legal title who holds back and will not sue. Bush v. Martins, 7 Leigh 324.

The principal case is distinguished in Ambler v. Warwick, 1 Leigh 211; Steed v. Baker, 13 Gratt. 388. See further, monographic note on "Jurisdiction" appended to Phippen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457.

Chancery Practice—Want of Jurisdiction—Effect.—In Miller v. Miller, 25 W. Va. 508, it is said: "It is clearly law, that if a court of equity has no jurisdiction, and this is apparent on the face of the bill, the court must dismiss the bill at the hearing (unless from the record it may appear probable, that a case, in which a court of equity would have jurisdiction could be stated by a legitimate amendment of the bill, when it should be allowed). If the court fails to dismiss the bill, the appellate court must dismiss it; for no other decree can be rendered, when it is apparent that the court had no jurisdiction of the case, and no legitimate amendment of the bill could give it jurisdiction. (Stuart v. Coalter, JUDGE CARR's opinion, 4 Rand. 78; Coleman v. Anderson, 29 Gratt. 480; JUDGE ANDERSON's opinion, p. 480; Thompson v. Railroad Companies, JUSTICE DANIEL's opinion, 6 Wall. p. 187.)" To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Hudson v. Kline, 9 Gratt. 386.

See principal case quoted from in Boston Blower Co. v. Carman Lumber Co., 94 Va. 100, 26 S. E. Rep. 390.

Chancery Jurisdiction—Full Relief.—There is no question better settled than where a court of chancery has jurisdiction for one purpose, it will not send the parties back to a court of law, but will retain the jurisdiction for all purposes and do complete justice between the parties. Western, etc., M. Co. v. Virginia Cannel Coal Co., 10 W. Va. 287, citing principal case.

See further, on this subject, monographic note on "Jurisdiction" appended to Phippen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457.

Chancery Practice—Partition—Question of Title.—See on this subject, foot-note to Currin v. Spraul, 10 Gratt. 145, where it is shown that, by statute, the rule laid down in the principal case—that, in order to entitle a plaintiff to equitable relief in respect to partition, he must show a clear legal title—has been changed, so that a court of equity may take cognizance of all questions of law affecting the legal title to land, that may arise in the partition proceedings. See principal case cited on this subject in Currin v. Spraul, 10 Gratt. 147; Ransom v. High, 37 W. Va. 841, 17 S. E. Rep. 414; Cecil v. Clark, 44 W. Va. 664, 30 S. E. Rep. 217.

Ejectment—Against Whom It May Be Brought.—An ejectment may be brought against several persons in possession of any part of the tract of land claimed by the lessor of the plaintiff.

This was an appeal from the Staunton Chancery Court, where Thomas S. Coalter, filed his bill against Robert Stuart, Reuben Withers, John Coalter, Francis 75 Adair, *William Adair, James Adair, and John Adair. The case stated is briefly as follows: The land in question was owned by the heirs of John Switzer, who sold it to John Coalter, the brother of the complainant. A conveyance was made by some of the heirs to John Coalter, but the others had never parted with the legal estate. The bill, however, states, that all the heirs either have made, or are ready to make, a conveyance at any time. It also alleges, that although the contract was made solely in the name of the said John Coalter, and the title papers taken in his name, yet the purchase was for the benefit of the complainant, as well as the said John: that the complainant has been put into peaceable possession of his undivided part of the said land, his right to which is not contested by his brother; that he has since discovered that a part of the boundary is disputed by some of the coterminous tenant, viz: Stuart, Withers, and the representatives of Adair: that the complainant wishes to obtain a partition of the said land with his brother; but this cannot be effected, in consequence of the uncertainty produced by this contest of the boundary: that he also wishes to have the question of boundary settled, but he has not the legal estate, by which he could go into a Court of a Law, and if he had, it would require a multiplicity of suits to settle all the questions. He therefore prays, that the true boundary may be settled and adjusted; that he may be quieted in his possession within that true boundary; and that a partition may be made, between the complainant and his brother.

The representatives of Adair answered, contending that their boundary line was the true one; and John Coalter acknowledged that the contract, though made in his name, was principally for the benefit Whitehurst, 83 Va. 48, 1 S. E. Rep. 410, citing principal case.

The court will not permit a plaintiff to demand by one bill several matters of different natures against several defendants, for this would tend to load each defendant with an unnecessary burden of costs, by swelling the pleadings with the statement of the several claims of the other defendants with which he had no connection. A defendant may therefore, in such case, demur. Crickard v. Crouch, 41 W. Va. 510, 23 S. E. Rep. 729, quoting with approval from the principal case.

A bill in equity, which includes different defendants who have distinct interests, is multifarious. Linn v. Patton, 10 W. Va. 199, citing the principal case as its authority.

On the subject of multifariousness, the principal case is also referred to in Washington City Savings Bank v. Thornton, 83 Va. 166, 2 S. E. Rep. 193; Smith v. Zumbro, 41 W. Va. 681, 24 S. E. Rep. 656.

See further, monographic note on "Multifariousness (In Equity)" appended to Sheldon v. Armistead, 7 Gratt. 264.

Ejectment—Against Whom It May Be Brought.—The plaintiff may sue in one ejectment all persons in possession of any part of the land he claims. Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 138, citing the principal case as so holding.

See further, monographic note on "Ejectment" appended to Tapscott v. Cobbs, 11 Gratt. 172.

of Thomas S. Coalter; and declared his willingness to make partition with the complainant.

The Chancellor decided in favor of the complainant, and the defendants appealed to this Court.

76 *Wickham, for the appellants, made four points:

1. The bill is nothing more than an ejectment brought in a Court of Chancery. It is not competent for a person having an equitable title, to sue in equity one who holds an adversary title, asserting the legal title in his trustee.

2. The appellee has not only brought one ejectment in equity, but he has brought several ejectments in one suit, for distinct tracts of land, held by distinct titles.

3. If such a suit could be maintained, it must be on averment and proof, that the trustee refused to bring an ejectment, in his own name. But here, there is no such averment or proof. The trustee never objected to assert his legal title.

4. The Switzers are not before the Court. They claim a part of the legal title, and ought to be made parties.

Leigh and Johnson, for the appellee.

The jurisdiction may be sustained on two grounds:

1. The plaintiff comes with an equitable title, which could not be asserted in a Court of Law. The assignee of a bond could bring a suit in equity before our Statute; yet, he might have called on the legal owner to bring a suit against the obligor. A cestui que trust may injoin an execution against his trustee, in a suit brought by a third person; and he is not required to use the name of the trustee.

The object in coming into this Court, was, to ascertain what the subject was to be divided. Tenants in common have an original right to go into a Court of Equity for partition.

2. On the ground of a bill of peace, the appellee had a right to resort to equity. Mitt. 127. Lord Tenham v. Herbert, 2 Atk. 484. Mayor of York v. Pilkington & al. 1 Atk. 282.

It is objected, that Switzer's heirs ought to have been parties. If this objection 77 *would be, that the cause must be sent back, to have them made parties. But it was not necessary. They have sold their interest, and have nothing to claim.

February 7. The Judges delivered their opinions.*

JUDGE CARR.

The bill states, that John Switzer died intestate, seised and possessed of a tract of land within the Beverley manor, in the county of Augusta: that the heirs of said Switzer entered upon the said land, and remained in possession thereof, until a few years since, when they sold it to a certain John Coalter, a brother of the plaintiff's: that some of the heirs made a deed to the said John, (which is exhibited,) and the others have either executed deeds, or are ready to do so at any time: that although the contract was made with the heirs by the said John, and the conveyances taken to him, the purchase was for the benefit of the plaintiff, as well as the said John: that accordingly, the plaintiff has been put into possession of his undivided part of the said land, his right to which is not disputed by his brother: that since the purchase, the plaintiff has had the land surveyed, a plat of which is exhibited: that this plat, as he believes, correctly describes the boundaries of the land; but he discovers, that a part of the boundary is controverted by some of the coterminous tenants, to wit: Robert Stuart, Reuben Withers, and the heirs and devisees of Neil Adair: that the plaintiff is desirous of making partition with his brother, but cannot, because of the uncertainty caused by this dispute about the boundary: that he is anxious also, to have the question of boundary settled, but not having the legal title, cannot go into a Court of Law; and if he could, it would require a multiplicity of actions. He therefore prays, that his brother John, 78 and the coterminous *tenants, may be made defendants: that the true boundary of the land may be settled: that the defendants be compelled to deliver to him any land within the boundary, of which they may be found in possession; and that partition be decreed between himself and his brother.

The defendant John Coalter answers, stating that his interest in the land is one seventh part: that he wishes a partition: is ready to convey, &c.

The coterminous tenants answer, shewing various objections to the plat, and pretensions of the plaintiff; deducing their titles, which seem entirely distinct, and unconnected with each other; and each one contending for his lines, as heretofore established and understood.

Evidence was taken, surveys had; and the Chancellor, on hearing, established certain lines; from which decree, the appeal is taken.

It was contended in the argument, that this was a case, of which equity had no jurisdiction. This question will of course be considered first, as jurisdiction precedes discretion; and before we undertake to decide what ought to be done in a cause, we should always ascertain whether we can rightfully do any thing. I will not quote authorities to shew, that where a general demurrer would hold to a bill, the Court, though the defendant answers, will not grant relief upon the hearing of the cause. The doctrine is too well settled. To deny it, would be to say, that however unfit the cause for equity, the defendant, by failing to demur, could oblige the Court to entertain jurisdiction. Nor can I conceive, that in deciding the question of jurisdiction, we should be influenced at all by the case made by the evidence. It is the province of the bill to state the case. It is from this we must judge. If the evidence fit the case stated in the bill, it could of course have no influence. If it made a different case, so far from giving jurisdiction where the bill did not, it would prevent a decree, where the bill was perfect; for the allegation and the proof must "jump together."

79 *The bill places the jurisdiction on three grounds: 1. That the plaintiff wants partition, and cannot have it without the aid of equity. 2. That there is a trust between the plaintiff and his brother, who has the legal estate; which the plaintiff not having, cannot try the question of boundary, at law. 3. That if he could, there must be a multiplicity of suits, to avoid which, equity takes jurisdiction.

I will first shew, from authority, the general rule, that equity cannot hold plea of land titles; and then enquire, whether the plaintiff's case falls within, or is taken out of, that rule.

In Welby, appellant, v. The Duke of Rutland, respondent, 6 Bro. Parl. Cas. 575, the bill charged, that the plaintiff, and those under whom he claimed, had been in possession of the manor of Denton, for more than one hundred years: that the defendant had set up a claim to it, and exercised several acts of ownership, which might hereafter bring a cloud upon the plaintiff's estate, and prevent his selling it. The bill therefore prayed, that the defendant might set forth his claim, and produce his title papers: that the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses might be perpetuated, and proper issues directed to try the defendant's claim to the manor, &c. The defendant pleaded and answered. The case was heard and dismissed by Lord Chancellor Apsley; and on appeal to Parliament, the appeal was dismissed, and the decree affirmed. In the discussion of the case, the law on the subject was laid down in the clearest and strongest manner. It was said, "the general practice of Courts of Equity, in not entertaining suits for establishing legal titles, before they have been tried at law, is founded upon clear reasons; and the departing from that practice, then there is no reason for so doing, would be subversive of the legal and constitutional distinctions, between the different jurisdictions of Courts of Law and Equity; and though the admission of a party in a suit, is conclusive as to matters of fact, or may deprive him of the benefit of a privilege, which, if insisted on, would 80 exempt him from *the jurisdiction of the Court; yet, no admission of parties can change the law, or give jurisdiction to a Court, of a cause, of which it hath no jurisdiction. Agreeably hereto, the established and universal practice of Courts of Equity is to dismiss the plaintiff's bill, if it appears to be grounded on a title merely legal, and not cognizable by them; notwithstanding the defendant hath answered the bill, and insisted on matter of title; and it can make no difference, whether the legal title be insisted on by the answer, or by the plea: that nothing hath a greater tendency to introduce uncertainty in the law, than the giving way to new exceptions to general, settled and known rules of practice in Courts of Justice; and therefore, no such exceptions ought to be allowed, but upon the clearest grounds. The general known practice of Courts of Equity has been to dismiss bills brought like the present, for establishing a legal title, and for a perpetual injunction, before such title has been tried and determined at law. The exceptions to this general rule of practice are but very few, well known, and founded on strong and clear reasons; but the appellant's case fell not within any of these exceptions, and consequently ought to be governed by the general rule. The bill was entirely new, and without a precedent." To shew that this, though the argument of counsel, is considered as the true doctrine on this subject, Maddock, vol. 1, p. 135, lays down the rule precisely as it is here, and refers to this case alone, in support of his position.

Chancellor Kent, also, in Abbott v. Allen, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 519, says: "This Court may, perhaps, try title to land, when it arises incidentally; but it is understood not to be within its province, when the case depends on a simple legal title, and is brought up directly by the bill. The power is only to be exercised in difficult and complicated cases, affording peculiar grounds for equitable interference. This was the doctrine laid down by the respondent's counsel, in the case of Welby v. Rutland, 6 Bro. Parl. Cas. 575; and it appears to

81 have been sanctioned by the "Court."

The case here referred to, is the one from which I have extracted the above remarks. The Chancellor also refers to Wightwick's Reports, 184, where the same doctrine (he says) is discussed at large, and emphatically laid down by Baron Wood, and not denied by the other Barons. The cases above cited acknowledge that there are a few exceptions to the general rule. They will be found of the class described by Mitford, 127. He says: "Where one general legal right is claimed, against several distinct persons, a bill may be brought to establish the right. 2 Atk. 484. Thus, where a right of fishery as claimed by a corporation, throughout the course of a considerable river, and was opposed by the Lords of Manors, owners of land adjoining, a bill was entertained to establish the right, against the several opponents, and a demurrer was overruled." 1 Atk. 282. But, even where the bill is to try one general right against many claimants, and so to save a multiplicity of actions, it is generally required that the plaintiff shall have established his title at law, before he comes into equity; and Mitford adds, if he has not done so, and the right he claims has not the sanction of long possession, and he has any means of trying the matter at law, a demurrer will hold. 2 Atk. 391. In 1 Atk. 284, Mayor of York v. Pilkington, &c. Lord Hardwicke says: "It is a general rule that a man shall not come into a Court of Equity, to establish a legal right, unless he has tried his title at law, if he can; but this is not so general an objection as always to prevail;" and he refers to two cases in Precedents in Chancery. I find them to be thus: Bush v. Western, Prec. in Chan. 530. The plaintiff had been in possession of a water course, upwards of 60 years. Defendant disturbed him in the use of the water. He brought his bill to be quieted in his possession. Objected, that his remedy was purely legal; but the Court over-ruled the objection, considering, I presume, that a possession of upwards of 60 years was equal to a decision of law in his favour; and therefore, the bill to quiet his possession was proper, as otherwise

82 *the plaintiff would have had to bring continual actions of trespass for every disturbance. The other case is Dorset v. Girdler, Pre. in Chan. 531. Bill to examine witnesses in perpetuum rei memoriam, to establish his sole right of fishery. Demurrer, for that plaintiff had not verified his title at law. But the demurrer was over-ruled, and this difference taken by the Court, that "if one is out of possession, having only a right to fishery, &c. he who brings such bill ought never to be allowed to do so, but a demurrer to it will be good, because he may and ought, first to enter his action and establish his title at law, &c. for the party having a remedy at law, the other side ought not to be deprived of the opportunity of confronting the witnesses, and examining them publicly, which has always been found the most effectual method of discovering the truth. But, if a man is in actual possession, and is only threatened with disturbance by another who pretends a right, he has no other way in the world to perpetuate the testimony of his witnesses, but by such a bill as this. 2 Atk. 483, Lord Tenham v. Herbert. Bill to establish a right to an oyster fishery, and to be quieted in the possession of it, against defendant, who claims the piece of ground where the fishery is. Demurrer, as it is a matter properly triable at law. Lord Chancellor: "Undoubtedly there are some cases, where a man may come, by a bill of this kind, into this Court first; and there are others, where he ought first to establish his right at law. Where a man sets up a general exclusive right, and the persons who controvert it with him, are very numerous, and he cannot, by one or two actions at law, quiet that right, he may come into this Court first; which is called a bill of peace, and this Court will direct an issue to try the right. But, where the question about a right of fishery is only between two Lords of Manors, neither can come into this Court, till the right is first tried at law. This is in the nature of an ejectment bill," &c. Renison v. Ashley, 2 Ves. jun. 459. Bill for discovery and delivery of a settlement, under which plaintiff claimed, and other title deeds, 83 *and possession of the estate. Demurrer to all the relief, and all the discovery, except of the settlement, for want of equity, and answer admitting the settlement, and offering to produce it. Lord Chancellor: "This is a pure ejectment bill, as to the title to the land. The only allegation calling for an answer, is as to this deed. The Court will direct it to be produced at the trial, but no more. The plaintiffs have no right to a discovery of the pedigree, unless they lay a foundation for it; otherwise, no man would bring an ejectment, which had any complication in it. The cases cited for the bill go no further than this; that the loss of the instrument with the affidavit, entitles the plaintiff to a decree quoad the matter; the loss of a bond gives a right to a decree for the money, and so of a deed. I agree, no general demurrer could be put into such a bill.

The jurisdiction is transferred to a certain extent. But what is the equity here? Is it possible for me to decree, that the deed shall be delivered up? There is no allegation of infancy, a term outstanding, or that possession was gained by undue means. The plaintiffs state, that under colour of a legal title, the defendant entered as heir, which title they deny. The only relief I can give, is to enable them to make out their title at law." He adds: "This is another of the fishing bills, which I do not like to see in this Court." 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 572, Weller v. Smeaton. Bill to be quieted in the possession of a mill, and that defendants may pull down works above it, and be restrained from erecting others. Demurrer, because plaintiff had not established his right at law. Allowed.

I will refer to but one case more, Speer v. Crawter, 2 Meriv. 210. It is important in its bearing on this subject, both as containing the strong opinion of that able and learned Judge, Sir W. Grant, and as giving the best account of a sort of jurisdiction, exercised by equity for a while, respecting the boundaries of land; which he considers as originating in consent, which was disapproved of by their greatest Chancellors, and soon abandoned. He cites the 84 "case of Wake v. Conyers, 2 Cox. 36, where Lord Northington refused this jurisdiction, which he said had been "assumed of late;" and two cases, in which Lord Thurlow had done the same. He then adds: "In the same case of Wake v. Conyers, Lord Northington says, that in his apprehension, this Court has simply no jurisdiction to settle the boundaries even of land, unless some equity is superinduced by act of the parties. I concur (he says) in that opinion, and think that the circumstances of a conclusion of boundaries furnishes, per se, no ground for the interposition of the Court."

Having shewn that this Court has no jurisdiction to interpose in questions of real property, unless some equity be superinduced by act of the parties, let us see whether any such foundation is furnished by this case.

The plaintiff wants a partition; but, in a suit in equity for partition, the legal title of the parties is never meddled with by the Court. The jurisdiction is not given by Statute, but assumed from the extreme difficulty and inconvenience of proceeding at law. In exercising this jurisdiction, equity has considered itself bound by the principles, which govern cases of partition at law; and these being only between joint-tenants and tenants in common, the question of title cannot well arise. The individual rights of the parties to participate in the division, or to call for it, may come up; but not the simple question of conflicting title to the tract of land. Accordingly, it is established by the cases, that a plaintiff who comes into equity for partition, must shew a clear legal title. If there be doubt about that, he will not be aided. See Wiseley v. Findlay, 3 Rand. 361, where this subject was examined. This case, then, where the bill prays a settlement of boundary, and that the defendants be decreed to deliver to the plaintiff any land of his they may be in possession of, cannot be a proper case for partition in equity.

But there is another objection. The equity, as to partition, does not reach, or affect in the slightest degree, the 85 "coterminous tenants. They are wholly unconnected with it. They have done no act superinducing equity, and cannot, by the acts of others, be drawn away from the proper tribunal for deciding legal titles. This applies also to the ground relied on, that as between the plaintiff and his brother, or the heirs of Switzer, there is a trust which gives equity jurisdiction. The coterminous tenants, holding distinct tracts of land, by distinct and unconnected titles, have nothing to do with this trust or equity. If the brother refuses to permit the plaintiff to use the legal title, for settling the boundaries at law; or the Switzers refuse to convey; a bill against them for these purposes, would receive proper aid. But, it is no where suggested that John Coalter had refused to proceed at law, or to suffer the plaintiff to use his name; and as to the Switzers, they are no parties, and it is expressly stated, that they have either all conveyed, or are ready, at any time, to convey.

It is said, that this proceeding will save multiplicity of suits at law, and therefore equity should interfere. The first answer to this is, that it would not save multiplicity of suits; for, John Coalter might have sued, in one ejectment, all persons in possession of any part of the tract he claimed; Coleman v. Dick & al. 1 Wash. 239; but secondly, this is not one of those cases, where equity does interfere to prevent multiplicity of actions. That interference is given only in cases, where one general right is invaded, as a right to a sole fishery of a river, &c. Mittf. 147. But here the rights of the parties were separate, distinct and unconnected; and the bill was for that reason also demurrable. In Mittf. 146, it is said, "The Court will not permit a plaintiff to demand by one bill, several matters of different natures, against several defendants; for, this would tend to load each defendant with an unnecessary burthen of costs, by swelling the pleadings with the state of the several claims of the other defendants, with which he had no connexion. A defendant may, therefore, in such case, demur." See also, 2 Mod. 234. Harrison & Clure v. Hogg, 2 Ves. jun. 323.

86 "I think the decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed; perhaps without prejudice to the legal rights of the plaintiff, or rather of his trustee.

JUDGE GREEN.

John Coalter having purchased a tract of land from the heirs of Switzer, two of whom had conveyed to him, and the other five of whom had not conveyed, Thomas S. Coalter filed his bill against John Coalter, Robert Stuart, Reuben Withers, and the heirs of Adair, alleging, that although the purchase was made by John Coalter, it was made for his benefit as well as for John's. He does not state what proportion belonged to each; but states, that he has been put into the peaceable possession of his undivided part, John not contesting his right:

that he is desirous of having a partition with his brother; but that having no legal title, he cannot proceed at law, for that purpose; and that the other defendants being coterminous tenants of other lands, dispute the boundaries, which prevents a partition; and that these boundaries cannot be settled at law, without a multiplicity of suits. He therefore prays, that the defendants, the coterminous tenants, may state in what points they dispute the boundaries: that the Court may settle and adjust the true boundary; and that he may be quieted in possession accordingly, and the defendants decreed to deliver to him possession of any land within the true boundary, which they may have taken possession of; and that partition between him and his brother may be decreed. It is not alleged, that John refuses to make partition; and the heirs of Switzer, who have not conveyed, are not made parties. It appears also, that the coterminous tenants held severally, and do not claim under the same title.

The question is, whether a Court of Equity has jurisdiction to give the relief prayed for. I think not. It has always been held as a general rule, that equity cannot hold pleas of land; 20 H. 6, 32, 87 b; and in the case of the Earl *of Worcester v. Sir Moyle Fynch, 2 And. 163, pl. 89, and 4 Inst. 85, it was held by all the Judges of England, that if the question whether there was such a Manor as A. in deed or reputation, at such a time; or whether lands in B. were at that time parcel of the Manor or not; or if a disseisin be alleged to be committed of Black-acre, at the time of a bargain and sale made to the complainant thereof; or if A. conveys land to B. and A. has only a matter of equity to be relieved by, or only a right at the time; or when any title of freehold, or other matter determinable by the common law, comes incidentally in question in Chancery, that in all these cases, the Court of Equity has no jurisdiction; and such matters should be tried at common law, and not in Chancery; that the party may be relieved by writ of error, attain, or action of a higher nature; and, that if the plaintiff prays discovery from the defendant, without which he cannot sue at common law, and the defendant makes title to the land, the plaintiff cannot proceed for the land in Chancery; for otherwise, by such a surmise, inheritance, freeholds, and matters determinable at common law, should be determined in Chancery. To this general rule, there is an exception, where the plaintiff has an equity against the defendant himself; as, if a tenant holds adjoining lands of his own, and fraudulently or carelessly, contrary to his duty to preserve the rights of his landlord, confounds or destroys the evidence of the boundaries. There the landlord, who cannot sue at law, during the Term, or who could not, after the Term, establish his boundary at law, may sue the tenant in equity; not for the purpose of establishing his boundary, but for having a decree that the tenant shall transfer to him so much of his land as will make up the original quantity, belonging to the landlord. In such case, if the actual boundary was proved by the tenant, the suit would fail; and in this way the question of boundary may properly be discussed, and virtually settled in Chancery.

88 *It appears that for a short time, some sort of jurisdiction was assumed by the Court of Chancery, in respect to boundaries. The cases are collected in 4 Vin. Abr. 422, 423. But, the jurisdiction which originally arose from consent by analogy to common law writs, was soon repudiated. This subject was examined by the Master of the Rolls in Speer v. Crawter, 2 Meriv. 410, in which all the former cases were cited. In this case, the Master of the Rolls concurring with the opinions of Lord Northington and Lord Thurlow, affirms that there is no jurisdiction, unless some equity be raised by the acts of the parties; and observes, that to the exercise of the jurisdiction upon such equitable grounds, no objection has ever been made. "But, on what principle can a Court of Equity interfere between two independent proprietors, and force one of them to have his rights tried and determined in any other than the legal mode, in which questions of property are to be decided?"

There is in this case no shadow of equity between the plaintiff and the defendants, who claim title to the adjoining lands; and any equity between him and the holders of the legal title, the Switzers, who have not conveyed, and John Coalter, cannot affect them, unless there was a fraudulent combination between them and the holders of the adjoining land, to injure the plaintiff, which is not suggested; and even in that case, they could not be called upon in equity to ascertain the boundaries. The only relief the plaintiff could have, would be, to aid the plaintiff so far as to compel the owners of the legal title, to permit him to sue at law in their names. John Coalter, in whom is the legal title to an undivided two-sevenths of the land, might sue at law, and establish the boundary of the entire tract of land, and he is not stated to be unwilling to sue. Indeed, he might have sued all who claimed any part of the land, in one ejectment, if they were in possession of the controverted land; so that a resort to equity does not prevent multiplicity of suits.

89 *The observation that the plaintiff has no equity against the adversary claimants of the land, is an answer to all the cases cited by the appellee's counsel, in which the jurisdiction is founded on the equitable nature of the plaintiff's title. In the case of an assignee of a bond, there is, in equity, a privity of contract between him and the debtor. In the case of property seized under execution, which is conveyed in trust for another, the relief given to the cestui que trust, is upon the equity of preserving the specific property to the true owner, when it is of such a nature as not to be compensated in damages; an equity, which exists in favor of the legal, as well as equitable owner. The property might be eloiigned, and an action of detinue might not restore the specific property; but land cannot be eloiigned. In the case of a tract of land conveyed to be sold for payment of debts, and the property claimed in whole or in part, by another, the court may, in proper cases, interfere, at the instance of the debtor, to prevent a sale, until the question of title is determined; because a sale might do him irreparable injury. But, in that case, the title of the adverse claimant could not be settled in equity, or in that suit.

Nor can the equitable jurisdiction, to decree partition, justify an investigation of the legal title of one, who claims adversely against all who claim partition. Where several claim to be entitled to partition, the Court may enquire, as between them, which of them are entitled to come into the partition; and thus incidentally determine the legal title as between them. But, even in that case, if the legal title of one party is disputed by the others, as if they allege the deed, under which he claims, to be forged, the bill for partition will not be entertained, and the parties will be left to litigate the title at law. This subject was examined in the late case of Wiseley v. Findlay, 3 Rand. 361. In this case, there does not appear to have been an adversary possession; and the partition might have been made without involving the coterminous tenants in the suit.

90 *This seems to be a bill quia timet, not justified by the principles, upon which such bills are allowed. If this jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery could be sustained, all cases of title and boundary of lands, might be transferred to it, contrary to the Bill of Rights, which declares, that "in controversies in respect to property, the ancient trial by jury is preferable to any other, and ought to be held sacred."

There is another objection to this bill. It is multifarious. It calls upon Stuart, Adair and Reuben Withers, claiming severally different parts of the land claimed by the plaintiff, to defend one suit. They claim nothing in common; neither is at all interested in the defence to be made by the other; and yet, if the plaintiff succeeded against one only, he would be liable to pay the costs of the plaintiff, expended in the prosecution of his claims against the others. It is not alleged, that the whole controversy between all the parties, depends upon the establishment of one line. That is not the fact; and if it were, the possession of one of the defendants might give him a right, which the other had not.

I think the decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

JUDGE COALTER.

As to the question of jurisdiction, I understand it to be admitted, that as no demurrer was filed to the bill on that ground, we are not confined to the statements in the bill alone, in considering that question; but if the proofs or documents in the cause, (all pertinent to the issue, as in this case,) shew a ground of jurisdiction, which, had it been relied on in the bill, would have supported that jurisdiction on demurrer, it must be looked to and considered, in the same manner as if stated in the bill. If this be correct, it will be found, that the following circumstances, having, as it seems to me, a strong bearing on this point, *are to be found in the cause, in addition to the grounds alleged in the bill.

It appears from the survey returned by order of Court, in the cause, that almost the whole controversy, as it respects boundary, which exists between the appellee and the Adairs, and also between him and Stuart, depends on the establishment of the Beverley Manor lines; as both parties claim to hold by those lines.

The Beverley Manor, is a large tract, comprehending a considerable portion of Augusta county. It was sold off in parcels to settlers. Amongst others, one Patton obtained a deed for a considerable tract, binding on some of the southern limits of the Manor, and part of which is now claimed by the appellee. Stuart, an ancestor of the appellants of that name, obtained another tract adjoining Patton, and binding also on the southern boundary of the Manor. After this, Stuart obtained a grant from the Crown for lands on the south of the Manor, and calling to be bounded by the Manor line, and joining, not only his own lands within the Manor, but those also of Patton. So too, some one else, under whom the Adairs claim, obtained, in like manner, a grant from the Crown adjoining Stuart's grant aforesaid, and calling for the Manor lines, to wit: a portion of that line called for by Stuart's grant, and two other of the Manor lines lying east of it. One of the Manor lines, then, is common to both of these grants, and as it cannot exist in two places, if it is rightly determined to exist in one place in regard to Stuart, it must exist in the same place, as to the Adairs. The establishment of this line, too, must fix one of the corners of the next line eastward, where the Adairs alone are interested; and so, vice versa, the establishment of that line must fix one of the corners of that which bounds Stuart's land. Thus, if E. F. is established as the true Manor line as to the Adairs, this fixes F. as the corner of the line, by which Stuart is to be bounded, and of course, his pretensions must be negatived; but in establishing this line, 92 all *the evidence and circumstances in relation to the lines A. B., B. C., C. D. and D. E. are to be weighed, and are equally important to the Adairs and Stuart. So if G. F. is established as the true Manor line in regard to Stuart, and in a contest with him, it fixes F. as a corner of the line of the Adairs, and of course, disaffirming their pretensions. But, whether this is the true line or not, depends not only on the evidence as it regards the lines A. B. &c. as aforesaid, but on the evidence concerning the lines G. H., I. K., J. L., L. M. and indeed all the other lines laid down in the plat, in relation to this part of the boundary. It is an unquestioned fact, then, as to this matter, that although Stuart and the Adairs claim distinct tracts by distinct titles, the question of boundary, so far as the Manor lines are concerned, depends precisely on the same evidence in relation to every portion of the plat and controversy as to each. The case cannot be correctly decided differently as to these parties; for, if decided differently, one or the other of those decisions must as surely be wrong, as that the same thing can exist in two places at the same time.

It seems, then, that if each controversy is to be correctly decided; in other words, if there ought not to be opposing decisions, the matter ought to be settled in one suit, if that be practicable. Suppose two suits are brought for the purpose, and in that against Stuart, F. G. is decided to be the Manor line; such decision might have, and probably would have, considerable influence in the controversy with the Adairs. They ought to guard against this, by giving Stuart all their aid: for in deciding the matter as to Stuart, the whole survey and evidence, as well as it regards the Adairs as Stuart, are important in that controversy, and must be considered. But the Adairs, not being parties, are not bound by that decision, and they have the question tried over again on the same surveys and evidence; and Z. Y. are fixed as the boundaries or Manor lines. Which verdict is to prevail? And if both are 93 to stand, the boundaries of the appellee are entirely destroyed; for no one can say which is the Manor line. Thus two suits, depending on precisely the same surveys and facts, and in which there may be different decisions, are to go on at precisely double costs and trouble to all parties.

Had this ground of jurisdiction been stated in the bill, would it have been proper to have sustained a demurrer, and to have turned the parties round to several suits at law? It may be said that one ejectment could have been brought against all the defendants, so as to have tried the matter in one suit. If this could be, had not that action been barred by length of time, yet from the evidence, it seems probable this would have been the result; at least as to some of the lands, and some of the parties; and if the party had been driven to his writs of right, it might have been very unsafe to have counted for his whole tract of land against all the defendants. His safest course, in either action, most probably would have been by separate suits.

Although consent of parties will not give jurisdiction, yet, if to a bill framed on the real facts as they now appear, the defendants had admitted those facts, and submitted their case to the jurisdiction of the court, as the safest and best course for all the parties, would it have been expedient, after the whole matter was thus fully and fairly before the Court, to have dismissed the bill for want of jurisdiction? I am not prepared to say that it would. I have not had access to many of the authorities cited on this point; but I think the principles laid down in the case of the Mayor of York v. Pilkington & al. 1 Atk. 282, go to support the jurisdiction in this case.

There was another difficulty in this case. Thomas Coalter has only the legal title to a small undivided portion of this land; the title to the residue still remaining in the other heirs of Switzer; so that he might have found some difficulty in suing at law. This title, it is true, they may be willing to make, as the bill states; but when it will be in the power of the party to get it in, does not appear. *They are numerous, and may be dispersed; and in the mean time, if the boundary can be settled, there will be no actual controversy remaining, and partition may be made.

On the whole, and believing that few cases can occur, so peculiarly situated as this, I incline to support the jurisdiction of the Court, instead of turning the parties around to the variety and number of suits at law, which their case may require; in which there may be contradictory decisions on the very same evidence, both of which cannot be right.

This inclination, however, is not without many doubts, which are greatly increased by the opposing opinions of my brethren.

JUDGE CABELL, was of opinion that the decree should be reversed; which was entered as the decree of the Court.

February, 1836.

Chancery Practice—Specific Execution of Award—Bill—Sufficiency of.—A bill in Chancery, which makes out a case for a specific execution of an award, but does not pray for general or special relief, is sufficient, if no objection be taken by the defendant, and he answers on the merits of the complaint, and submits himself to the decree of the Court. Quære, would this objection be sustained on a demurrer to the bill?

Equity Jurisdiction—Specific Execution of an Award.—Equity has jurisdiction to decree specific execution of an award, where the remedy at law is inadequate.

Arbitration and Award—Award—On Whom Binding.—Where some only of several distributees submit their interest to arbitration, the award will be binding on the parties to the submission, as far as their interests are concerned.

Same—Same—Mistake of Law.—When parties submit a question of law alone to arbitration, the award is binding, though contrary to law.

Same—Same—How Construed.—Awards are to be construed liberally; and, therefore, the terms "heirs at law," in an award respecting personal estate, may be construed to mean "all a testator's children living, and the child or children of any of them who died in his life time."

Partition—Tenants in Common.—Tenants in common of personal estate cannot have partition at common law; and, therefore, a Court of Equity is the proper tribunal to decree a partition of it.

Bills—When Plaintiff Allowed to Amend.—In what cases a plaintiff should be allowed to amend his bill.

This suit was originally brought in the County Court of Albemarle, and afterwards removed by Certiorari, to the Staunton Chancery Court.

*For the sequel of the principal case, see Merritt v. Smith, 6 Leigh 486.

†Arbitration and Award—Award—Mistake of Law.—Where a matter is left to arbitration, upon a mere naked question of law, the award thereupon cannot be disturbed for a mistake of the law. Mayor of Richmond v. Judah, 5 Leigh 320, citing the principal case as authority. An award cannot be invalid upon the ground that the arbitrator erred in his judgment, either upon the law or the fact. Pollock v. Sutherland, 25 Gratt. 92, citing principal case as its authority.

The court will not interfere with an award merely because it would have given a different decision in the particular case. City of Portsmouth v. Norfolk County, 31 Gratt. 734; Mathews v. Miller, 25 W. Va. 828, both citing principal case as authority.

See further, monographic note on "Arbitration and Award" appended to Bassett v. Cunningham, 9 Gratt. 684.

‡Bills—When They May Be Amended.—As a general rule, the court will, at any time before the hearing, grant leave to amend where the bill is defective as and his son, John Buster, filed their bill setting forth the following case: that a controversy having arisen between the complainants and Thomas Smith and Susanna Smith, respecting the right of property in three negroes, to wit: Robin, in the possession of the said Thomas Smith, and Milly and Maria in the possession of the said Susanna Smith, the parties mutually submitted the said controversy to the final determination of five persons, by a writing under their hands and seals, in the penalty of $1000: that the said arbitrators decided, that the three slaves above-mentioned should be equally divided among the heirs of Thomas Smith, deceased, by virtue of which the complainants became entitled to their proportion of the said slaves;

96 that the complainants fully *performed the award on their parts, but the said Thomas and Susanna Smith still retain the said slaves, pretending that the award was illegal.

The bill proceeds to state, that inasmuch as the complainants cannot have an adequate remedy in a Court of Law, there being no form of action in which a specific performance can be decreed, &c. they call upon the defendants to answer whether the submission was not entered into as stated in the bill; whether the award was not made as alleged, &c. But there is no prayer for relief, either general or special.

The answer of Susanna Smith states, that her father, Thomas Smith, by his last will, bequeathed to her a negro woman named Winifred, whom he was to receive at the death of the mother of the defendant; that the defendant was then a married woman, being married to a certain Thomas Smith, now deceased; that not long after the death of her said father, her mother gave up the said negro woman, together with her child, which the defendant always understood she was delivered of, after the making of the said will, and before the death of her father; which said woman, and her child named Milly, now in dispute, have been held by the defendant upwards of sixteen years; that the child of the said Milly, named Maria, also in dispute, is now about four years old; that the defendant's brother, Thomas Smith, who was residuary legatee of his father, assigned over to the defendant all interest that he might have in the said Milly and Maria. The defendant denies that she ever insisted that the matter should be left to arbitration; and she was only induced to come into that measure by the threats of the complainants, that she would be ruined at law; that when her counsel attempted to state the law to the arbitrators, he was interrupted by one of the arbitrators, who told him he made false statements, and he immediately sat down; that such an award ought not to have been made, because the whole of the legatees of the said Thomas Smith were not present, and did not know *any thing of the business, and that Claudius Buster had no legal power to enter into any contract in behalf of his son John, &c.

Thomas Smith answered, that immediately after the death of his mother, the said John Smith made a demand of the slave Robin, as heir at law, in order to sell him and divide the money among the different legatees, which demand, the defendant refused, believing the slave to be his own property, as there was a clause in his father's will, that his estate should not be appraised, and he being the residuary legatee: that he submitted to the arbitration, in consequence of the threats of the complainant John. He charges that the award is not binding, because the submission was improperly made, the whole of the legatees not being present and consenting thereto; and it also embraces parties, who are entirely out of the submission.

The bond of submission is signed by Thomas Smith, Susanna Smith, John Smith, William Grayson, William Wood, and Claudius Buster, for himself and son.

The will of John Smith was proved in the year 1783.

The arbitrators awarded, that the three negroes in dispute should be equally divided among the "heirs of Thomas Smith deceased."

The Chancellor decreed that the bill of the plaintiffs be dismissed, without prejudice to any remedy they may have at law; and the plaintiffs appealed to this Court.

Wickham, for the appellants, contended that the award was right in principle. The bequest of the woman Winifred to Susanna Smith, could not convey her increase born after the date of the will, and before the death of the testator. No case justifies such a construction. The law, at the time of the death of the testator, gave the slaves of an intestate to his eldest son, and he was accountable to the other distributees for their proportionable value. The testator died intestate as to the slaves in question.

98 *It is said, however, that Chancery has no jurisdiction in this case. But it is an established principle, that Chancery has jurisdiction, wherever a specific execution is demanded. Smallwood v. Mercer & Hansborough, 1 Wash. 290. As to the award being void, because it extends to persons not parties to it, the case of Richards v. Brockenbrough, 1 Rand. 449, proves that such an objection will not vitiate an award, but that it will stand good as to the real parties, and all the rest be rejected as surpiusage.

Johnson, for the appellees.

The bill is imperfect, as it does not pray for any relief. But there are serious objections to the award itself.

1. There are not proper parties. All the distributees interested ought to be before the Court, that the whole case might be decided.

2. The award is void, because it does not follow the submission. That only required the arbitrators to decide the question between the parties to the submission; but they have gone on to settle the rights of to parties, or in the mistake or omission of any fact or circumstance connected with the substance of the bill, or not repugnant thereto. This amendment may be made by common order, before answer or demurrer, and afterwards by leave of the court. Holland v. Trotter, 22 Gratt. 139, citing principal case.

See further, monographic note on "Amended Bills" appended to Belton v. Apperson, 26 Gratt. 207.

the "heirs of Thomas Smith," many of whom are no parties to the bond.

3. It is void for uncertainty. The award decides that the estate shall be divided among the heirs of the testator, when there was but one heir, under the law as it then was. The law of that day did not apply to such a case as this. It only applied to a case of intestacy; here, there was a partial testacy. Grand children are not included in the provisions of that law. The award does not say whether there shall be a distribution per capita or per stirpes.

As to jurisdiction, a Court of Equity ought not to have it, because there was a most appropriate remedy at law. A jury would give damages in a suit on the arbitration bond, to the amount of the aliquot part withheld from the party aggrieved.

It was competent for some of the parties to refer their own interests to arbitration; but if they meant to refer the whole subject, all parties must unite in the submission. Britton v. Williams, 6 Munf. 453.

Wickham, in reply, referred to Wood v. Griffith, 1 Swanst. Rep. 54, to prove that equity may decree the specific execution of an award; and he contended that where parties refer a doubtful point of law to arbitration, a Court will never set aside the award, though it may be contrary to law. On the degree of uncertainty which will be tolerated in an award, he referred to Macon v. Crump, 1 Call, 500. By "heirs," the arbitrators meant, persons entitled to distribution. Words must be construed secundum subjectam materiam. The bill may be amended, even after a hearing, by making new parties.

February 11. The PRESIDENT delivered opinion of the Court.*

The first objection in order, to a decree in behalf of the appellants, is, to the jurisdiction of the Court. The bill makes out a case for a specific execution of an award, but prays for neither special nor general relief; as to which, no objection is taken by the appellees. They answer generally the allegations of the bill, and submit themselves to the decree of the Court, on the merits of the complaint. Whether, upon a demurrer to the bill, it would have been sustained, it is not necessary to decide. A submission to an award, is an agreement between the parties to it, to abide by and perform it in every particular; and the mutual submission of the matter in controversy, is a valid consideration for such agreement. If either party refuses to comply with the terms of it, and there is adequate remedy at law, a Court of Equity will not interfere; but as in the case of other agreements, if that remedy be inadequate, neither upon reason nor authority

100 *to a specific execution in a Court of Equity. Though there was no award in the case of Smallwood v. Hansborough, 1 Wash. 290, the Court went on this principle; and though in some of the English Cases, it was intimated, that where there was no acquiescence in the award by the parties to the submission, nor agreement by them afterwards to have it executed, a bill for specific execution would not lie, (see the cases of Thompson v. Noel & al. 1 Atk. 60, and Hall v. Hardy, 3 P. Wms. 187;) yet, in the case of Wood v. Griffith, Swanston's Rep. 54, that distinction is overruled.

The next objection is, to the validity of the award; first, because it comprehends the interests of persons not parties to the submission; and, secondly, because the arbitrators have mistaken the law of the case submitted to them. I pass over the objection to the conduct of the arbitrators, as regards the counsel of one of the defendants; because, upon the evidence, there is nothing in it affecting the merits of the award. Nor does it appear that the defendant, Susanna Smith, was misled or deceived, when she signed the submission. She may have signed it with reluctance, but with a full knowledge of its object.

As to the validity of the award, the parties to the submission claimed their equal share in the property in controversy, with other distributees of Thomas Smith, the testator. They were competent to submit their claim to arbitration. Those who signed the submission, were alone to be bound by it; and in deciding on their interests, the rights of others were not to be affected. If the decision of the arbitrators was against them, they were bound by it; if against the defendants, who claimed the property, they were also bound.

That an award as to the title to personal estate, settles the rights of the parties controverting it, the cases abundantly shew. 2 Levinz, 104. 2 Esp. Rep. 25, and the cases cited in 2 Vin. Abr. "L." pl. 40, note 4.

101 *As to the objection that the arbitrators mistook the law of the case submitted, the question submitted was purely a question of law. Susanna Smith, one of the defendants, claimed the property under the will of her father Thomas Smith, and under a deed from Thomas Smith the residuary legatee. The plaintiffs claimed it as undisposed of by the will, and as distributees under the law. The nature of the controversy is stated by both of the defendants in their answers. John Smith had claimed it as heir at law of his father Thomas Smith, admitting that if he was entitled to it, he was accountable to the other children for their portions of its value. Thomas Smith, one of the children, claimed it as residuary legatee; and whether the property passed by the will or not, was the question submitted to the arbitrators. When parties submit to arbitration their rights involved in law and fact, they are understood to submit the facts to the arbitrators, to be decided on according to law; and if it appears upon the face of the award, that they grossly mistook the law, the award will be set aside. But, where it appears, as in the case before us, that the parties intended to submit the question of law alone, the decision of the arbitrators is binding, though contrary to law. If not, it would not be competent to parties to make a valid submission of a point of law; for, however the arbitrators might decide, no litigation would be avoided. The proper Court would still have to consider and decide the point of law, as if no award had been made. See 13 East. 357, Chace & al. v. Westmore. Young v. Walton, 9 Ves. 364, and Medcalfe v. Ives, 1 Atk. 64. The arbitrators having, in effect, decided that the property did not pass by the will, it followed of course, in point of law, that it belonged (as the law was, at the death of the testator,) to the eldest son, as heir at law, charged with the payment of due proportions of its value, to the other children. This liability of the heir at law, was, in equity, equivalent to an equal interest in the property; and it must be understood, that the arbitrators meant by "heirs at law" of "Thomas Smith, all his children living, and the child or children of any of them who died in the life-time of Thomas Smith, and the representatives of those who have died since his death; such children representing their parents per stirpes. Awards are to be construed liberally, to give them effect; and this seems to be a fair construction of the award in this case. It accords with the purpose of the parties submitting to it; nor is it necessary that the arbitrators point out the particular mode in which it is to be carried into effect. Lingood v. Eade, 2 Atk. 501, 505. That in this aspect of the case, it is one proper for specific execution in a Court of Equity, seems very clear. The parties to the submission, together with the other representatives of Thomas Smith, claimed an interest in common, in the property in question. Supposing it to be a legal, and not an equitable interest, no partition between tenants in common of personal estate, could be made at law. A partition in kind could not be made there; each party having an equal right to the possession of the whole. Whether the title to the property was legal or equitable, therefore, in this case, a Court of Equity was the proper tribunal for a partition of it.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the Court of Chancery erred in dismissing the bill, and not affording to the plaintiffs an opportunity to amend it, to ascertain the extent of their rights, by shewing how many of the representatives of Thomas Smith, would have been entitled, under the award, had they signed the submission, and thereby establish the extent of their own interest in the subject, under the award.

The decree is therefore reversed, and the following decree is to be entered:

The Court is of opinion, that the award in the proceedings mentioned, is valid and sufficiently certain, and that a Court of Equity hath jurisdiction to carry it into effect, by decreeing a portion of the 103 slaves in question, in kind, *according to the rights of the parties ascertained by the award, and the other matters in the record, if that can be done; and if not, by directing a sale thereof, and the proceeds to be divided according to the rights of the parties: that the effect of the said award, was to determine that all the children of Thomas Smith, alive at his death, and those now representing such of them as are dead, together with the child or children of such of his children as died in his life-time, were entitled to an equal proportion of the slaves mentioned in the award, such children taking the part which their deceased parent would have taken, if alive: that as regards those who did not sign the submission, neither they nor their representatives can claim any thing under it; and the portions which they would have been entitled to, had they been parties to the submission, remain to Thomas Smith and Susanna Smith, claiming under him, as if the award had not been made, since, by the will of Thomas Smith deceased, the said Thomas Smith was, before the award, entitled to the slaves in question as residuary legatee, and that the said decree, in dismissing the bill, is erroneous, &c.

February, 1826.

Principal and Surety—Discharge of Surety—Indulgence to Principal.—A surety will not be discharged by an indulgence granted by the creditor to the principal debtor, unless such indulgence ties up the hands of the creditor from pursuing the debtor at law. This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Fredericksburg.

The bill was filed by William S. Jett against the administrators of Moses Hunter, deceased, Henry St. George Tucker, Henry Lee, and Peter R. Beverley. The following opinion gives a complete view of the history of the case, and of the different topics of argument.

Leigh and Johnson, for the appellants.

Stanard, for the appellee.

February 22. JUDGE CABELL.

This is a bill filed by Jett, to enjoin proceedings on a delivery bond, executed by him, as surety for General Henry Lee to Hunter's administrators. There are various matters in the bill, to which it will not be necessary to advert; as it is admitted that the only proper subjects of controversy now remaining to the parties, are those which grow out of the arrangement made between Lee and Hunter's administrators, subsequently to the delivery bond.

The bill states, that immediately after the service of the execution, and the proceedings thereon, Lee waited upon Henry St. George Tucker, the agent of Hunter's administrators, and obtained a letter from him to their attorney, stating that as the agent of Hunter's administrators, he had made an arrangement which would suspend for the 105 present, all proceedings on the judgment and delivery *bond; and directing him to proceed no farther, until farther advised; which would probably not be the case. A copy of the letter is exhibited, bearing date the 29th of March, 1806. The bill then goes on to state the arrangement alluded to in the letter, viz: "that a certain P. R. Beverley undertook to settle the debt of Lee, provided Hunter's administrators would receive bonds to the amount:" that the complainant had seen a copy of an account between Beverley and Lee, in which the former charged the latter with 2500l. paid to Hunter's administrators, on account of this debt, and credited him with 1600l. received on the same account; and that he has been informed that Hunter's administrators acknowledged to have received 1600l. from Beverley. He complains that Hunter's administrators have procured an award of execution on the delivery bond, overlooking the arrangement between Tucker, Lee and Beverley. He calls on them to state, what were the arrangements alluded to in the letter aforesaid; whether it was not agreed that P. R. Beverley should pay the debt aforesaid, or how much thereof, and how much he did pay; whether any and what securities, either in lands or bonds or otherwise, had been received from Lee, or from others for him; and that such securities shall be delivered up to the complainant for his indemnification; and that the money due thereon may be decreed to be paid to him: that the administrators of Hunter may be enjoined from proceeding on the said execution; and concludes with a prayer for general relief.

+Same—Same—Bill—What It Must State.—A surety who seeks to discharge himself from liability on the ground of time given to the principal must state every fact essential to make it a discharge. He must state that the arrangement was made, without the knowledge, or against his consent. Knight v. Charter, 22 W. Va. 429, citing the principal case as its authority.

To the point that in a court of equity as well as in a court of law, the allegations and proofs must agree, the principal case is cited in Wren v. Moncure, 95 Va. 375, 28 S. E. Rep. 588.

The answer of Tucker refers to the arrangement aforesaid, and exhibits a copy thereof. It appears from the arrangement, as I understand it, that Tucker did propose to receive from Lee, good Augusta bonds, taken to P. R. Beverley, to the full amount of General Lee's debt; or, if such bonds could not then be procured, that he would receive P. R. Beverley's note to deliver such bonds to the full amount of the debt, by some certain day. These bonds were to be payable in one, two, three 106 and four years. *They were to be received on the part of the administrators, as a collateral security only, and not as a discharge of the judgment theretofore obtained by the administrators against General Lee, or as a payment of the delivery bond; and it is declared to be distinctly understood, that the transaction is not to operate as a release of the debt due from Lee, or as altering its nature in any wise; and that the administrators agree, on their part, in consideration of a punctual compliance by General Lee, in delivering the bonds, &c. not to proceed on the judgment at law, and forthcoming bond, until there should be a failure in the payment of the Augusta bonds to be delivered. Tucker's answer farther states, that Lee did not fully comply with his engagement for the delivery of the bonds: that he only gave Beverley's note for the delivery of bonds to the amount of 2500l. which was between $500 and $1000 less than the note should have been for: that Beverley did not fully comply even with that note, as he delivered bonds to the amount of 1694l. 10 8; and that a small part of them had been lost by insolvencies. He, however, expresses a willingness that a credit may be given, for the present, for 1694l. 10 8, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, from March 29th, 1806, on 798l. 8, and with like interest from March 31st, 1807, on 896l. 2 8. He insists, however, on a reference to a commissioner, for the purpose of ascertaining more accurately, what should be the final decree; believing that he has allowed more interest than is proper, and reserving the right to correct the amount of principal also, for which he had agreed to give credit, provided it should be found too large.

P. R. Beverley's note is filed, bearing date the 29th of March, 1806, and binding himself to deliver bonds to the amount of 2500l. on or before the succeeding Chancery Court.

A copy of the judgment on the delivery bond, also filed, shews that the bond, after deducting an error, amounts to more than 2700l.

107 *The Chancellor perpetuated the injunction, on the ground, it is said, that the arrangement between Hunter's administrators and General Lee, operated a discharge of Jett, the surety; and the counsel for the appellee, in this Court, has relied on that ground only, for sustaining the decree.

But a previous question presents itself: Is it competent to the appellee to insist on that ground, under the pleadings in this case?

I entirely concur with Judge Green as to the law in relation to the discharge of sureties, as laid down by him in the case of Norris v. Crummey, 2 Rand. 328, that if a creditor, by agreement or any other act, precludes himself at law from proceeding against the principal, after the debt is due, even for a moment; or if the agreement be such as would induce a Court of Equity to prohibit the creditor from proceeding at law, the surety is discharged, and I also entirely concur with him, that the true ground or principle on which a surety is relieved in such cases, is, that the creditor, by his act or agreement, has injured the surety, by impairing his rights and remedies.

But this principle does not apply to a case, where the arrangement was made with the knowledge and assent of the surety; for, in such case, it cannot be said that the surety is injured. Volenti non fit injuria. It is not the mere circumstance of the creditor's binding himself to give time to the principal, that will discharge the surety. It is the binding himself to give such time, without the knowledge or assent of the surety; for, it is then only, that it is injurious to the surety. The surety, therefore, who seeks to discharge himself on the ground of time given to the principal, must state that which is essential to make it a discharge. He must state that the arrangement was made without his knowledge, or against his assent. This is the clear result of general principles, and is proved by the following, among other cases. Nesbit v. Smith, 2 Bro. Ch. Cas. 579. Rees v. Barrington, 2 Ves. jun. 540. Ex parte Smith, 3 Bro. Ch. Cas. 1. Samuel v. Hawarth, 3 Meriv. 272.

108 *Even where an arrangement has been made, tying up the hands of the creditor, without the knowledge, or against the assent of the surety, it will not, of necessity, operate the discharge of the surety, unless he choose to avail himself of it. The law will not force him to be discharged from his engagements against his will; and in a case where collateral security has been given, in consideration of the time extended, the surety who asks not to be discharged, but insists on the benefit of the collateral security, must be held to have assented to the arrangement originally, or to waive the discharge which he might have demanded.

Let us apply these principles to the case before us.

It does not appear from the case as stated in the bill, nor from any exhibit filed with the bill, that Hunter's administrators had bound themselves not to proceed on the judgment. The bill states, that Lee brought a letter from Tucker to the attorney, stating, that as the agent of Hunter's administrators, he had made an arrangement which would suspend, for the present, all proceedings on the judgment and delivery bond; and directing him to proceed no farther, until farther advised. But there is nothing in the letter, to shew that this suspension was obligatory. From any thing that appears in the letter, it may have been mere indulgence granted as a favor, and revocable at pleasure. Nor is that part of the bill which professes to state the arrangement, more satisfactory on this point. It says nothing about the suspension of the proceedings. All that it says about the arrangement, is, that P. R. Beverley undertook to settle the debt, provided Hunter's administrators would receive bonds to the amount; without alleging that bonds to the amount had been given. There is no allegation in the bill, that the arrangement (even admitting it tied up the hands of Hunter's administrators) was without the knowledge or against the consent of Jett, nor is there even a general allegation, that the arrangement was of a character to discharge Jett.

109 *So far from stating the facts necessary to constitute a discharge; so far from stating the arrangement to be of a character calculated to produce that effect; so far from asking to be discharged; Jett comes into Court, for the purpose (as appears from his bill) of insisting on the benefit of the counter-security under the arrangement, to enable him to pay the debt; thus clearly admitting, as I conceive, his liability to pay it.

Whether the arrangement was or was not of such a character as to discharge Jett, was not, therefore, a matter to which the administrators of Hunter were bound to answer; nor could it, under this bill, be a matter in issue between them. There was nothing in the bill to apprise them, that Jett sought to be discharged. They could not, therefore, be required either to deny, or disprove those facts, which might constitute a discharge. If he had chosen to put that matter in issue, Hunter's administrators might have been prepared with full proof, to shew that he was not entitled to a discharge. To permit him to take them by surprise, and to rely upon it at the trial, would be contrary to justice and the established practice of Courts of Equity.

If it be said, that Jett's calling upon Hunter's administrators, by his bill, to disclose the arrangement alluded to in the letter, and to set forth the securities and money received, or to be received under it, is tantamount to an allegation on his part, that the arrangement was made without his knowledge or against his assent, I reply, that a man may be well supposed to be ignorant of the details of an arrangement, and yet be perfectly acquainted with its general character. Considering Jett's situation, exposed to all the inconveniences of an execution on a delivery bond for so large an amount, he may be presumed to have anxiously desired some arrangement for time and counter-security; and it is evident, from his bill, that he knew that time had been given, although it is not stated whether it was given as mere indulgence, or otherwise. When, under these circumstances, he files his bill, asking information as to the details of the arrangement, and praying the benefit of the payment and securities, which were the fruit of the arrangement, the bill, surely, contains in itself, no ground for his discharge. Nor will the answer of Hunter's administrators aid him in this respect; for, the answer does not, any more than the bill, state facts which would entitle him to a discharge. In the first place, it denies that Lee complied with the terms of the arrangement; and the arrangement itself shews, that Hunter's administrators were not to be bound, (as will be more fully seen hereafter,) until the terms were complied with. The answer also is silent as to the important fact, whether the arrangement was made, with or without the knowledge or assent of Jett. And as Hunter's administrators had no reason to expect that Jett was seeking a discharge, their silence on this point cannot be the foundation of any inference unfavorable to them.

Even if Jett had been ignorant of the precise character of the arrangement, until he saw the answer, surely, if he then intended to shift his ground and go for a discharge, he should have insisted on it, and put it in issue, by an amended or supplemental bill.

I am therefore of opinion, on this ground, that the decree perpetuating the injunction is erroneous.

Even admitting the arrangement to have been made without the knowledge or against the consent of Jett, I do not consider it such as to discharge him, be case, in fact, the hands of Hunter's administrators never were tied up. The proposition was, that Lee should deposit, as collateral security, good Augusta bonds, taken to P. R. Beverley; or Peter R. Beverley's note, binding himself to make such deposit, to the amount of the debt. The only stipulation as to time was, that in case Beverley's note should be given, he should bind himself to deliver the bonds by a day certain thereafter. As to the deposit to be made by Lee, viz: of bonds taken to P. R. Beverley, or of Beverley's own note to deliver such bonds, no time is mentioned.

Lee enters into no obligation what-111 ever to make such deposit. *It was a mere "proposition" on the part of Hunter's administrators, with which Lee might or might not comply, as he should think proper. It would be preposterous to contend, that such a "proposition" imposed any obligation whatever on Hunter's administrators, until it was complied with by Lee. It is true that Lee might have delivered the bonds the next moment, and then they would have become bound to forbear. But, until such delivery, to the full amount of the debt, they were under no obligation whatever. The terms of the arrangement are express and positive on this point; the administrators agree, on their part, "in consideration of a punctual compliance by Gen. Lee, in delivering the bonds, &c. not to proceed, &c." A compliance on the part of General Lee, with the terms of the proposition made by Hunter's administrators, was a condition precedent to any obligation on their part.

Did General Lee comply with the terms of the arrangement, according to the evidence in this cause? He did not. Availing himself of the alternative afforded by the proposition of Hunter's administrators, instead of disposing "Augusta bonds taken to Peter R. Beverley," he chose to deposit Beverley's note to make a deposit of such bonds. But the note of Beverley was for bonds to the amount of 2500l. only; which was considerably less than the amount of the debt. As there was not, then, a compliance on the part of General Lee with the terms of the arrangement, the arrangement did not bind Hunter's administrators to suspend farther proceedings.

If the arrangement did not bind them, did the letter bind them? The letter was no contract; and if it were, Lee was no party to it. It contained a mere direction to the counsel, for a temporary suspension of proceedings; but whether that suspension was granted as a favor, and liable to be revoked at pleasure, or not, does not appear from the letter. Regarding the letter only, we cannot say that the suspension was the result of obligation incurred by Hunter's administrators. Nor will the 112 reference, in the "letter, to the 'arrangement,'" go any farther to prove obligation on their part. I have already shewn that the arrangement, not having been complied with by Lee, was never binding on them.

If it be said, that although Lee did not fully comply with the terms of the arrangement, yet Hunter's administrators accepted what he did, as full compliance; I answer that such acceptance is neither alleged in the bill, admitted by the answer, nor established by the proofs.

It is true that Lee went far towards complying with the arrangement; and that thereupon, Hunter's administrators suspended the proceedings. But, although this partial compliance was regarded by Hunter's administrators, as a motive sufficient to induce indulgence, it cannot be regarded by us as a legal consideration, sufficient to impose obligation. I therefore think the decree is erroneous on this ground also.

I am of opinion that the decree should be reversed, and the injunction dissolved, except for 1694l. 10 8, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, from March 29th, 1806, on 798l. 8, and with the like interest from March 31st, 1807, on 896l. 2 8; but that, as to the said sum of 1641. 10 8, with the interest as aforesaid, there should be a reference to a commissioner, in order that Hunter's administrators may have the opportunity to shew, if they can, that that credit should be reduced, either as to principal or interest; and that the cause be remanded to be proceeded in, accordingly, to a final decree.

JUDGE CARR and the PRESIDENT concurred, and a decree was entered according to the foregoing principles.*

Bail—Office Judgment—Equitable Relief—Case at Bar.—Appearance bail enters into a recognizance of special bail, before a Judge, in the country. He commits it to his son, to be delivered to the Clerk of the Court where the suit was depending. The son delivers it to a lawyer, who practised in that Court, and who promised to deliver it in time. The lawyer forgets his commission, and the office judgment is confirmed against the principal and his appearance bail. A Court of Equity will not grant relief in such a case. Decided by two Judges, one dissenting.

Same—Equitable Relief.†—The principles on which relief will be granted to bail.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Fredericksburg, where a bill was filed by William Dickinson against Reuben M. Sizer and George Sizer, administrators with the will annexed of John Sizer, deceased. The following opinions explain the case so fully, that any other report is unnecessary.

Stanard, for the appellant.

Bacchus, for appellee.

JUDGE CARR.

Reuben and George Sizer, administrators of John Sizer, sued out a writ against John Walden, on a bond or bill penal. (we do not know which) for $1916, to be discharged by $958. Bail was required. William Dickinson became bail. An office judgment was taken against the defendant and bail, and not being set aside at the proper Term, was confirmed, and an execution issued. Dickinson filed a bill to injoin this judgment and execution, on the 114 *ground that he entered himself special bail, with a Judge of the General Court; and being obliged to go to Richmond, about the time of the office judgment Court, handed the recognizance to his son, who, he expected, would attend the Court, and requested him to deliver it to the Clerk, and have the proper entry made on the record: that his son not attending Court, gave the paper to counsel practising in the Court, who promised to deliver the same to the clerk, to have the proper entry made, and the defendant delivered: that this was forgotten by the counsel, and the office judgment confirmed, by the rising of the Court.

The defendant answers, that he resides afar off, and knows nothing of the circumstances stated in the bill. He calls for strict proof; but contends, that if the whole case stated were proved, it could not affect him, or take from him the advantage which the law, without his co-operation, has given him.

The only evidence in the cause is the affidavit of the plaintiff's son, of Mr. Lomax, of Woolfolk and Waller. The two former verify the statement in the bill, with respect to the recognizance; the two latter state that they have known the principal debtor, Walden, many years, and never knew him to conceal himself or his property. We gather, both from the bill and answer, that he is now insolvent; and the answer adds, that since the judgment, which is the subject of the injunction, was obtained, he has taken the benefit of the insolvent law. There is also in the record, evidence of a motion made before a subsequent Term of the Superior Court of Spottsylvania, for leave to the bail, to file the recognizance, nunc pro tunc. The Chancellor dissolved the injunction, and the plaintiff appealed.

I have entertained but one opinion on this case, since I heard it argued; but as it involves principles of importance, and more especially, as some of my brethren seemed, in conference, to take a different view of it, I have examined it with my best attention.

115 *The idea of one man's paying money for another, strikes us at once as unjust, and the surety who is prosecuted for the debt of his principal, has always our sympathies enlisted in his favor. To check these, and prevent their influence on our judgments, it is not amiss to recollect, that the creditor, in suing, is only seeking a just debt, in the mode given by the laws of the land: that those laws, by enabling him to demand bail, intended at the same time, to save the debtor from imprisonment, and to give the creditor additional security to his debt: that when he makes this demand, he evinces his determination not to trust to the debtor alone, while the bail, by his undertaking, proves that he does mean to trust him; and we know that "he who trusts most shall lose most." What may be the considerations which influence the bail to incur the obligation, we know not. It may be friendship, or value received. He may owe the debtor, or may be secured by that very property, which, without his interference, the debtor might have given up for the release of his body. However this may be, the bail enters fairly into a solemn obligation, which by regular operation of law will subject him to the payment of the debt unless he takes those steps which are prescribed, in order to protect himself. If he takes them, he is safe. If not, the creditor has the law, and their equities are equal. Thus, in Croughton v. Duval, 3 Call, 74, the President says, that "though sureties are favoured in equity, and will not be charged further than the law charges them, fair creditors are also favoured in that Court, and will not be deprived of their legal rights, without some fraud or neglect in doing what they are bound to do." The same doctrine is held in Anderson v. Anderson, 2 Call, 163, where a marriage settlement, made to protect the property of the wife, was held void against the husband's creditors, because not recorded in due time; and it was declared by the Court, that equity would not interpose in such a case, though the recording were prevented by accident, or unavoidable necessity; yea, even though it 116 *were prevented by fraud, if the creditors were neither parties nor privies to the fraud. That the creditor, then, will be permitted to enjoy every legal advantage fairly gained, I hold to be the general rule.

Whether the case before us has any circumstances, which will take it out of the rule, remains to be enquired. The plaintiff relies on two: 1. That the Statute authorising a recognizance of special bail to be taken, before any Judge of the General Court, &c. requires that the person taking the recognizance, shall transmit it to the clerk; thus, that in this case, it was the duty of the Judge who took it, to send the recognizance to the clerk: that any failure in this point, was the failure of the Judge, and ought not to injure the bail. 2. That even though the bill, by receiving the recognizance from the Judge, took upon himself the duty of delivering it to the clerk, he has employed, in the discharge of that duty, ordinary care and diligence, and ought not to suffer, if, by accident, the means used have failed.

As to the first. The Statute certainly did not mean to impose on the Judge taking the recognizance, the duty of delivering it personally to the clerk; nor yet, of being answerable for its safe and timely delivery. It was not his duty to hire a messenger to carry it. The law says, he shall transmit it to the clerk. When special bail is taken in the country, it will either be the appearance bail who becomes special bail, and then he being the person most interested in the return of the recognizance, will of course take possession of it, and return it; or the defendant will procure some other person to enter himself bail, and then, such person, or the defendant himself, will take charge of the recognizance for the purpose of delivery. In either case, it is a matter with which the plaintiff has nothing to do. The law gives him a judgment against the defendant and appearance bail, of course. If the recognizance is never returned to the clerk, it can raise no equity against him, unless he were instrumental in preventing its return. Suppose, instead of the appearance bail, 117 some other had *entered himself special bail, before the Judge; and this recognizance, failing to reach the clerk in time, the office judgment had stood confirmed by the rise of the Court. Would this have given the appearance bail an equity to injoin the judgment? Surely not; and it does not seem to me to change the case, that the appearance bail himself had entered into the recognizance. But in truth, I am considering a case not before the Court. The appearance bail did take possession of the recognizance, and thereby wholly exonerated the Judge, and took upon himself the risque and responsibility of delivering it. We know that he never did deliver it: that it never was tendered to the clerk: that there never was any special bail given in the suit.

But it is contended, that notwithstanding this, such a case is made out as will compel a Court of Equity to interpose, and take from the creditor the judgment, which he has gotten against the appearance bail, for want of special bail. The case stated in the bill is, that the plaintiff, having important business at Richmond, about the time that the Superior Court of Spottsylvania would sit, gave the recognizance to his son, and requested him to give it to the clerk, and have the entry made: that his son having business at Caroline Court, which sat at the same time with that of Spottsylvania, did not attend the latter, but gave the bond to a lawyer, with a request to attend to it, and that lawyer forgot it. This, I say, is the case stated; but even this case, feeble as it is, is not made out. The plaintiff is put, by the answer, to the proof of him his whole equity; yet we have no evidence of the slightest business rendering a journey to Richmond necessary that time.

It was said in the argument, that this Court had decided cases like the present, in favor of the equity set up against the judgment. I have looked through the Reports, and can find none but the case of Smith & Morton v. Wallace, 1 Wash. Rep. 254. In that case, the Sheriff, having become appearance bail, offered to the clerk a bail piece, (as it is called in that case,) which he not considering good, took 118 *a judgment at the Rules against the defendant and Sheriff. At the office judgment Term, the bail piece was again offered to the clerk in Court, and he again objecting to it, it was offered to the plaintiff's attorney, who, thinking it sufficient, said he should not object to it. It was then given by the defendant's counsel to the clerk, and he was directed to file it; but he not having heard what the plaintiff's counsel had said, and still considering the bail piece bad, took no notice of it, but entered a plea for the Sheriff. Judgment was afterwards gotten against the Sheriff, and he filed a bill for relief. The Court sustain the bill, on the grounds, that the bail piece was a good one: that the plaintiff's counsel had acknowledged its sufficiency; and that this excused the Sheriff of the negligence imputed to him. When the counsel assented, there was no necessity of moving the Court on the subject. Now surely, the case before us cannot be compared with this, in any of its strong points. The recognizance was never tendered to the clerk at Rules; was never in Court; never the slightest effort made to enter special bail, and set aside the office judgment. The bail had gone one way, without the least cause proved for his absence, his son another, and the lawyer had business enough of his own to attend to. Suppose the bail had been present himself, with the bail piece in his pocket; and had been so much engaged about other matters, as to have forgotten it. Could this have raised an equity against the judgment? And is not the case the same? He appointed an agent, who made another agent, who forgot it.

Finding no ground of support for this bill in any decisions of this Court, I have looked to the English books, and to the various heads of equitable jurisdiction. The Courts of Law in England, exercise equitable jurisdiction of the most liberal kind, in every thing respecting bail. With them, the bail to the Sheriff or bail below (our appearance bail,) is not liable to a judgment at once, or to a joint judgment against him and the principal. But 119 if bail *above is not put in, the plaintiff may take an assignment of the bail bond, and sue on it; and then, the bail has eight days after the return of the latitat, to surrender the principal. The books are full of applications to the Court, sometimes to enlarge the time of delivery; sometimes to enter an exoneretur. There is no Statutory provision on these subjects, but they are governed by the rules of the Court; and these rules are formed and administered in the spirit of equity; indeed, it is called their equitable jurisdiction. I have examined these cases, and will quote a few to shew their application to the present.

Grant v. Fagan, 4 East. 189. Motion to enlarge the time for bail to render their principal, upon an affidavit, that the principal, who was in France and about to return, had been made a prisoner of war under the late edict of the French government, under which, contrary to the former usage of nations, they had arrested all British subjects, who happened to be in France at the breaking out of the war; and the case was compared to those, where the bail of defendants sent out of the kingdom under the alien act, had been relieved, (Merricks v. Vaucher, 6 Term Rep. 50. Coles v. Dehayne, Ib. 52,) as also, where the principals, after their arrest and giving bail, had become Peers, (Trinder v. Shirley, Doug. 45.) or members of the House of Commons, (Landridge v. Flood, Tidd. 152,) in which, and similar cases, bail were considered to be under no imputation of laches; it becoming out of their power, without any fault of theirs, to comply with their undertaking to render their principals. Lord Ellenborough: "In all those cases, the render becomes impossible by the act or law of our own State, which excuses the performance of the condition; but there is no case where this indemnity has been induced by the act of a foreign power; and as to the incapacity of the bail to render their principal without any default of their own, the same excuse might as truly be made in the case of the sickness of the principal, so as to make him incapable of removal 120 *without endangering his life, where, nevertheless, the bail are answerable."

Wynne v. Petty, 4 East's Rep. 102. Motion by bail to enlarge the time of delivery of their principal, on affidavit of a surgeon, that he was so sick that a removal would endanger his life. The Court at first doubted, whether it could be granted. They thought that the inconvenience ought rather to be borne by the bail, who must be fined for not complying with their undertaking, that by the plaintiff, who otherwise would be deprived of his right. Afterwards they referred to a case furnished by the master, where, in proceedings against the bail by Scire Facias, on the return day, application was made for further time, to render the defendant, on affidavit of a physician, that it would most probably kill the defendant to remove him. But the Court said, that it could not be granted, and they must adhere to their rule of Court: that the hardship of a particular case would not justify them in departing from the established practice of the Court; and where one party must suffer by the act of God, they could not interfere.

Clarke v. Hopper, &c. 3 Taunt. 46. Best, Sergeant, obtained a rule to set aside proceedings against bail, under these circumstances. The defendants became bail for Wilson, in a suit brought before his bankruptcy. He was declared a bankrupt, and obtained his certificate, before the time of pleading. He failed to plead. The plaintiff took an interlocutory judgment, executed a writ of enquiry, signed final judgment, sued out execution, and proceeded regularly against the bail. It was contended, that the bail, not being fixed when the certificate was obtained, ought to be relieved: that if the principal had pleaded his bankruptcy, it would have been a complete defence; and that the bail ought not to suffer by his negligence, especially as this was an application to the equitable jurisdiction of the Court. But the Court said, that in every case the bail put themselves in hazard of suffering by the folly and negligence of their principal: that it is their business to watch the proceedings:

121 *that if they had searched the files of the Court, they would have found a Ca. Sa. returned nihil, which was notice that the plaintiff meant to proceed against them. They, therefore, refused to permit them to avail themselves of the bankruptcy; but as the original judgment had gone by default, they suffered them to make up an issue to try the right; the bail piece, in the mean time, to stand as a security.

Thus, we see, that the Courts in England, though exercising equitable powers, hold the bail to a strict and diligent attention to their own interest and safety: that they shall watch the proceedings; and even though prevented from rendering their principal, by the visitation of sickness, they will not relieve, because they must do it at the expense of another; and because, in questions de damno evitando, they will not remove the burthen from the shoulders of one man, to those of another equally innocent; and this is the true equitable doctrine, to be traced through the whole system.

Unless you can attach some equity upon the conscience of a party, you never can take from him a legal advantage. This is the ground of purchaser without notice. A. sells a tract of land to B. for $10,000, and the whole sum is paid down. A Court of Equity would compel A. to convey. But if he sell and convey this land to C. and C. pay the money for it before notice of B's equity, C. will hold the land. Why? Because he has done nothing unfair, and has the legal advantage. So in accident. It must be such an accident, as renders it unconscientious in the other party to use his legal advantage, and the accident must be wholly unmingled with any fault or negligence of the party seeking relief. Thus in the Marine Insurance Company v. Hodgson, 7 Cranch. 332. C. J. Marshall says, "without attempting to draw any precise line, to which Courts of Equity will advance, and which they cannot pass, in restraining parties from availing themselves of judgments obtained at law; it may safely be said, that any fact 122 which *clearly proves it to be against conscience, to execute a judgment, and of which the injured party could not have availed himself in a Court of Law, or of which he might have availed himself at law, but was prevented by fraud or accident, unmixed with any fault or negligence in himself or his agents, will justify an application to a Court of Equity."

Can any man say, that the accident here has been unmixed with any fault or negligence in the plaintiff or his agents? Or, that it is against conscience for the defendant to avail himself of the judgment, which the regular operation of law has given him? Try the question another way. It is a general head of equity to relieve against forfeitures and penalties. Take it, that this is a forfeiture which the bail has incurred, by failing to enter special bail, and set aside the office judgment. This is surely as high ground, as he can possibly assume. Does the case, in this aspect, authorise the relief asked? I say no; unless it furnishes clear evidence, that the accident was unavoidable, and that the case lies completely in compensation. To shew this, I will cite a few authorities.

In Eaton v. Lyon, 3 Ves. 690, Lord Alvanley, M. R. says: "At law, a covenant must be strictly and literally performed; in equity, it must be really and substantially performed, according to the true intent and meaning of the parties, so far as circumstances will admit. But if by unavoidable accident, if by fraud, surprise or ignorance not wilful, parties may have been prevented from executing it literally, a Court of Equity will interfere; and upon compensation being made (the party having done every thing in his power, and being prevented by the means I have alluded to) will give relief."

In 14 Ves. 289, Saunders v. Pope, Lord Erskine says: "Undoubtedly, unless it is plain that full compensation can be given, so as to put the other party in the same situation, a Court of Equity ought not to act; for such a jurisdiction would be arbitrary."

123 Sparks v. Proprietors of Liverpool Water Works*, 13 Ves. 428, a by-law of the corporation provided that calls should be made from time to time, on the stockholders, for such sums as were assessed, and that members making default shall receive notices, and unless payment be made in ten days after such notice sent, shall incur the loss of their stock. Under this law, the plaintiff had incurred the loss of his stock, and applied to the Court for relief, stating, that the lapse arose from ignorance of the call, from accidental circumstances, and absence from home when the notice was left. The relief was refused on two grounds: 1st, that it was a case in which compensation could not with certainty be made, because the operations of the company depended entirely on the punctuality of the stockholders in paying the calls, and the injury of failure could not be estimated. 2d. The accident was not unavoidable. The Master of the Rolls said on this point, "accident here is only the want of precaution. The plaintiff did not inform himself of the orders and rules of the company. It was easy for the plaintiff to direct the clerk to send the notices as he pleased. The Court cannot relieve against such accidents. The plaintiff ought to have taken all due pains to inform himself."

In Rolfe v. Harris, 2 Price's Exch. Rep. 206, Sir Thomas Plumer confines the cases of relief to inevitable accident, if the injury be capable of compensation; but if the acts of transgression be wilful, or compensation impracticable, the Court will not interfere. See also Hill v. Barclay, 18 Ves. 56. White v. Warner, 2 Meriv. 459; in both which cases it was decided, that where a tenant had covenanted to insure the premises from fire, with a clause of re-entry for failure, the Court would not join an ejectment, brought by the landlord for the forfeiture, although no loss had happened, (the premises not being touched by fire;) for, in the first place, the failure was caused by no accident, but wilful; and secondly, there was no computing the risque, which the landlord ran, of losing the tenements by fire, while uninsured, for which the tenant might have been

124 *wholly unable to pay. See also Skinner v. Dayton, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 526. 1 Ball & Beat. 47, 373. Madd. Ch. 27. From all these cases, it clearly appears, that to authorise the relief asked for, the failure must have been the result of inevitable accident, and the case must lie completely in compensation. I have already shewn, that here, the accident, (if it can be so called,) resulted from gross negligence. Let us see whether the case admits of compensation. Can you place the plaintiff at law precisely where he would have stood, if the bail bond had been filed? What would have been his situation then? He would have had an office judgment against the defendant and bail, subject to be set aside by plea. If set aside, he would have gotten a judgment against the defendant, then not insolvent that we know of, and might have made the money. He had the chance of fixing the the bail for the debt. He had the chance, if the bail delivered up the principal, of praying him in execution, and thus of getting the benefit of what he might give up, if he swore out. Can you replace him now on this ground? Not unless you can call back time, and erase from his records the events that have since happened. But tugit irrevocabile tempus; and it is impossible to place the creditor where he would have stood. His debtor has since sworn out, and given up his property to other executions; and the other chances of making his debt are past, and cannot be recalled. On no principle, then, that my judgment can apprehend, can you relieve the plaintiff.

JUDGE COALTER.

The case, as I understand it, is this:

Sizer sued Walden in debt, in the Superior Court of Law for Spottsylvania county, and Dickinson became his appearance bail. Before the office judgment Court, he entered a recognizance of special bail before the Judge of the Court, and received the recognizance from him, in order to 125 *transmit it to the Clerk's Office, according to law. He gave it to his son, a practising lawyer in the Court, with directions to file it, and have him discharged. He being obliged to go to another Court, which sat at the same time, delivered it to another attorney practising in the Superior Court of Spottsylvania, who promised to file it, and have the appellant discharged from his responsibility, as appearance bail. The attorney was also particularly solicited by a letter from the son of the appellant, which he received during the Term of the Court, to file the recognizance, and set aside the office judgment, in his behalf, as to Walden; and soliciting his attention to some other business for him in the Court, as he could not attend. This, however, by accident and the pressure of other business, the attorney failed to do; so that the office judgment stood confirmed, as well against the appellant as appearance bail, as against Walden. At the next Term of that Court, an effort was made to have the recognizance entered nunc pro tunc, but no relief could be had there. Walden, it is proved, has ever since been amendable to, and ready to answer, the process of Ca. Sa. had one been issued. None, however, has been taken out, in this case; but in some other case, he has been taken and discharged, under the act, as an insolvent debtor. In short, it would seem, that unless the bail is to pay this debt, the creditor must have lost it, by the insolvency of his debtor, there being no proof that he could have made it out of him. On the contrary, he obtained his judgment as early as possible, and at least one Term earlier than he would have obtained it, had the recognizance been filed; as the office judgment would have been set aside as to both, and a plea put in for the defendant Walden. No Ca. Sa. was taken, either because it was considered that it would be unavailing, or that not doing so, would more effectually fix the bail, by depriving him of the proof that would have resulted therefrom, that the plaintiff at law was in as good, and in indeed a better, situation, than he could have been in, had the recognizance been filed.

126 *I throw out of the case the reason assigned in the bill, that the appellant had important business which drew him to Richmond, about the time of the office judgment Court; so that he did not attend in person to the business, (there being no proof of that fact,) and rest the case simply on his confiding the recognizance to a regular attorney in the Court, with the directions above stated, and his agreeing to attend to it, &c.

Is it beyond the power of a Court of Equity to relieve against the accident which has occurred?

It seems to me, that much of the reasoning to shew that the Court has not this power, goes to prove that the bail must, at all events, and under all circumstances, see that the recognizance is filed, and the office judgment against him set aside. We cannot, however, go this far, without overruling the case of Smith & Moreton v. Wallace, 1 Wash. 254. In this, as in that case, the party had duly entered into a recognizance of special bail, and thereby became entitled, instantaneously, to surrender his principal. This new state of things, and these new rights, became vested in him under the law. 1 Rev. Code, 502. The question is, whether he has been deprived of these rights, in a way which it is beyond the power of a Court of Equity to relieve him against? Suppose he had taken his cepi corpus, and delivered his principal, and given notice that by accident, not proceeding from his culpable neglect, the recognizance had not been returned.

It seems to me, that the case above cited ought to be supported. The policy of the law in admitting bail is founded in humanity. No man can say to his debtor "I will hand you over to the Judge, and you shall remain in prison, until you pay the uttermost farthing." To prevent this, he is permitted to give appearance bail, who is entitled to enter himself special bail, and deliver his principal in his exoneration. Such bail has never been considered, whether appearance or special, as improperly interfering with the rights of the creditor. On the contrary, by the 127 *practice of the British Courts, and by our Statutes pursuing that policy, many and important favors, contrary to the letter of his undertaking, are extended to the bail. This was in furtherance of the humanity of the law, and to encourage men to prevent oppressive imprisonments. Thus the recognizance requires that the body shall be rendered to prison in execution; so that when a Ca. Sa. is issued, the officer may levy it. If this is not done, the recognizance is forfeited; yet the Courts, in favour of the bail, permitted him to surrender the body afterwards. This equitable favor was not denied him, because, peradventure, the debtor may have been able to pay the debt, had he been taken or rendered in execution on the Ca. Sa. and therefore no compensation can be made; nor would the actual proof of such fact deprive the bail of this equitable favor, on his receiving notice by Scire Facias that the body had not been taken in execution. But, in the case under consideration, as well as in our case, the debtor could have been had in execution; but it was more important to the creditor, if possible, to fix the bail, that being his only chance to get his debt. For these and other reasons, which I forbear at present to mention, I think that case ought not now to be over-ruled. Was that a stronger case, or one in which there was so much more diligence and precaution in the Sheriff, who stood as bail, than in the appellant in this case, as materially to vary this case from that? There a recognizance was entered into, but in a form, concerning which at least there were doubts. The clerk had refused to receive it at the Rules, and also in Court. This was known to the attorney of the Sheriff, and most probably, to the Sheriff himself, who being an officer of the Court, and whose business called him thither, would be likely to hear the orders read, and could more readily attend in person to the filing his recognizance, which he had been obliged to enter into in consequence of his default in not taking a bail bond. But, his attorney shewed the recognizance to the plaintiff's attorney, who agreeing to make no objections to 128 the form, *it was handed to the clerk; but instead of moving to set aside the office judgment, nothing was said; and the clerk, not having heard that the objection was waived by the plaintiff's attorney, and having twice before refused to receive it, of course took no notice of it. In that case too, there was a plea put in on behalf of the Sheriff, and of course the cause continued on the docket, and a further opportunity to give bail afforded, even down to the time when this plea was ultimately disposed of, and which could not have been disposed of, without the knowledge of the Sheriff or his attorney; unless indeed, it was neglected by both. Yet this neglect of the attorney in not explaining the matter to the clerk, in the first instance or moving the Court on the subject, at that or a subsequent Term, was not visited on the bail, who had entered into a legal recognizance; but which had thus failed of its legal effect. The Court say, "they are fully satisfied on the equity of this case. A more complete surprise can hardly be conceived. It would be strange, if an accident so mischievous as this in its effects, were beyond the reach of that Court, whose peculiar province it is, to grant relief in such cases. The negligence, with which the appellee is charged, is fully excused by the agreement of the counsel, and the mistake which followed." The party had entered into a recognizance, not in the accustomed form, though in reality a good one. This was remedied by the agreement of the counsel, that it was in sufficient form. His negligence in not seeing it entered of record, was excused, though the mistake arose from the failure of the attorney to make this agreement known to the clerk, in consequence of which, he, instead of setting aside the office judgment, put in a plea for the Sheriff, against whom the creditor finally obtained his judgment at law; and having done so, insisted that he had the law on his side, and equal equity. But, this argument did not prevail. In both cases, then, there was a legal recognizance entered into by the appearance bail, which, from mistake or accident, was not so acted upon as to produce its legal effect.

129 If there *is any material difference in these cases, as to who was guilty of the most neglect, it seems to me that it was in that case. Suppose Dickinson had attended in Court, had given the recognizance to his attorney, had seen him go to the clerk's table even, to have it filed; but the clerk being busy, or he interrupted by other business, had not done it at that moment, and then forgotten it; ought he to suffer? But this was substantially his case; nor was any plea put in for him, so as to delay the suit, and give him further time to file the recognizance.

But it is said, that in this case, as the recognizance was placed in the hands of the appearance bail, it was his duty to see that it was so dealt by as to have its legal effect; but that also was done in the above case. In that case, it is true, it was handed to the clerk; but by him it was considered as waste paper, and not noticed in the record, so as to avail the plaintiff on a Scire Facias, any more than in this case. He, therefore, had not the chance, in that case, any more than in this, of fixing the party as special bail.

The recognizance being entered into before the Judge, it is made his duty, by the law, to transmit it to the clerk. Suppose he had kept it in his pocket, intending to return it in person, when he went to the Court, but had mislaid or forgotten it; would the bail have been refused relief, because he did not attend at Court and see that it was filed and entered of record? There is nothing in the law imposing this duty on him. This was not held to be the law in the above case. Suppose the bail had informed the Judge, that his son was his attorney, who had promised to attend to the business for him, and desired him to deliver the recognizance to him, either before or at Court; and the Judge had taken this method of transmitting it to the clerk, but that by some mistake or accident, it had not been filed or entered of record, so as to give both parties the rights and remedies to which, by law, they would have been entitled? Could this case have been distinguished, injuriously to the relief sought, from that above cited? I

130 *think not. On the contrary, it seems to me, that if relief is refused in such case, it must be on the ground that the bail, at all events, must attend Court, and see that the recognizance is filed and legally proceeded in, or be ready to enter into another recognizance in Court. But, would not such a decision repeal the Act which enables bail who may not be able, or may not find it convenient to attend Court, to enter bail in the country? Why is this privilege allowed him, if he must attend Court in person, (whether the recognizance is entrusted to him or not,) and see that special bail is given? If he is to do this, he may as well enter bail in Court. How, too, could he take the body on the bail piece, and surrender it in his discharge before the office judgment Court, if that is not to avail, unless he, at all events, attends Court and sees the recognizance entered? He may be going out of the State, and unable to attend in person. If a transmission of a recognizance by a Judge, in the way above mentioned, or by any other safe messenger, would be a sufficient and legal discharge of his duty, whether it should fail or not, and would avail the bail, why shall not equal or greater precaution by the bail excuse him? It seems to me, if it does not, it must be, as above said, because he must, at all events, and in every case, see to its return and entry upon record.

It seems to me also, that this case cannot properly be likened to cases of contract, so as to make the decisions in the latter, applicable to it. There is no contract with the creditor, in consequence of which he parted with his property. The bail bond in its terms, is a contract with the Sheriff, who, on taking sufficient caution, is authorized to permit the debtor to go at large, instead of committing him to jail; indeed he is bound to receive such surety. If, on objection, the bail is adjudged insufficient, the Sheriff is liable at once, as if no bond had been taken. If the bail is not objected to, or is adjudged sufficient, instead of an assignment of this bond, and a suit on it, judgment is at once entered up against the bail, subject to be set aside

131 *on his entering, or some one else, entering himself as special bail. He does so, and is instantanly entitled to deliver the principal. This is the nature of his undertaking; and many cases, as before stated, shew the indulgence and favor of the Courts to the bail, which no Court could extend to ordinary sureties on contracts. The bail is considered as the jailor of the debtor, and these favors were extended, in order to promote the humane intentions of the law. Thus we see, if the defendant dies before Ca. Sa. the bail is exonerated. So, if he is guilty of felony and to be transported, he may be brought up by habeas corpus, so as to discharge the bail, although he is sent instantly to Newgate, so that the plaintiff cannot have him in execution. 2 Stra. 1207. If he is sent out under the alien act, the bail is entitled to an exoneretur, because no neglect is imputable, and the bail ought not to suffer in consequence of a law passed for the benefit of the public. Merrick v. Vaucher, 6 Term. Rep. 50. All these instances of favor to the bail, and a great variety of others which need not be noticed, surely go on the ground, that this undertaking is not to be considered in the nature of a contract between the bail and the creditor; but an undertaking sanctioned and encouraged by the law, for reasons of sound policy and humanity; and they equally go to prove, that it is no unjust or improper interference between the debtor and creditor. The cases in which Courts will not interfere, although an accident has occurred, unless compensation can be made, are cases of contracts. Here too, it is said, no compensation can be made, because we cannot say what chance the creditor would have had to get his debt, had special bail been entered. He might have got it on a Ca. Sa. or he had a chance to fix the bail, and we can make no calculation of what loss he may have sustained; and so the payment of the debt is the only safe standard, as we cannot place him in the same situation. It is true an accident has occurred without the fault of either, by which neither party can be placed in the situation they 132 were entitled, "but for it, to occupy.

In one respect, however, the creditor has occupied, and does occupy, all the rights he would have had, if the recognizance had been duly filed. He had it in his power, at the earliest possible time, to take his Ca. Sa. Suppose he had done so, and had taken the body. Of what could he, in justice, complain? He could not say, "I have lost my chance of fixing the bail, which I might have had, if the recognizance had been filed." He could only allege that injury, in case his Ca. Sa. had been returned "not found."

But from the allegations in the bill, and the proofs in this case, we are justified in considering it as one in which he had taken the body, as it is averred and appears, that he might at any time have done so. His debtor then was insolvent, and he could not get his debt out of him. He could not have fixed the bail, as special bail, because his Ca. Sa. would have been executed. His only chance to fix the bail, arises from the accident, which has prevented his standing as special bail. This cannot be called a chance. The thing has occurred; and it depends on this Court, whether this accident is to avail him.

But by this accident, the bail is deprived of his remedy of surrendering the body, which he would have had; and it is equally clear, that he could and would have done; whilst the appellee would only have had the remote possibility of fixing him on his failure to do so. The injury, therefore, to the bail, is much greater and more apparent, than to the creditor. Shall we oppose to this the mere possibility that he might have been fixed, and a debt, which he never contracted or contributed to contract, extorted from him, and which the appellee must have lost by an imprudent extension of a credit to an insolvent man, because of this accident? If we do, it must be, I think, because the decision of this Court, in the case above referred to, is wrong, and because accident is no ground for relief, in such a case. The appellee can only complain, that he has, by our decision, been deprived of a benefit,

133 which otherwise *would have resulted to him from this accident. He has no claim which touches the conscience of the appellant, and by the admonitions of which, he ought to pay this debt. It is at most, a case of strict summum jus. Can he, in good conscience, avail himself of a mere accident, by which the bail has been deprived of his remedy to surrender the body, and which, in justice, was all he could be asked to do, and which has always been ready, so that, in substance, the undertaking has been complied with? And shall he expect a Court of Equity, which looks to substance, to uphold his mere legal advantage, bottomed on nothing but pure accident? It seems to me, that he cannot be supported in such pretensions.

I think, therefore, that the decree ought to be reversed.

JUDGE CABELL concurred in opinion with Judge Carr, that the decree should be affirmed; which was accordingly done.

March, 1826.

Action for Freedom.—Strictness of Form.—The same strictness, as to form, is not required in actions for freedom, as in other cases.

Same.—Issue Irregular.—Effect of Verdict.—Where the defendant, in such an action, by his plea, protests that the plaintiff is his slave, and that he is not guilty of the assault, &c. the plaintiff replies that "by reason of any thing by the defendant in protesting alleged he ought not to be barred, &c." because he is a free person, and issue is joined on this replication: this issue, although irregular, will be sustained after verdict.

Same.—Judgment.—Surplusage.—Where the judgment directs that the plaintiff shall recover his freedom, "and that he be discharged from the imprisonment in the declaration complained of," the latter clause will be regarded as mere surplusage, as the first part of the judgment had the effect to discharge the plaintiff from the custody of the defendant.

This was a suit for freedom, in the Superior Court of Law for the county of Ohio, brought by Amos for the benefit of himself, and that of his infant brother, sisters and niece. The declaration is in the usual form of trespass, assault and battery, and false imprisonment.

The defendant, M'Michen, pleaded, "protesting that the plaintiffs are his slaves for life, says he is not guilty of the trespass, assault and imprisonment in the declaration supposed, and of this he puts himself upon the country."

The plaintiffs replied, "that by reason of any thing by the defendant in protesting alleged, they ought not to be barred from having and maintaining their action against him, because they say they are free persons."

Upon this replication issue was joined.

The jury found the following verdict: "That they find for the plaintiffs their freedom, and one cent damages, sub-135 ject *to the opinion of the Court, whether the removal of Richard Wetherhead, with his family, from the State of Maryland, to the county of Rockingham in this State, in the month of November, 1800, and the bringing with him the plaintiffs, and the taking of the oath prescribed by law, within 60 days from his arrival in the said county of Rockingham, by Elizabeth the wife of the said Richard, was a compliance of the law regulating the importation of slaves. If, in the opinion of the Court, the law be for the defendant, then they find for the defendant."

The Court gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and added, "It is therefore considered by the Court, that the plaintiffs recover of the defendant one cent, the damages assessed by the said jury, together with their freedom, and that they be discharged from the imprisonment in the declaration complained of." From this judgment the defendant appealed.

Johnson, for the appellant.

Leigh, for the appellees.

March 1. JUDGE CABELL delivered his opinion, in which the other Judges concurred.*

Several objections were made by the counsel for the appellant, to the form of the proceedings in this case. Before I examine them, I will remark that this Court has often declared, that the same strictness as to form will not be required in actions for freedom, as in other cases; and that these actions, like actions of ejectment, will be moulded into such form, as is best calculated to try the real question in controversy.

The first objection is, that the issue was not joined on the plea of not guilty, but on the protestation in that plea 136 *that the plaintiffs were the slaves of the defendant. It is very true that that was an irregularity; but as the issue was joined upon the fact whether the plaintiffs were free or not, the merits of the controversy between the parties were fairly brought in issue; and it is too late, after verdict, to take advantage of the informality in joining the issue.

The next objection is, that the judgment directs the plaintiffs to be discharged from the imprisonment in the declaration complained of. The judgment that the plaintiffs recover their freedom, and the damages assessed by the jury, had the full effect to discharge them from the custody of the defendant; the additional direction complained of, was, therefore, mere surplusage, which cannot vitiate the judgment. Nor would any useful purpose be answered by the correction of this irregularity, since no question of costs is involved.

It was next objected, that judgment should have been rendered for Amos only; because he alone declared as plaintiff, suing for himself and the other petitioners, who were infants; and it was contended, that if the verdict had been for the defendant, a judgment thereon would have been no bar to a new suit by the others. Although the declaration was, in this respect, informal; yet I think that all the petitioners were substantially plaintiffs; and as their case was fairly tried, had it been against them, it would have been so far a bar, as that no Court would have given them permission to bring another suit. The declaration in the case of Maria v. Surbaugh, 2 Rand. 228, was in the same form; yet it did not preclude the Court from deciding the merits of the case, as to the children of Maria.

I come now to the more important questions made in this case.

The verdict of the jury is as follows: "We find for the plaintiffs their freedom and one cent damages; subject to the opinion of the Court, whether the removal of Richard Wetherhead, with his family, from the State of Maryland to the county of Rockingham, in this State, in the 137 month *of November, 1800, and the bringing with him the plaintiffs, and the taking the oath prescribed by law, within 60 days after his arrival, in the county of Rockingham, by Elizabeth, the wife of the said Richard, was a compliance with the law regulating the importation of slaves. If, in the opinion of the Court, the law be for the defendant, then we find for the defendant."

It is contended by the counsel for the appellant, that this verdict is too imperfect, on account of its uncertainty, to enable the Court or render judgment.

This is not a special verdict, in the usual acceptation of the term; a verdict, finding all the facts supposed to belong to the case, and referring to the Court the decision of the law arising on those facts. The jury do not profess to find all the facts which constitute the case. On the contrary, the finding is a general one, that the plaintiffs are free, unless, upon a single point of law reserved, the Court shall be of opinion that the law is for the defendant. There can be no difficulty in comprehending the true nature of a verdict like this, although writers, in attempting to name it, may not have been fortunate in using terms of great precision. In 2 Tidd's Prac. 809, it is said, "another method of finding a species of special verdict is, when the jury find a verdict generally for either party, but subject nevertheless, to the opinion of the Court above, on a special case, stated by the counsel on both sides, with regard to a matter of law." In 1 Archbold, 192, it is said, "also where a difficulty in point of law arises, the jury may, instead of finding a special verdict, find a general verdict, for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Judge, or the Court above, on a special case stated by the counsel on both sides, with regard to the matter of law." It is not material, whether, with one of these writers, we call this proceeding "a species of special verdict," or with the other, "a general verdict," with "a special case." They both mean the same thing; a general conclusion drawn by the jury, from the facts, in favor of one or the other party; subject, however, to the opinion of 138 the *Court as to the law arising on a case specially stated by the jury. Such a general conclusion for one party, necessarily carries with it the idea that that party must prevail, unless the law upon the special case referred to the Court, shall be against him. All facts, not found in the special case, are excluded from the consideration of the Court, or are negative by the general finding in his favor. The "special case" would be nugatory, if the Court were to go out of it.

The case specially stated by the jury, is, that Richard Wetherhead removed with his family from Maryland to Rockingham county in Virginia, in November, 1800, and brought with him the plaintiffs; and that Elizabeth, the wife of the said Richard, within 60 days after his arrival in Rockingham, took the oath prescribed by law; and the question submitted by the jury is, whether the taking of the oath by the wife, was a compliance with the law regulating the importation of slaves.

The Act of 1792, Rev. Code, ch. 103, prohibited the importation of slaves, but contained an exception in favor of persons removing from any other State, and becoming citizens of this, and bringing slaves with them, provided that within 60 days after such removal, they take, before some Justice of the Peace, a certain oath therein prescribed: the substance of which was, that the slaves, brought in by them were not brought in with intention to sell them, nor were they imported from Africa, or the West Indies, &c.

Whether the wife of a person removing to his State, and bringing slaves with him, can take the oath to any legal purpose, merely because she is wife, was admitted to be too plain for argument; for she cannot swear as to the intention of the husband, nor is she the person bringing the slaves; and yet this is the only question submitted by the jury. The language of the jury is plain and unequivocal, and will not bear any other rational construction.

But it is said, that this question is so plain that we cannot presume the parties intended to submit it: that no
 139 *lawyer would have made it, nor would the Judge have suffered it to be put upon the record. This is, indeed, a novel argument. If the records of this Court be searched, it would be found that questions as plain (plainer there could not be) have been often made, and in some instances, incorrectly decided, in the Inferior Courts. It would be strange indeed, if the very plainness of the case were to be made the only foundation of doubts and difficulties.

It is however contended, that there may be cases in which the wife may be the proper person to take the oath, as where the slaves are her separate property, or where they are held by her as a trustee, or as executrix or administratrix, &c. But, I think it very clear, from the positive finding of the jury, that the jury did not mean to submit a question on any such case. I think it very manifest, that the Act of Assembly intended the oath to be taken by the proprietor of the slaves; although the proprietor is not otherwise described than as the person removing and bringing the slaves with him. When, therefore, the jury speak of Richard Wetherhead, and apply to him the very words found in the Act of Assembly, removing and bringing the slaves with him, they intended to speak of him as the proprietor; and when they speak of the wife, they speak of her merely as wife. Besides, if the wife had been the proprietor, it cannot for a moment be believed, that the jury would have been permitted to be silent as to a fact, which must have been known to the counsel and the Court, to be so important to the correct decision of the cause. But be this as it may, it is sufficient to say, that it does not appear by the verdict, that any of the supposed cases existed, or were alleged by the parties to exist; or if alleged to exist, the jury have negatived it, by not finding it to exist. No verdict of this kind could ever stand, if the party or the Court were allowed to suppose facts, not found in the special case. It is not necessary that the jury shall expressly find, that certain facts do not exist. The mere silence of the jury

140 *that no facts exist, repugnant to the general conclusion they have drawn in favor of the party. In the case of Hook v. Nanny, 2 Munf. 379, (which, like this, was a case for freedom,) the jury find certain facts, and then conclude, "we therefore find the plaintiffs free." Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, and was affirmed by the unanimous opinion of this Court. Judge Coalter remarked, "The jury, in this case, find two facts: 1. That Nanny was brought into this Commonwealth by Jones, from North Carolina, subsequent to the 5th of October, 1778. 2. They also find from inspection, that the plaintiff is a white woman. I say nothing," (adds the Judge,) "of the other finding, viz: 'that if the plaintiff was a slave, it doth not appear that Jones did comply with the provisions of the Act to prevent the farther importation of slaves,' because, (says the Judge,) the jury need not find the negative of a fact, which the defendant must shew, in order to support his plea of justification. That part of the verdict, therefore, must be clearly rejected as surplusage. The case will stand upon the other two facts, accompanied by the general finding that the plaintiffs are free. The facts aforesaid are entirely distinct in their nature, and not depending at all on the same testimony; and either of them, if found upon proper legal testimony, will entitle the party, ipso facto, to freedom, unless the defendant can shew something to take his case out of their influence." In the case of Garnet v. Sam, 5 Munf. 542, the same principle is advanced by this Court. Suppose, in the case before us, the jury had found the plaintiffs free, subject to the opinion of the Court, on the following fact; that Wetherhead removed from Maryland to this State, in the year 1800, bringing the plaintiffs with him as slaves. Most unquestionably, this Court would adjudge them to be free. But, as it was proved to the jury, that the wife took the oath, they submit the single question, whether this taking of the oath was a compliance with the law; and as it is admitted that it was not, I cannot see how it can make the case of the defendant better than if it had not been stated at all.

141 *The objection, therefore, as to the uncertainty of the verdict, is without foundation.

It is said, that according to the principles established in Garnet v. Sam & Co., 5 Munf. 542, and Abram & Co. v. Matthews, 6 Munf. 159, it might have been left to the jury, to presume from the facts found, that the wife, in this case, was the proper person to take the oath. In both of these cases, more than 20 years had elapsed, between the importation of the slaves and the commencement of the action; and it was decided, that such a lapse of time should be left to the jury as the foundation of a presumption, that the oath required by law had been rightly taken. And considering the great difficulty which would generally attend the proving such a fact, after such a lapse of time, nothing could be more reasonable than such a presumption. But such presumption, however well founded, was liable to be repelled by proofs. In the present case, the time was short of 20 years. It is not pretended that the husband took the oath. That fact is negatived by the express finding, that the oath was taken by the wife. The facts, which alone could justify the oath by the wife, do not depend upon such fugitive testimony, as did the fact presumed in the cases referred to. If the wife had the separate property in the slaves, or if she were trustee, executrix or administratrix, such fact might have been proved by testimony in writing or on record; or, if that evidence had been lost, its former existence might have been established by parol testimony; or, if the husband had died within the 60 days, that fact, (admitting it to be sufficient to justify the oath by the wife,) was very different from the fact presumed in the cases referred to. It did not depend upon the testimony of a single witness who may have died. It must have been a fact of notoriety, and susceptible of easy proof. I therefore think it ought not to have been left to the jury, to presume such facts as would justify the wife in taking the oath, until at least 20 years had elapsed. But be this as it may, we do not know that any such question 142 *was made at the trial; and it is now too late to make it. If such presumption was pressed on the jury, it might have been, and probably was, repelled by opposing testimony. The jury have not, in fact, made any such presumption; and it is not competent to the Court to make it for them.

But it is contended, that the right of the appellees to freedom, under the Act of 1792, was taken away by the Act of 1819, which releases all forfeitures and penalties incurred under former laws, and not already recovered or enforced. 1 Rev. Code, 422, sec. 4. It may be admitted, that the right of a slave to be free, in consequence of being imported contrary to the Act of 1792, was a forfeiture imposed upon the owner, by way of penalty. But at the very moment that this forfeiture was incurred by the owner, under that Act, a perfect right to freedom vested in the slave, by the same Act. I call it a perfect right, because its enjoyment might be enforced by due course of law, the moment it vested; and it vested as soon as the violation of the law was complete; viz: as soon as 12 months elapsed from the importation. He was from that moment a free man "illegally held in slavery." If it were not so, he could never recover freedom; for, it is the business of Courts, not to create, but only to enforce existing rights. Again, our laws declare, "that all children shall be bond or free, according to the condition of the mother." Maria v. Surbaugh, 2 Rand. 228. If a female slave had been brought into this State, under the Act of 1792, had remained here 12 months, (the requisites of the law not being complied with,) and then had had a child, and died; it is perfectly clear, that such child would be entitled to, and would receive his freedom; and this decisively proves, that the mother was in fact, free, although she had not been declared so by the judgment of a Court of Law. The Act of 1819 contemplated cases, in which rights might be absolutely vested under former laws, which were not intended to be disturbed; and also cases in which forfeitures had been incurred, where no right had vested in any particular persons. The Act of 1806

143 afforded instances of this latter description. That Act declares, that an illegal importer of slaves shall forfeit all right to the slaves, and that such right shall vest in the overseers of the poor of any county, who should apprehend, or attempt to apprehend them. The right forfeited by the owner, did not vest, however, in any one, until the slaves were apprehended, or until an attempt was made to apprehend them. These were the forfeitures, and such as these, that the Act of 1819 intended to remit; and such remission violated the rights of no one. But under the Act of 1792, a right to freedom was actually vested in the imported slaves; and it was the intention of the Act of 1819, to preserve that right.

The judgment must be affirmed.

- I. GENERAL VERDICT.

Separate Verdict, Where Two Persons Tried Jointly.—Where two persons are indicted and tried jointly for the same offense the same jury may, by separate verdicts, acquit the one and convict the other. State v. Lilly, 47 W. Va. 496, 35 S. E. Rep. 837.

Exceeding Authority in Fixing Penalty, Surplusage.—And, it is held in State v. Greer, 22 W. Va. 829, that, though a jury have no authority to fix the term of imprisonment, yet, if they do, it is mere surplusage, and the verdict of guilty is good.

On Single Count Alleging Burglary and Larceny.—Upon a count properly alleging both burglary and larceny, there may be a general verdict of guilty. State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 380, 13 S. E. Rep. 664. See State v. Williams, 40 W. Va. 263, 21 S. E. Rep. 721; Speers v. Com., 17 Gratt. 570; Moody v. State, 1 W. Va. 337.

When Grand, and Petit, Larceny Charged.—And, upon an indictment for grand larceny a verdict convicting of petit larceny is good, as the major includes the minor offense. State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 655. See Howe's Case, 26 W. Va. 110; Hardy v. Com., 17 Gratt. 593; Canada v. Com., 23 Gratt. 899; Ex parte Garrison, 35 W. Va. 686, 15 S. E. Rep. 418; State v. Meadows, 18 W. Va. 660.

Where More than One Count.—Although an indictment may contain more than one count, a verdict of "guilty as charged in the indictment," is good. Moody v. State, 1 W. Va. 340.

One Good, and Other Bad, Counts.—But, a good count in the indictment, where there are others which are bad, will not support a general verdict of guilty, when the offenses are punishable by confinement in the penitentiary. Clere v. Com., 3 Gratt. 615; Mowbray v. Com., 11 Leigh 643; Shiffet v. Com., 14 Gratt. 673; Jones v. Com., 36 Va. 951, 12 S. E. Rep. 950. See Kirk v. Com., 9 Leigh 637 (overruled).

II. FORM OF GENERAL VERDICT.

A. DUTY OF COURT.—Trial courts should see that verdicts are put in proper form before juries are discharged, but if any change is made in the substance of the verdict, the jury should be sent back to their room, where they can, untrammelled by the presence and influence of others, find such verdict as they think proper. Porterfield v. Com., 91 Va. 807, 23 S. E. Rep. 352.

B. IN CIVIL CASES.

In Ejectment.—In ejectment, the verdict read, "we, the jury, find for the plaintiff the land in the declaration mentioned, and one cent damages," which, it seems, was sufficient in form. M'Murray v. Oneals, 1 Call 249.

And on a plea of not guilty to a declaration in ejectment, that defendant unlawfully withhold possession of land, the verdict was, "we, the jury find that the defendant does not withhold possession of the land in the declaration mentioned, as alleged, and therefore find for the defendant on the issue joined," which was good in form. Andrews v. Roseland Iron & Coal Co., 89 Va. 395, 16 S. E. Rep. 255.

On Writ of Unlawful Detainer.—A verdict in a writ of unlawful detainer, reading, "we, the jury, find that the defendants are unlawfully in possession and withhold from the plaintiffs the premises in the summons mentioned," is sufficient to enter judgment upon. Mann v. Bryant, 12 W. Va. 519. See Paul v. Smiley, 4 Munf. 468; M'Murray v. Oneal, 1 Call 246.

In Action of Trespass.—A verdict in an action of trespass on the case, reading, "we, the jury, find for the defendants," is good, the plea being "not guilty." Peters v. Johnson, 50 W. Va. 644, 41 S. E. Rep. 190; Lewis v. Childers, 13 W. Va. 1.

1. PROPER FORM ON DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.—In an action on notes, the only defense set up is for damages by way of special set-off and plaintiff demurs to defendant's evidence, it seems, the proper form of verdict would be, "we, the jury, upon the issue joined, find for the defendant and assess his damages at a stated sum, subject to the opinion of the court upon the plaintiff's demurrer to the evidence; but if, upon the demurrer to the evidence, the law be with the plaintiff, then we find for the plaintiff the sum ascertained to be due him." Southern Roanoke L. Co. v. Roberts, 99 Va. 490, 39 S. E. Rep. 138.

C. IN CRIMINAL CASES.—When the record shows that a verdict was delivered in open court, it is immaterial that it does not show the verdict was assigned. Hall v. Com., 89 Va. 180, 15 S. E. Rep. 517; Woods v. Com., 86 Va. 934, 11 S. E. Rep. 799; Crump v. Com., 98 Va. 835, 23 S. E. Rep. 760. See also, State v. Morgan, 35 W. Va. 260, 13 S. E. Rep. 385.

And so, the verdict is sufficient in form if signed by J. S. Pierpont, though the record shows Jeremiah S. Pierpont was the juryman sworn. State v. Morgan, 35 W. Va. 260, 13 S. E. Rep. 385.

On Charge of Murder.—"We, the jury, agree and find the defendant, Virgil Staley, not guilty of murder in the first or second degree, as charged in the within indictment, but do agree and find the defendant, Virgil Staley, guilty of voluntary manslaughter," is sufficient in form. State v. Staley, 45 W. Va. 792, 32 S. E. Rep. 198.

And, on an indictment charging one as principal in the second degree to a murder, a verdict which finds the accused "guilty, as charged in the indictment," and fixes his punishment, is sufficient. Horton v. Com., 99 Va. 848, 38 S. E. Rep. 184.

On Charge of Breaking and Entering.—A verdict finding defendant guilty of breaking and entering the store of a certain firm is sufficient, although it does not set out the individual names of the partners as alleged in the indictment. Henderson v. Com., 98 Va. 794, 34 S. E. Rep. 881.

On Charge of Malicious Stabbing.—On a trial for "maliciously stabbing with intent to maim, disfigure, disable and kill," a verdict finding "the defendant not guilty as charged," but finding him "guilty of unlawful cutting," is not good in form. State v. Davis, 31 W. Va. 390, 7 S. E. Rep. 24.

III. REQUISITES OF GENERAL VERDICT.

A. DELIBERATION.

Jury in Charge of Witness.—The verdict of a jury in a criminal case will not be set aside merely because the jury was put in custody of a deputy sheriff who had testified for the commonwealth. Reed's Case, 98 Va. 817, 830, 36 S. E. Rep. 399.

Compromise.—And when the jury agree as to the guilt of the prisoner, but disagree as to term of imprisonment, it does not affect the verdict that the term of imprisonment is arrived at by average. Thompson v. Com., 8 Gratt. 637.

B. UNANIMITY.

Presence of Juror.—The verdict of the jury must be unanimous; and, therefore, if the twelfth juror retires from the court before the verdict is written and received, such verdict is a nullity. Com. v. Gibson, 2 Va. Cas. 73.

And so, on trial for grand larceny the jury find prisoner guilty but fail to fix term of imprisonment, and are discharged, but instantly called back, all but one, and then fix the punishment. The verdict was bad. Mills v. Com., 7 Leigh 751.

C. CONFORMITY TO INSTRUCTIONS.—Though a verdict be contrary to the instructions, yet, if there was no evidence to prove the case supposed by them, it will not be set aside. Smith v. Tate, 82 Va. 667.

D. RESPONSIVENESS TO ISSUE.

1. GENERALLY.—The verdict of a jury which necessarily disposes of all the issues in the case, is sufficient, although it may not respond separately to each several issue presented by the pleadings. Black v. Thomas, 21 W. Va. 711. See Lewis v. Childers, 18 W. Va. 1; Lanier v. Harwell, 6 Munf. 79.

But where a verdict contains matter of fact which is immaterial, and not responsive to the issue, such matter may be rejected as surplusage, and the verdict shall stand if the remaining portion is responsive to the issue, and not open to any further objection. Martin v. Ohio River R. Co., 37 W. Va. 349, 16 S. E. Rep. 569.

a. In Particular Instances.

Actions of Assumpsit.—Where, in an action of assumpsit, the pleas upon which issue is joined are nonassumpsit, payment and set-off, and the verdict found for the plaintiff assess the amount of his damages, and, also, fixes the amount allowed the defendant on his set-off, it is all that is necessary. Smith v. Packard, 94 Va. 730, 27 S. E. Rep. 586.

So, too, in an action of assumpsit, where the pleas are nonassumpsit, and the statute of limitations, a general verdict for the plaintiff, fixing the amount of his damages, is responsive to all the issues made by the pleadings. Hansbrough v. Neal, 94 Va. 729, 27 S. E. Rep. 593.

Where Title Only Issue in Ejectment.—In ejectment, where issue is the title only, a verdict may be found and judgment rendered for a tract of land, "according to a survey filed in the cause." Paul v. Smiley, 4 Munf. 468. Compare Gregory v. Jackson, 6 Munf. 26.

In Ejectment, Must Find Estate in Plaintiff.—But the verdict in an ejectment case is fatally defective, if it finds the plaintiff is entitled to recover the lands mentioned in the declaration, but fails to find the estate found in the plaintiff. Low v. Settle, 23 W. Va. 388. Compare M'Murray v. Oneal, 1 Call 246; Elliott v. Sutor, 3 W. Va. 37; Tapscott v. Cobbs, 11 Gratt. 172.

In Detinue.—In detinue, defendant pleaded non-detinue and special plea in bar, to which pleas there was general replication, denying the truth of them, and issue joined. A general verdict for plaintiff was sufficiently responsive to both issues. Garland v. Bugg, 1 Hen. & M. 375.

In Trespass.—And, where, in an action of trespass on the case, the verdict reads, "we, the jury, find for the defendants," it is sufficient, as responsive to the issue. Peters v. Johnson, 50 W. Va. 644, 41 S. E. Rep. 190.

Suits on Administrator's Bond.—In suit on administrator's bond the verdict must find that, at the institution of the action there were in the hands of the representative assets, not bound by superior claims, sufficient to discharge plaintiff's debt. Sturdivant v. Raines, 1 Leigh 482. See Eppes v. Smith, 4 Munf. 466; Rogers v. Chandler, 3 Munf. 66; Gardner v. Vidal, 6 Rand. 106; Booth v. Armstrong, 2 Wash. 301.

Two Issues in Fact.—But where there are two issues in fact, and the verdict of the jury answers to only one, there ought to be a venire facias de novo. Hite v. Wilson, 2 Hen. & M. 268; Brown v. Henderson, 4 Munf. 492. See Nicholas v. Kershner, 20 W. Va. 262; Williams v. Ewart, 29 W. Va. 659, 2 S. E. Rep. 861.

E. CERTAINTY OF FINDING.

1. IN CIVIL CASES.

a. Sufficient.

In Action for Waste.—If the verdict finds defendant guilty of waste, as charged, and then proceeds to assess the damages for the particular parts of the waste charged, but does not set out the locus in quo, nor find any part of the issue for defendant, it is sufficient. Dejarnette v. Allen, 5 Gratt. 499.

On Promissory Note.—And a verdict for the debt claimed in the declaration, with interest, etc., subject to a credit for a specified sum, paid at a specified date, is sufficiently certain. Barrett v. Wills, 4 Leigh 114. See Grays v. Hines, 4 Munf. 437.

Action for Damages.—When a verdict assess "damages for the loss of one-half of a spring at $600, and of fourteen acres of land at $540, and directs these sums to be applied to bonds as they fall due," it will not be set aside as vague and uncertain. Grayson v. Buchanan, 88 Va. 257, 18 S. E. Rep. 457.

In Ejectment.—And so, where the jury find land was devised to "James instead of Jacobus," it is a mistake that may be corrected by the other part of the finding that "he is the lessor." Pendleton v. Vandevier, 1 Wash. 388.

b. Insufficient.

If for a Part, What Must Find.—But, in an action of ejectment, if the verdict is for only a part of the land sued for, the boundaries of the part recovered should be designated. The verdict must be certain in itself, or must refer to some certain standard by which to ascertain the land so found, otherwise it will be too uncertain to warrant a judgment upon it. Slocum v. Compton, 98 Va. 375, 25 S. E. Rep. 3.

Libel, in Admiralty.—Certainty being one of the elements of a verdict, it is held that, a verdict for "the vessel, tackle, apparel and cargo, except that part of the cargo upon which the duties had been paid," was too uncertain. Richards v. Tabb, 4 Call 522.

On Bond.—And where suit is brought against two persons on a bond, and it abates as to one by his death, a verdict finding only, that the surviving defendant hath not paid the debt, is bad. Triplett v. Micou, 1 Rand. 269. See also Green v. Dulany, 2 Munf. 518; Buckner v. Blair, 2 Munf. 336.

2. IN CRIMINAL CASES.

a. Sufficient.

(1) Rule.—The verdict in a criminal case is always to be read in connection with the indictment, and if, upon reading them together, the meaning of the verdict is certain, it is sufficient. It need not give the name of the prisoner, nor the person assaulted. Hairston v. Com., 97 Va. 754, 32 S. E. Rep. 797. See Hoback v. Com., 28 Gratt. 922; Rogers v. Com., 1 Va. Dec. 798; Henderson v. Com., 98 Va. 794, 34 S. E. Rep. 861.

Malicious Shooting.—In Hoback v. Com., 28 Gratt.

922, the accused was indicted for malicious shooting, and the jury found him "not guilty of malicious shooting, as charged, but guilty of unlawful shooting with intent to maim," etc., it was held the verdict was to be read in connection with the indictment, and sufficiently indicated the person. See Hairston v. Com., 97 Va. 754, 32 S. E. Rep. 797.

b. Insufficient.

Forgery.—Indictment charges forgery of a note in first count, and, in the second, the forgery of an indorsement on the note, jury finds prisoner not guilty on the first count, and then say, "on the second count, viz., that of uttering a negotiable note knowing it to be forged, we find prisoner guilty, and fix the term of his imprisonment," etc. The verdict upon the second count is too uncertain. Cocke v. Com., 13 Gratt. 750.

Breaking and Entering.—And where accused was indicted for breaking into a storehouse and stealing more than four dollars, the verdict found him guilty of grand larceny and fixed his imprisonment at seven years. It was held too uncertain to render judgment upon. Com. v. Smith, 3 Va. Cas. 327.

Fixing Shorter Term than Law Allows.—Also, the verdict of a jury, finding a prisoner guilty, and fixing his imprisonment at a shorter term than the law allows is illegal. Nemo v. Com., 2 Gratt. 559. See Jones v. Com., 20 Gratt. 848; Richards v. Com., 81 Va. 116; Ex parte Marx, 86 Va. 46, 9 S. E. Rep. 475; Com. v. Smith, 3 Va. Cas. 327; Com. v. Percavill, 4 Leigh 687; Mills v. Com., 7 Leigh 751; Marshall v. Com., 5 Gratt. 663; Com. v. Scott, 5 Gratt. 607.

And, if one be indicted as accessory to murder, a verdict which finds him guilty thereof, but does not say whether he is guilty as accessory in the first or second degree is bad. Com. v. Williamson, 2 Va. Cas. 211.

F. REFERRING TO INDICTMENT.—Where, on a sufficient indictment, the jury "find the prisoner guilty, and fix his punishment at eighteen years in the penitentiary," the verdict is not bad because it fails to refer explicitly to the indictment. Rogers v. Com., 1 Va. Dec. 798.

G. SIGNING.—Where a verdict is duly delivered in court and recorded, though unsigned, it is sufficient. Woods v. Com., 86 Va. 934, 11 S. E. Rep. 799. See Hall v. Com., 89 Va. 180, 15 S. E. Rep. 517; Crump v. Com., 98 Va. 833, 23 S. E. Rep. 760; Gilligan's Case, 99 Va. 816, 37 S. E. Rep. 962.

H. PERFECTING.—After a verdict for felony has been received and read, it is the duty of the clerk, to duly perfect it, to read it over to the jury, and to poll them, and say, "So say you all," or words to that effect. Until this is done any one has a right to retract. Com. v. Gibson, 2 Va. Cas. 70.

I. IMPEACHING.—As a general rule, a verdict cannot be impeached by testimony of jurors of their own misconduct. Bull v. Com., 14 Gratt. 613. See sustaining this view, Shobe v. Bell, 1 Rand. 39; Harnsbarger v. Kinney, 6 Gratt. 287; Carr v. Magruder, 2 Pat. & H. 107; Koerner v. Rankin, 11 Gratt. 420; Price v. Warren, 1 Hen. & M. 385; Read's Case, 22 Gratt. 924; State v. Cartright, 20 W. Va. 32; Stephoe v. Flood, 31 Gratt. 323; Danville Bank v. Waddill, 31 Gratt. 469; Moses v. Cromwell, 78 Va. 671; Probst v. Braeunlich, 24 W. Va. 358; Bartlett v. Patton, 38 W. Va. 71, 10 S. E. Rep. 21; Graham v. Cit. Nat. Bank, 45 W. Va. 701, 32 S. E. Rep. 245; Elam v. Com. Bank, 86 Va. 92, 9 S. E. Rep. 498; State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713. But see contra, Cochran v. Street, 1 Wash. 79; Moffett v. Bowman, 6 Gratt. 219; State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713; Wormley's Case, 8 Gratt. 712.

In the following cases, however, the affidavits of jurors were read in support of their verdict, though no rule, it seems, is laid down as to when such affdaivts will be admitted. See generally, McCaul's Case, 1 Va. Cas. 371; Kennedy's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 510; Overbee's Case, 1 Rob. 756; McCarter's Case, 11 Leigh 633; Thompson's Case, 8 Gratt. 637; Read's Case, 22 Gratt. 924; State v. Cartright, 20 W. Va. 32; State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713.

IV. AMOUNT FOUND BY VERDICT.

A. EXCESSIVE.—A verdict for $2,500, as compensation for a broken leg and much consequent suffering, will not be set aside as excessive, in the absence of evidence that the jury were actuated by improper motives, gross error, or misconception of the subject. Newport News, etc., R. Co. v. Bradford, 100 Va. 232, 40 S. E. Rep. 900. See N. & W. R. Co. v. Shott, 92 Va. 47, 22 S. E. Rep. 811; Young v. W. Va. & P. R. Co., 44 W. Va. 218, 28 S. E. Rep. 932; Trice v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 40 W. Va. 271, 21 S. E. Rep. 1022; Pegram v. Stortz, 81 W. Va. 220, 6 S. E. Rep. 486; Battrell v. Ohio River R. Co., 34 W. Va. 232, 12 S. E. Rep. 699; N. & W. R. Co. v. Nighbert, 46 W. Va. 202, 32 S. E. Rep. 1032; Moses v. Cromwell, 78 Va. 676.

Finding Less than Amount Claimed.—And a verdict is not excessive which is not only supported by evidence in the case, but is for a less sum than that fixed by some of the witnesses. Barnes v. Morrison, 97 Va. 372, 34 S. E. Rep. 93.

B. CERTAINTY.

In Action of Debt.—In an action of debt on a bond, with credits indorsed thereon, a verdict "for the debt in the declaration mentioned," is erroneous, though the plaintiff in court offer to release so much thereof as is equal to the credits endorsed on the bond. Grays v. Hines, 4 Munf. 437. And see Early v. Moore, 4 Munf. 262.

But, where there is a verdict for the debt claimed in the declaration, with interest, subject to a credit, specifying the sum, it is certain enough as to amount. Barrett v. Wills, 4 Leigh 114, distinguishing Grays v. Hines, 4 Munf. 437.

In Action of Assumpsit.—In an action of assumpsit the declaration consisted of the common counts and three special counts, to which was demurrer overruled, genera lissue, plea of payments, with account, plea of set-off, with account and special plea in the nature of set-off. The verdict found for the plaintiff and assessed the amount of his damages, and also fixed the amount allowed the defendant on his set-offs, which was held free from confusion, so that proper judgment could be entered thereon. Smith v. Packard, 94 Va. 730, 27 S. E. Rep. 586.

In Action for Recovery of Personal Property.—A verdict in an action for the recovery of personal property must find the value of the property, and of each article sued for, as in the action of detainee. White v. Emblem, 43 W. Va. 819, 28 S. E. Rep. 761.

V. RENDITION AND RECEPTION OF VERDICT.

A. IN CRIMINAL CASES.—It has been uniformly held that it is absolutely necessary to a valid conviction that the prisoner shall be present in court when anything is done in his case in any way affecting his interests. State v. Greer, 22 W. Va. 811. See Sperry's Case, 9 Leigh 623; Hooker's Case, 13 Gratt. 763; Jackson v. Com., 19 Gratt. 666.

B. IN CIVIL CASES.—Parties cannot, by their consent, authorize a jury to render their verdict to the clerk, in the absence of the judge, and be discharged. If a verdict is so rendered, and the jury discharged, it is no verdict. B. & O. R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Gratt. 449. But in McMurray v. Oneal, 1 Call 246, it was held, if the agreement of parties that the jury may render privy verdict be substantially performed, it is sufficient.

VI. EFFECT OF THE GENERAL VERDICT.

A. GENERAL RULE.—The verdict of a jury is entitled to great respect, and should not be set aside even by the trial court, unless plainly against the weight of the evidence. Humphreys v. Valley R. Co., 100 Va. 749, 42 S. E. Rep. 893; Miller v. Ins. Co., 13 W. Va. 116; State v. Bowyer, 43 W. Va. 180, 27 S. E. Rep. 301; Miller v. White, 46 W. Va. 67, 33 S. E. Rep. 332; Whitehurst v. Com., 79 Va. 562; Jones v. C. & O. R. R. Co., 14 W. Va. 514.

And though the verdict be contrary to the instructions, yet, if there was no evidence to prove the case supposed by them, it will not be set aside. Smith v. Tate, 83 Va. 667.

1. ILLUSTRATION OF RULE.

a. In Civil Cases.

Determining Negligence of Parties.—Where a case involving the determination of the negligence of defendant, and the contributory negligence of the plaintiff has been fairly submitted to the jury, under proper instructions, their verdict cannot be disturbed unless it is plainly in violation of the law, or is without evidence to support it. Newport News, etc., R. Co. v. Bradford, 100 Va. 241, 40 S. E. Rep. 900.

Recovery of Money on Rescinded Contract.—And, in an action to recover back money paid on a contract which the plaintiff has treated as rescinded, the court will not set aside a verdict in favor of plaintiff, where the evidence shows that the conduct of defendant has been such as to amount to a rescission on his part, or to justify one on the part of plaintiff. Buena Vista Co. v. McCandlish, 92 Va. 297, 23 S. E. Rep. 781.

Where Instructions Are Inconsistent.—Where two instructions are inconsistent with each other, the verdict will be set aside, as it is impossible to tell whether the jury was controlled by the one or the other. Va. & N. C. Wheel Co. v. Chalkley, 98 Va. 66, 34 S. E. Rep. 976. See Richmond Traction Co. v. Hilderbrand, 98 Va. 22, 34 S. E. Rep. 888.

Where Evidence Inconsistent.—But, where the evidence is conflicting it cannot be said that, upon the whole case, no other verdict could have been found than that which was found. Va. & N. C. Wheel Co. v. Chalkley, 98 Va. 66, 34 S. E. Rep. 976.

b. In Criminal Cases.

Recommendation to Mercy.—Where a verdict finds accused guilty of a crime, the added recommendation of the accused to the mercy of the court has no legal effect. State v. Newman, 49 W. Va. 724, 39 S. E. Rep. 655.

Conviction on One Count, Acquittal on Others.—If there be three counts in an indictment, and the jury find a conviction on the second, saying nothing as to the other two, the accused stands acquitted on those two. Com. v. Bennet, 2 Va. Cas. 235. See Hawley v. Com., 75 Va. 847.

(i) Curing Errors.

(a) In Civil Cases.

(aa) When Cured.

Want of Similitur.—The want of a similitur shall not, after trial, vitiate the verdict. Brewer v. Tarpley, 1 Wash. 363.

Uncertainty in Allegations.—Action on covenant, in which the plaintiff agreed to serve defendant for a year, in consideration of a certain part of the grain made on the plantation, oats excepted, a declaration charging "defendant did not, at the close of the year, pay plaintiff such part of the grain made on the plantation," if bad for not setting out what crop was made, the defect was cured by verdict. Laughlin v. Flood, 3 Munf. 255.

Failure to Allege Performance of Conditions.—And a failure to allege the performance of a precedent condition will be cured by verdict. Bailey v. Clay, 4 Rand. 346.

Omission to Lay Damages.—And so, the verdict cures the omission to lay damages in the declaration. Stephens v. White, 2 Wash. 208.

Misjoinder of Issues.—Where there is a misjoinder of issues, the defect will be cured by verdict. Moore v. Mauro, 4 Rand. 400, overruling, it seems, Wilkinson v. Bennett, 3 Munf. 314. See also, Southside R. R. Co. v. Daniel, 20 Gratt. 800; White v. Clay, 7 Leigh 68; Mackey v. Fuqua, 3 Call 19; Boatright v. Meggs, 4 Munf. 145; Ray v. Clemens, 6 Leigh 600; Baylor v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 9 W. Va. 283; Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 216; First Nat. Bank of Wellsburg v. Kimberlands, 16 W. Va. 572; Walden v. Payne, 3 Wash. 1.

(bb) When Not Cured.

Failure to Allege Consideration.—Where the declaration does not allege a consideration, it is not such defect as may be cured by verdict. Moseley v. Jones, 5 Munf. 23.

Failure to Show Right of Action.—And, where in an action of debt the declaration not only shows the plaintiffs have no right of action, but that such right is in another and there is a verdict for plaintiffs. Such verdict is unavailing to cure the error. Ross v. Milne, 12 Leigh 204.

Averring Gist of the Action.—Nor will anything be presumed after verdict but what must have been necessarily proved from the matter stated in the declaration; therefore, total want of averment of a fact which constitutes the gist of the action will not be cured by the verdict. Chichester v. Vass, 1 Call 88.

Lack of Plea and Issue.—And if there be no plea entered nor issue made up, the defect is fatal, and any verdict rendered in such case will be set aside. McMillion v. Dobbins, 9 Leigh 422. See Sydnor v. Burke, 4 Rand. 161.

If All the Pleadings Faulty.—So, too, if all the pleadings, including the declaration, be faulty, the verdict will not cure the defects. Link v. Walker, 1 Wash. 135; Stevens v. Tallaferrero, 1 Wash. 155; Totty v. Donald, 4 Munf. 430.

Action on Assigned Bond.—And, if in debt on an assigned bond the declarations do not allege a failure to pay the money to the obligee and to each of the assignees, as well as to plaintiff, only charging a failure to pay to plaintiff, the defect will not be cured by verdict. Braxton v. Lipescomb, 2 Munf. 282. See Buckner v. Blair, 2 Munf. 336; Green v. Dulany, 2 Munf. 518.

Action against Administrator for Fraud of Decedent.—It is error to bring an action against the personal representative of a deceased vendor for the fraud and deceit of such vendor in a sale of a chattel to plaintiff, the cause of action having abated with the death of the vendor, and is not cured by verdict. Boyles v. Overby, 11 Gratt. 208.

Suing Contrary to Directions of Statute.—And where it is required that suit must be brought against the principal bank by its corporate name, it is error to sue the president and directors of a branch bank, and such error is not cured by verdict, founded on the general issue pleaded. Mason v. Farmers Bank, 12 Leigh 84; Tompkins v. Branch Bank, 11 Leigh 372.

(b) in Criminal Cases.

(aa) When Cured.

Verdict of Eleven Jurors, by Consent.—See monographic note on "Juries" appended to Chahoon v. Com., 20 Gratt. 733.

Objection to Juror.—An objection to a juror for incompetency is cured by verdict. Poindexter v. Com., 33 Gratt. 766.

Irregularity in Charge of Clerk.—And, if there be irregularity in the charge of the clerk to the jury, it is cured by verdict. Rogers v. Com., 1 Va. Dec. 798.

Indictment for Rape.—So, too, if indictment for rape charges carnal knowledge of a female, instead of a woman child, the omission is cured by verdict. Com. v. Bennett, 2 Va. Cas. 335. See Trimble v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 148; Com. v. Ervin, 2 Va. Cas. 337; Aldridge v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 447.

Indictment of Insurance Agent.—And, if accused is indicted for keeping an office and doing business as agent for a named insurance company, and the indictment does not allege that the company is an insurance company, and for this the indictment is defective, such defect is cured by verdict. Slaughter v. Com., 13 Gratt. 707.

VII. CONSTRUCTION OF VERDICT.

A. GENERAL RULE.—Verdicts of juries are to be favorably construed, and if the point in issue is substantially decided by the verdict, it is the duty of the court to mould it into form. Lewis v. Childers, 13 W. Va. 9. See McMurray v. Oneal, 1 Call 246; Moody v. State, 1 W. Va. 340; Mann v. Bryant, 12 W. Va. 519; Peters v. Johnson, 50 W. Va. 644, 41 S. E. Rep. 190.

B. IN CIVIL CASES.

Pleas, Payment and Set-Off, Verdict for Gross Sum.—In an action of assumpsit the defendant pleads payment and files set-offs exceeding the amount demanded by the plaintiff, whereupon the verdict finds for defendant simply a gross sum. Such verdict must be interpreted as a finding that the set-offs of the defendant exceeded the amount of plaintiff's claim by the sum found. Black v. Thomas, 21 W. Va. 711.

C. CRIMINAL CASES.

Malicious Shooting.—On an indictment for malicious shooting one S., the verdict of the jury was, "we, the jury, find defendant not guilty of malicious shooting, as charged, but guilty of unlawful shooting, with intent, etc., and fix his term of confinement," etc. The verdict is to be read in connection with the indictment, and, therefore, sufficiently indicates the person shot. Hoback v. Com., 28 Gratt. 922. See Price v. Com., 77 Va. 394; Wolverton v. Com., 75 Va. 911; Canada v. Com., 22 Gratt. 899.

Taking No Notice of Some Charges.—Where a verdict finds the accused guilty upon some of the counts in an indictment, saying nothing of others, judgment of acquittal should be entered on those counts of which the verdict takes no notice. Kirk v. Com., 9 Leigh 627. See Page v. Com., 9 Leigh 688.

Meaning of "Twelve Months."—Where one is found guilty of a felony, and the jury fix his punishment at twelve months imprisonment, the term "twelve months" means one year. Vandewall v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 375.

VIII. AMENDMENT OF VERDICT.

A. GENERAL RULE.—Where the verdict returned is not in form, it is proper that it be amended, in open court, but only as to matters of not substance. Porterfield's Case, 91 Va. 806, 22 S. E. Rep. 352; State v. Davis, 31 W. Va. 390, 7 S. E. Rep. 24; Com. v. Gibson, 2 Va. Cas. 70; Mills v. Com., 7 Leigh 751.

B. TIME OF AMENDMENT.—And, so, the court may, for good reason, return a jury to its room to further consider and amend, or alter, its verdict, at any time before it is received by the court and the jury discharged. State v. Cobbs, 40 W. Va. 718, 22 S. E. Rep. 310. See Mills v. Com., 7 Leigh 751; Com. v. Gibson, 2 Va. Cas. 70; B. & O. R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Gratt. 449.

And it is held in Sledd v. Com., 19 Gratt. 813, that the jury may amend their verdict at any time before they are discharged.

C. RULE ILLUSTRATED.

1. AMENDMENT BY COURT.

In Ejectment.—In an action of ejectment the jury found "for the plaintiff one cent damages," which it was proper for the court to amend, so that it read, "we, the jury, find for the plaintiff the lands in the declaration mentioned, and one cent damages." McMurry v. Oneal, 1 Call 246. See Elliott v. Sutor, 3 W. Va. 87. Compare Low v. Settle, 23 W. Va. 287; Mann v. Bryant, 13 W. Va. 519; Paul v. Smiley, 4 Munf. 468.

In Writ of Right.—And in a writ of right brought by several demandants the mise is joined on the mere right, and the jury find "for demandants," with the additional finding that "one of the demandants was dead before the institution of the suit, leaving children," which latter clause was held to be mere surplusage. Garrard v. Henry, 6 Rand. 110. See Wells v. Garland, 2 Va. Cas. 471; Martin v. Ohio River R. Co., 37 W. Va. 349, 16 S. E. Rep. 589.

2. AMENDMENT BY THE JURY.

In Trial for Felony.—On a trial of an indictment for a felony, it is proper to allow the jury to retire and amend their verdict. Fry v. Com., 82 Va. 334.

IX. SPECIAL VERDICT.

A. RULES GOVERNING.—In a special verdict the jury ought not to find the evidence and submit to the court to say whether certain facts are to be inferred from it; but should find the facts explicitly, and submit to the court the questions of law arising thereupon. Henderson v. Allens, 1 Hen. & M. 235; Brown v. Ralston, 4 Rand. 504; McLean v. Copper, 3 Call 367; Blanks v. Foushee, 4 Munf. 61.

And in Hall v. Ratliff, 93 Va. 331, 24 S. E. Rep. 1011, it is held, that, in a special verdict all the facts necessary to enable the court to determine whether or not the plaintiff is entitled to recover must be found with certainty. No facts can be inferred from those found. Where a verdict falls short of this it should be set aside. See Henderson v. Allens, 1 Hen. & M. 235.

1. QUESTION SUBMITTED MUST BE MATERIAL.—Also, in Bentley v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 40 W. Va. 729, 23 S. E. Rep. 584, the court says, that a special question, unless material, should not be submitted to a jury. See Wheeling Bridge Co. v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co., 34 W. Va. 155, 11 S. E. Rep. 1009.

Nor, as was held in Vieth v. Hope Salt & Coal Co., 51 W. Va. 96, 41 S. E. Rep. 187, should two special questions covering the same enquiry be put to the jury, yet if one covering same matter of another be so drawn as to more definitely and pointedly inquire as to a particular matter controlling the case it should be given. See Pen. L. T. & M. Co. v. Franklin Ins. Co., 35 W. Va. 666, 14 S. E. Rep. 237; Bess v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 35 W. Va. 492, 14 S. E. Rep. 234.

And no material fact, not found expressly, or by very evident implication, in a special verdict, can be supplied by intendment. Tunnell v. Watson, 2 Munf. 283.

Therefore, it is held to be an inflexible rule that the court, upon a special verdict, cannot infer other facts from those found. Stribbling v. Bank of the Valley, 5 Rand. 159.

a. Exception.—But in criminal and civil cases, when the intent is important to the decision of the case, the court may infer it from the facts found in a special verdict, though the intent be not found. Stribbling v. Bank of the Valley, 5 Rand. 159.

2. CERTAINTY OF FINDING.

a. The Rule.—If a special verdict be so uncertain as that the court cannot say for whom judgment should be given, there ought to be a verdict de novo, otherwise if the verdict be not uncertain, but it merely shows plaintiff's case, or his title, to be defective. Brown v. Ferguson, 4 Leigh 37.

And so in a special verdict, if the facts formed make a case upon which the court may render a judgment upon the merits, the verdict is not defective because other facts exist which might have been found, and which would have made a different case requiring a different judgment. Hunter v. Humphreys, 14 Gratt. 287. See Bolling v. Mayor, 3 Rand. 563.

b. Rule Applied in Particular Instances.

(1) In Actions of Ejectment.

Verdict Aided by Clerk's Certificate.—Where a special verdict finds that a person having an estate in land conveyed the same by deed of trust of a particular date, which deed it finds was duly recorded, and sets forth the same in hac verba which verdict, aided by the clerk's certificate as to the time of recordation, was sufficient. Pownall v. Taylor, 10 Leigh 172.

Statute of Limitations and Time Excluded.—If a certain time has been by statute, excluded from the statutory period of twenty years, the special verdict must find that the defendant has had possession for the twenty years, exclusive of this time. Clay v. Ransome, 1 Munf. 454.

Ascertaining Time of Possession.—And in an action of ejectment the verdict should find whether the defendant, or those under whom he claimed, had or had not such possession of the land as would be sufficient for his defense in that action, whatever might be the state of the title. Cropper v. Carlton, 6 Munf. 277.

Ascertaining Time of Death.—So, too, in ejectment, the verdict should find the time of death of the person under whom the lessors of plaintiff might or might not have been entitled to the land in controversy, their title depending on the time of his death. Cropper v. Carlton, 6 Munf. 277.

Finding Livery of Seisin.—In ejectment for a lot of land, the verdict should find, precisely, whether there was livery of seisin; barely finding the memorandum endorsed upon the deed is but evidence of the fact, and insufficient. McLean v. Copper, 3 Call 367. See Brown v. Ralston, 4 Rand. 504; Henderson v. Allens, 1 Hen. & M. 235.

Recovery of Less than Sued for.—A plaintiff in ejectment may recover less land than the quantity stated in his declaration; but if the jury find a special verdict, shewing the plaintiff entitled to a certain number of acres, part of the tract sued for, and do not specify the boundaries of such part, with such precision as that possession thereof may be delivered, such verdict is not sufficient. Clay v. White, 1 Munf. 162.

(2) In Writ of Right.—A special verdict may be found in a writ of right. Shaw v. Clements, 1 Call 429. See Jones v. Jones, 1 Call 466; Bolling v. Mayor, 3 Rand. 563.

What Verdict Must Find.—But, a special verdict in writ of right, where the defense is the statute of limitations, must find either an actual disseisin or ouster of the demandants, or those under whom they claim, or facts which, in law, constitute such actual disseisin or ouster. Purcell v. Wilson, 4 Gratt. 16.

(3) Action on Protested Bill of Exchange.—Where, in an action on a protested bill of exchange, the jury found "that the bill with three endorsements thereon, two of which were erased, was duly protested, and that notice thereof was given to defendants at a named date. If this be a reasonable notice, then the verdict is for plaintiff, others wise for defendant." The court held that it was "no objection to a verdict that enough is not found to answer the purpose of one of the parties, provided what is found be clearly stated," which was the case here. Stott v. Alexander, 1 Wash. 331.

(4) In Action on Bond.—And, in an action on bond and plea of usury, it is sufficient if the special verdict find facts amounting to usury, though not directly finding the agreement was usurious. Gibson v. Fristoe, 1 Call 62.

(5) Fixing Liability for Assault.—Also, finding in a special verdict that L and B were concerned in the same affray for which a judgment was rendered against B is a sufficient finding that L and B were jointly guilty of the same assault and battery. Wilkes v. Jackson, 2 Hen. & M. 355.

(6) On Question of Fraud.—And it is not necessary in a special verdict, that fraud be found expressly, eo nomine, if facts amounting to fraud, in legal construction, be found. Robertson v. Ewell, 3 Munf. 1.

(7) In Action for Rent.—But, where in a proceeding to recover rent due upon a perpetual lease granted out of land, with right of distress and entry if the rent is not paid, a special verdict finding the entry of the grantee of the rent upon the land, and the holding by him and those claiming under him for forty-three years; but not finding that the original entry was under the right of entry given by the deed, or that the parties held adversely, nor any facts from which such an entry or such a possession results as a conclusion of law, is insufficient. Turner v. Smith, 18 Gratt. 880.

(8) In Action of Detinue.—And, in an action of detinue for slaves, if the jury find a special verdict, and, as to some of the slaves, omit to state a circumstance which is necessary to ascertain whether the plaintiff is entitled to them or not, it is insufficient. Robinson v. Brock, 1 Hen. & M. 212; Tunnell v. Watson, 2 Munf. 283.

(9) In Action on Note.—So, too, a verdict submitting to the court, for its judgment as to the law, certain documents and other evidence oral and written, without finding the facts established thereby, is too uncertain to found judgment upon. Blanks v. Foushee, 4 Munf. 61. See Henderson v. Allens, 1 Hen. & M. 235.

X. SUBJECT TO COURT'S OPINION.

A verdict may find generally for either party, dependent upon a single point of law presented to the court, although such verdict is not, strictly, a special verdict. McMichen v. Amos, 4 Rand. 137. See James River & Kanawha Co. v. Adams, 17 Gratt. 427.

So, if in an action of waste, the verdict finds for the plaintiff and assess damages, but subject to the opinion of the court, whether, on the facts stated, the plaintiff can maintain the action, it is a general verdict. Dejarnette v. Allen, 5 Gratt. 500. See McMichen v. Amos, 4 Rand. 136.

And, on motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict is contrary to law and evidence and the damages excessive, if the plaintiff release such part thereof as, in the court's opinion ought to be released, and thereupon judgment is entered for the residue, such judgment not appearing unreasonable, should be sustained. Preston v. Bowen, 6 Munf. 271. See James River & Kanawha Co. v. Adams, 17 Gratt. 427; Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 63.

XI. DISCRETION AS TO NATURE OF VERDICT.

The jury has the discretion to say, when it finds a prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree, he shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary. State v. Greer, 23 W. Va. 809.

The Commonwealth v. Scott and Thompson.

March, 1826.

*Court of Appeals—Jurisdiction.—The Court of Appeals has no jurisdiction in the case of an information against the members of an unchartered bank, for a violation of the law of 1816, 2 Rev. Code, 111, because that Act is a penal law.

The Attorney General filed an information in the Richmond Chancery Court, against John C. Scott and William M. Thompson, under the Act of 1816, 2 Rev. Code, 111, the one as president, and the other, as treasurer of an unchartered banking company, in Culpeper county.

The information charges, that there exists, at this time, at Culpeper Court-house, or elsewhere in the said county of Culpeper, an association entitled, or styling themselves, the Culpeper manufacturing and agricultural association, or some such name, &c. and that the said association, although they have no charter or law, incorporating the said 144 company *with authority to trade as a bank, are in the constant habit, and have been for a considerable time, of discounting notes, bills, or other securities, for the payment of money or other valuable thing, and issuing notes, drafts or bills, payable to order or bearer, or payable to the order of some agent of the said association, &c. and for the purpose of dealing, trading, and carrying on business as a bank, &c.: that the said association is conducted under the direction of John C. Scott, who acts as president, and William M. Thompson, who acts as treasurer thereof, and who sign the notes issued by the said association, under those designations; but that the Attorney General does not know who are the other members of the said association. The information calls on the defendants to disclose, on oath, whether the said association does not discount bills, notes or bonds, or other securities, and upon what terms? Who are the members of the said association? What is the amount of its capital, and of what does it consist, &c? It prays that the defendants may be compelled to exhibit the original articles of association, and the journal of their proceedings, and all their books and papers: that they be decreed to pay up the capital stock of the association, for the benefit of the Commonwealth, &c.

The defendants pleaded, that on the 7th day of January, 1809, an Act of Assembly was passed to incorporate the Culpeper Agricultural and Manufacturing Society: that in pursuance of the said Act, the said company was duly constituted, and still continues in being, and is a body corporate duly constituted and appointed, by virtue of the said Act; and, not confessing or admitting that they have done any act or deed, in violation of the Act of Assembly aforesaid, they say that all their actings and doings, in relation to the issuing of notes, or any of the matters set forth in the bill, have been done and performed as officers of the said institution, duly chartered and constituted by the Act of Assembly aforesaid.

The Attorney General replied generally, and the plea was set down for argument.

145 *The Chancellor, thinking that this case did not come within the Act of Assembly relating to unchartered associations, which did not apply to acts of misconduct in a chartered company, dismissed the information. From this decision, the Attorney General appealed.

The case was argued in this Court, by the Attorney General, for the appellant, and Leigh, for the appellee.

It was said, on behalf of the appellant, that this case came within the first section of the Act against unchartered banking companies; 2 Rev. Code, 111; for although this company had a charter, it was for a different purpose, and a charter for one purpose cannot protect acts not contemplated by the charter. The association was, as to the powers of banking, an unchartered institution. This case comes within the spirit, as well as the letter of the law. It is true, that penal laws are to be construed strictly; but laws which concern the public good, are to be liberally interpreted. 6 Bac. Abr. 388, 391, Tit. "Statute."

The second section gives the Chancery Court jurisdiction: and the only question is, whether the law itself is constitutional. That Court exercises powers, as penal in their nature as this, in numerous instances; as in the case of sequestration, &c. 2 Com. Dig. 4, W. 25. Charitable Corporation, &c. v. Sutton, 2 Atk. 400, which proves that Chancery has jurisdiction of a trust, whether public or private; and here the appellees held their capital stock, in trust for the Commonwealth. 2 Bac. Abr. 139, Tit. "Courts of Chancery." Sparks v. Liverpool Water Works, 13 Ves. 428. Tomkies v. Downman, 6 Munf. 557. Wilson v. Spencer, &c. 1 Rand. 76.

The cases of Bedinger v. The Commonwealth, 3 Call, 461, and The Commonwealth v. Broadbuss, 6 Munf. 116, may be urged on the other side, to prove that the Chancery Court has not jurisdiction. But, those cases were decided on the ground, that the law had not given that Court jurisdiction. 146 diction, "not that the Legislature could not give it. They were so decided, because amotion from office, and a sentence of separation, did not come under the idea of "debt or damages."

On the part of the appellee, it was not contended that it was not competent to the Legislature, to give to this Court criminal jurisdiction; but it was contended, that in this case, they have not conferred it. The proceeding in this case is clearly criminal. The offence is called a misdemeanor. If the construction put on the law is correct, it would be a violation of the Bill of Rights; because it compels the party accused to make a discovery of his offence, and deprives him of all the other safe-guards provided by that fundamental law. The real meaning of the law is, (and the only one which would make it constitutional,) that the corporations are first to be convicted by a regular proceeding at common law, and then the Chancery Court is to exercise its powers. 2 Bac. Abr. 31, Tit. "Corporations," G. Wherever this Court enforces a fine, it is only incidental to private redress; but where it is only a public offence, as in this case, it is not within its jurisdiction.

As to the argument that this is a trust, the substance of a thing cannot be changed by the terms in which it is expressed. It is certainly, in all its features, a forfeiture and a punishment.

The doctrine contended for, would punish the innocent as well as the guilty. The Commonwealth would seize on the property of those members who resisted this perversion of the lawful purposes of the corporation, as well as of those who promoted it. Even the property of infants and widows, who were wholly innocent of any evil intent, would be confiscated. But, the law applies expressly only to those companies which are formed for the purpose of dealing as a bank. The Act of 1808-9, ch. 56, confirms this idea; the fifth section of which, applies to corporate bodies chartered for other purposes.

147 *But, the cases of Bedinger v. The Commonwealth, and The Attorney General v. Broadbuss, are conclusive as to the jurisdiction of this Court. In those cases, this Court refused to entertain the Appeals, on the express ground that they were criminal prosecutions.

March 3. JUDGE COALTER.

This is an information filed in the Chancery Court at Richmond, by the Attorney General, against Scott and Thompson, (the one as president, and the other as treasurer, of an unchartered banking company,) under the Act of 1816, made to prevent the circulation of notes emitted by unchartered banks.

The information was dismissed by the Chancellor, on a plea in bar filed by the defendants; and the Attorney General appealed from that decree to this Court.

The first question is, whether this is a criminal prosecution, and therefore not within the jurisdiction of this Court, according to the cases of Bedinger v. The Commonwealth, 3 Call, 461, and The Attorney General v. Broadbuss and wife, 6 Munf. 116.

The first section of the Act above referred to, declares, "that it shall not be lawful for any association or company, not having a charter incorporating such association or company, with authority to deal or trade as a bank, now formed or in being, or which hereafter may be formed, within the limits of this Commonwealth, for the purpose of discounting notes, bills, &c. and issuing notes, bills, &c. for the purpose of dealing, trading or carrying on business as a bank, to commence or continue the discounting of any notes or bills, &c. or the issuing of any notes, drafts or bills, &c. and every member, officer or agent, of any such company or association, that may so commence or continue such discounting or issuing, &c. shall be held and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, on indictment, information or presentment, shall be liable *to be fined at the discretion of a jury, in a sum not less than $100, nor more than $500; and if any such company or association, or any president, manager, cashier or other officer, or agent, &c. shall pay out, deliver, put in circulation, or issue, any note, draft, bill, &c. each member, officer, or agent thereof, shall be, in like manner, liable to the same penalty."

The second section declares, "that all the capital stock of any association or company, trading or discounting paper, or issuing notes, in violation of this Act, and all the capital stock subscribed to such association or company, shall be held in trust for the benefit of the Commonwealth, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General, whenever he shall be informed of the existence of any such company or association, to institute a suit in the Superior Court of Chancery, in the Richmond district, in behalf of the Commonwealth, for the purpose of recovering the capital stock aforesaid. In such suit, it shall be lawful to make all or any of the members of such company or association, or any officer, agent or manager thereof, parties defendant, and to call upon and compel them, or either of them, to exhibit all their books and papers, and an account of all such matters and things as may be necessary to enable the Court to make a decree, in pursuance of this Act. The members of any such association or company, made defendants in such suit, shall be held severally liable to the Commonwealth for their respective proportions of the capital stock, &c. at the institution of the suit, or at the time of the decree, &c. and the Court shall decree against the defendants, respectively and severally, the amount, &c. to be levied of the respective goods, chattels, lands and tenements of such defendants: Provided, that no disclosure, made by any party defendant to such suit, and no books or papers exhibited by him in answer to the bill, &c. shall be used as evidence against him in any motion or prosecution against any such defendant to such suit, for the recovery of any penalty or the infliction of any punishment prescribed by this Act."

149 "The third section avoids all notes, &c. discounted contrary to the provisions of the Act, and provides, that any person who may pay money in virtue of such note, &c. may recover it back, &c. and executors, administrators, &c. are not to be allowed for any payment made on such illegal contract.

By the fourth section, any person who may sign, countersign, or endorse, as president, manager, or cashier, or by any other name or designation, &c. any note, &c. shall be liable, on motion, &c. before any Court of Record, &c. to a judgment in favor of the Commonwealth, for threefold the amount of any such note, &c.

The information filed in this case, sets out the first section of the Act aforesaid, and also the second section. It then goes on to charge the existence of an association, styling themselves the Culpeper Manufacturing and Agricultural Association, not having a charter, with authority to deal as a bank, and who are, and have been in the habit of discounting, &c. contrary to the said Act, &c. managed by Scott, as president, and Thompson, as treasurer, &c. but that the attorney does not know who the other members are. He makes them defendants, calls on them to answer, on oath, whether they do not act as president and treasurer of said association, and interrogates them specially as to all their actings and doings, in discounting bills, issuing notes, &c. and also, to discover who the other members are: that they exhibit the original articles of association, the journal of their proceedings, and all their books and papers, which will give the Court full information, &c. and that they be decreed to pay the capital stock, &c. and such other decree, &c.

The defendants plead, in substance, that on the 7th of January, 1809, an Act of Assembly was passed, (to a copy of which they refer, but which is not in the record,) to incorporate the Culpeper Agricultural and Manufacturing Society, in pursuance of which the said company was duly constituted, and still continues, &c.: that the said corporate body is one and the same with the company and association 150 *named in the bill, and no other; and by protestation, not confessing or admitting that they have done any act or deed, in violation of the Act of Assembly set forth in the information, say, that all their actings and doings, in relation to the issuing of notes, or any of the matters set forth in the bill, have been done and performed as officers of the said institution, duly chartered and constituted, by force of the Act of Assembly first referred to; and they plead these matters in bar of the information, &c.

This plea seems to admit the issuing of the notes, &c. as charged, but alleges that it was done by a corporate body, then in existence, under the Act referred to in the plea, and so not by an association formed for the purpose of discounting notes.

What may be the merits of this defence, it is not now proper to decide; because, if this is a criminal prosecution, of which we have no jurisdiction, then I hold we ought to give no opinion on the subject, according to the decision of this Court, in Dance's Case, 5 Munf. 349; all such cases belonging exclusively to other tribunals.

Every section of the Act seems to me to be highly penal; and the Attorney General cannot proceed, until, either by the disclosure of the parties, or other evidence, or both combined, he convicts them of these acts, which are declared by that section to be a misdemeanor, punishable by a heavy fine. His information would contain no ground of claim to the capital stock of the association, nor could he get a decree therefor, except by a charge and proof of that misdemeanor; and though the disclosure made by the parties defendant, or any books or papers exhibited, are not to be used as evidence against them, in any motion or prosecution under the Act, yet a recovery in this suit is no bar to any such motion or prosecution, if it can be supported on other proofs; and such disclosures, books, &c. may lead to the disclosure of other evidence, which would convict them of some of the offences punishable by the Act.

But, it is not the first section only, as it appears to me, that is penal; almost every one is so. It is true, that many 151 *of them are penalties, which, like those of the Act to prevent usury, may be enforced in civil suits; as avoiding the notes, and the recovery back of the money, under the third section; the annuement of the contract of association itself, between the parties; the recovery of debts against them, in a summary way, though they cannot recover, and though they are incapacitated even to sue, as provided in the 5th, 6th and 7th sections.

But, the 4th section is highly penal as to the parties defendant, in this case; and their conviction under it may be produced, in consequence of a knowledge of parties, &c. obtained by the proceedings in this suit.

It is said that the second section is not penal, within the meaning of the cases, in which we have refused to take jurisdiction, because it merely creates a trust for the Commonwealth, of the capital stock, &c. But, is not this a declaration of a forfeiture of that stock to the State, for a crime against the State, and which crime must be proved, and that on the disclosure of the party defendant, and by a proceeding in Chancery? It seems to me to be a heavy penalty; and though it is not called a fine or forfeiture, it is as much so, as if it had been said, "he shall forfeit and pay to the Commonwealth, the amount of his stock." It is as much a fine or forfeiture, as it would have been, had no other sanction or penalty been declared for the commission of this misdemeanor. Surely an accumulation of penalties, which shews rather the enormity of the offence, than that this was not intended as a punishment of it, cannot change the nature of this penalty or forfeiture.

It seems to me, therefore, to be a case clearly within the principles laid down by this Court, in the case of the Attorney General v. Broadus and wife, above mentioned, and that the appeal must be, consequently, dismissed.

JUDGES CABELL and GREEN concurred, and the appeal was dismissed.*

Declaration—Writ—Demands in One and Not Other.—A demand of interest in the declaration, which is not claimed by the writ, is not erroneous; but it is error to claim in the declaration, costs of protest, when those costs are not demanded in the writ. This error may be taken advantage of, where the judgment is by default.

Notes—Transfer—Averment.—Quære, what averments of the transfer of a note, and of demand and notice, are sufficient?

Charles Lewis, brought an action of debt upon a protested negotiable note, in the Superior Court of Campbell county, against Benjamin Perkins, John Moore, Archibald Hatcher, James W. Dibrell and David Saunders, Jr. The writ demands $1395 59, and $500 damages; but does not demand interest, nor the costs of protest.

The declaration charges, that Perkins executed his promissory note to Moore, for $1395 59, negotiable and payable &c. that Moore, Hatcher, Dibrell and Saunders, successively endorsed the note; of which the plaintiff became legally possessed, for a fair and valuable consideration: that the several endorsers had notice of these assignments as they occurred: that the note was duly protested as to the drawer and endorsers thereof, at the Office of Discount and Deposit of the Farmers' Bank at Lynchburg, of which protest the drawer and endorsers had notice; by reason whereof, the defendants became jointly and severally bound to pay to the plaintiff, the said sum of $1395 59, with interest &c. and $4 03, as charges of protest.

The endorsement on the writ was in these words: "an action of debt upon a protested negotiable note. No bail required."

The writ having been served on Perkins, Hatcher, Dibrell and Saunders, (Moore being returned, "no inhabitant,") 153 *and they not appearing, a conditional order was entered against them for $1395 59, with legal interest thereon, and $4 03, which judgment was afterwards confirmed, "unless they do appear at the next Superior Court of Law to be holden for this county, find special bail, and plead to issue." The defendants failing to appear according to the terms of the judgment, it was confirmed.

At the succeeding term of the Superior Court, the defendants Dibrell, Saunders and Hatcher, moved the Court to set aside the office judgment, so far as it affected them, and for permission to file a plea of nil debet, and one of usury, which the Court refused, unless they would give special bail; the plaintiff asking, as of right, that such bail should be required; the Court being of opinion, that the plaintiff might legally require bail from the defendants, without cause shewn. To this opinion, the defendants excepted.

Hatcher, obtained a Supersedeas.

Wickham, for the appellant, referred to the case of Metcalfe v. Battaille, Gilm. 191, as decisive of the question, whether a writ of enquiry was necessary in this case. This was not a note for the payment of money, within the meaning of the law. He also referred to the case of Laporte v. Dunlops, 1 Hen. & Munf. 22. This was not a case in which bail could be required as of right. 1 Rev. Code, 499, sec. 42; 43.

The Attorney General, for the appellee, contended, that bail, may of right, be demanded of principal and endorsers, under the 1 Rev. Code, 78, which places notes negotiable at the Bank, on the footing of foreign bills of exchange; and the law merchant considers every endorser as a new drawer. The same argument proves, that a writ of enquiry is not necessary.

154 JUDGE COALTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

The case of Metcalfe v. Battaille, Gilm. Rep. 191, if correctly decided, is decisive of one point in this case, to wit: that a writ of enquiry was necessary, and that alone is sufficient to reverse the judgment. Although that case was decided by a bare Court, yet it was an unanimous opinion, and therefore a binding precedent, as much as any other. But it was said, that point was not made in the argument, and may have been a hasty opinion. I have looked into my notes of the argument, and find the point was made and answered nearly in the way that has now been attempted. But, surely, that case must be sound law. The Statute, giving a joint action, was neither intended, nor could it vary, the nature of the contracts of the parties. It merely gave a joint action on several contracts. Several suits may still be prosecuted, as before. In a several suit against one endorser, all the matters, posterior to the endorsement, which are in pais, and which must be performed, in order to entitle the plaintiff to his remedy against the endorser, are things of which the clerk can take no cognizance. Suppose A. gives his note to B. for $100, payable on a given day, provided B. on or before that day, deliver him a certain horse. He avers the delivery of the horse, and produces a notarial certificate that he had done so. Would this authorise an office judgment for the $100? In an action of debt on a note directly engaging to pay a sum of money, the note itself contains full evidence of the plaintiff's right of action. But the endorsement of a note does not shew the demand, protest and notice, which are necessary to subject the endorser. They are substantive matters dehors the endorsement, and must be averred and proved. On this ground, that case was decided; and there can be no doubt of the correctness of that decision. In a suit against the drawer alone, a judgment might be rendered 155 against *him, without a writ of enquiry; but when he is sued with the endorser, no judgment can properly be given finally against him, until a final judgment is also given against all the defendants.

The next enquiry is, whether the Court erred in refusing to allow the defendants, the endorsers, to appear and plead without giving special bail; although no cause was shewn, on the part of the plaintiff, why bail should be required. Independent of the question, whether bail was demandable of right, the fact is, that the plaintiff did not demand it. The writ does not state whether the defendants are makers, or endorsers, or both; they may be, for aught that appears from it, all endorsers, or all makers, and the suit by the payee; or the plaintiff may be a remote endorsee, suing both maker and endorsers. The endorsement is simply in these words: "An action of debt on a protested negotiable note. No bail required."

The Act of Assembly, 1 Rev. Code, 499, requires, that "when the plaintiff may of right demand bail, he shall endorse the true species of action in such manner, that his title to bail will appear thereby, and shall also endorse that bail is required;" and the 50th section, p. 501, provides, that "in any personal action, in which bail shall not have been required, the Court may, at any time before final judgment, for good cause shewn, rule the defendant to give special bail, &c." The law makes no distinction between cases in which bail might have been required, but was not so required, and cases where it could not have been required, and therefore was not. If it was not, in fact, required, the party had an equal right to appear without giving special bail, unless required by the Court, for good cause shewn, whether it was the one case, or the other. The case, then, falls not only within the letter, but the spirit, of the law.

But it is said, that the exhibition of the note itself, endorsed by the defendants, was good cause. This argument would be more plausible, if the plaintiff could 156 have demanded *bail of them, as a matter of right, which will be considered hereafter. But, is it a sound interpretation of the law, even in a case of that kind, when no bail has in fact been required; and when the party, not expecting bail to be required, has employed counsel to appear for him, and has put into his hands full proof of payment, that the plaintiff, without further cause, and by mere caprice, shall require bail when a plea is offered? His own endorsement shews, that at one time he did not think bail necessary; but it may afterwards become necessary, and if it does, he ought to shew it. In Dunlops v. Laporte, 1 Hen. & Munf. 22, it was contended, that the defendant could only set aside the office judgment, by the very words of the law, on giving good special bail: that Laporte's not being excepted to as appearance bail, was no proof that he was good special bail. The plaintiff might elect not to be delayed by excepting to him, and he may have become insolvent since. But the Supersedeas was unanimously refused. The principles of that case fully support the position above taken.

But, could the plaintiff require bail of the endorsers as a matter of right? The 43d section of the Act above referred to, provides, that in actions of debt, founded upon any writing obligatory, bill or note in writing, for the payment of money or tobacco, &c. the plaintiff may, of right, demand bail, &c. But, an endorsement of a note is not a note in writing for the payment of money, within the meaning of the Act, as has been decided in Metcalf v. Battaile, above mentioned. It is a collateral undertaking, and the liability of the parties depends as much upon matter dehors that endorsement, and posterior thereto, as in the case of an assignment of a bond or ordinary note. Non constat, because the party has endorsed, that he owes any thing. The endorsement itself ascertains no demand. And so in Ruffin v. Call, 2 Wash. 181, it was decided, that in an action of debt on a bond with collateral condition, the judgment against the Sheriff, for not returning appearance bail, was erroneous. The party, then, could *only obtain bail of the endorsers, in this case, from a Judge or Justice of the Peace, under the 44th section of the Act, on proper affidavit, &c. and of course, ought to have shewn equal cause for ruling them to give special bail.

But there are also other errors in this case. It being a judgment by default, for want of appearance, the Statute of Jeofails has no effect upon it; and the Court must look into the writ, as well as all the other proceedings.

The demand for interest in the declaration, which is not claimed in the writ, is no objection; since, by the Statute in that case provided, the interest follows the principal as the shadow does the substance. But here, the declaration claimed, and the judgment gives, $4 03, the costs of protest, as a part of the debt, and which is not claimed in the writ.

There might perhaps, also, be serious objections to this declaration, for want of proper averments of the transfer of the note from one defendant to another, and finally to the plaintiff, thereby shewing his right to sue, as every plaintiff must; and also, whether a sufficient demand or notice has been set out. But it has not been considered necessary to investigate these matters.

The last objection above taken, shews that the declaration, though it might have being cured by a plea and verdict, in that respect, being variant from the writ, which is part of the record in an office judgment for want of appearance, is bad; and that consequently, on that ground also, no judgment could have been entered on it.

The writ, however, is good. The judgment must therefore be reversed, and the proceedings back to the writ set aside, and the cause sent back, to be sent to the Rules for further proceedings.

Foreign Administrator—Right to Sue.—An administration granted in another State, does not give the administrator appointed there, a right to sue jointly with an administrator appointed in Virginia.

Attachment Bond—Action on—What Necessary to Justify.—In an action on an attachment bond, by which the obligor was bound to pay all costs and damages, which might accrue to the obligee, in consequence of suing out the attachment, it is not necessary that they should be previously assessed in some other action, to justify an action on the bond.

Executors—Attested Certificate of Probate—Evidence.—The certificate of probate or of administration granted by a Court of this State, and attested by the clerk, will enable the executor or administrator to act, and may be given in evidence in any Court of this Commonwealth.

Attachment Bond—Action on—Declaration—Allegations—Sufficiency of.—In an action on an attachment bond, it is not sufficient to allege in the declaration, that the defendant "did not pay all such costs and damages as have accrued &c." but it must be expressly averred, that costs and damages had been actually sustained.

Martin Dickinson, administrator with the will annexed of Catherine Thompson, deceased, brought an action of debt against Robert Hammock and James M'Craw, in the Superior Court of Law for Grayson county. It does not appear that Hammock was ever served with process, and the suit was prosecuted against M'Craw alone.

The action was founded on an attachment bond, which had been executed by the two defendants jointly, by which they undertook to pay to Catherine Thompson, "all such costs and damages as may accrue for wrongfully suing out a certain attachment then and there obtained," (viz: in the county of Surry in the State of North Carolina,) "by the said Robert Hammock against the said Catherine." The breach stated in the declaration is, "that the said defendants did not pay the said Catherine in her life-time, or the plaintiff since her death, all such costs and damages as have accrued for wrongfully suing out said attachment, &c." The plaintiff concludes with making profert of his letters of administration with the will annexed of the said Catherine, "whereby it fully appears, that he is the administrator, &c."

The defendant M'Craw filed a general demurrer to the declaration. He also craved oyer of the letters of administration *with the will annexed, &c.

which were only a certificate of the clerk of Grayson county, that Martin Dickinson had qualified as administrator &c. of Catherine Thompson, deceased, and given bond and security, according to law. The defendant filed a second plea, that, at the time of commencing this action, the plaintiff was not the sole administrator with the will annexed, of Catherine Thompson, deceased, but that one Elijah Harris, was also administrator, &c. by letters of administration granted to him, by the County Court of Surry in North Carolina; by virtue of which, the said Elijah became a joint administrator with the plaintiff, having full power to sue in the present action, together with the plaintiff; and that the latter ought not to sue alone.

The third plea alleges, that no damages had been legally assessed or ascertained by suit against the said Robert Hammock, so as to enable the defendant or the said Robert, to pay the same, according to the tenor and effect of the bond.

The fourth plea is nearly to the same effect as the second.

The fifth plea, after craving oyer of the letters of administration, objects that the certificate above mentioned, gives no authority to the plaintiff, to maintain this action.

The plaintiff demurred to the three last pleas; and the defendant joined in demurrer.

The Court gave judgment for the defendant on the demurrers; and the plaintiff appealed.

Wickham, for the appellant, contended that the declaration was good, under the authority of Craghill v. Page, &c. 1 Hen. & Munf. 446. Lane v. Harrison, 6 Munf. 573.

The second plea is not before the Court, as the demurrers did not apply to it.

The third plea is bad, because, in a suit on a bond with a collateral condition, it is not necessary to ascertain the damages by a previous suit against the principal.

160 *The fourth plea is clearly bad, because an administration in another county has no authority in this. Dickson v. Ramsay, 3 Cranch, 319. Fenwick v. Sears, 1 Cranch, 259. Hilliard v. Cox, 1 Salk. 37. Burnley v. Duke, 1 Rand. 108.

As to the fifth plea, the certificate of the clerk of letters of administration, having been granted, was sufficient under our Acts of Assembly. 12 Hen. Stat. at Large, 148.

No Counsel for the appellee.

JUDGE CABELL pronounced the opinion of the Court.*

The Court is of opinion, that the second plea is bad; for, the administration in North Carolina did not give the administrator appointed there, a right to sue jointly with the administrator appointed in Virginia.

The third plea is also bad; for, if any damages had been sustained, it was not necessary that they should be previously assessed in some other action, to justify an action on the bond.

The fourth plea is also bad. The administration in North Carolina gave no right whatever to sue in this State; much less did it destroy the right of the administrator appointed in Virginia, to sue here.

The fifth plea is not less free from objection. Since the Act of 1785, 12 Hen. Stat. at Large, 148, the certificate of probate or of administration granted by a Court of this State, and attested by the clerk, will enable the executor or administrator to act, and may be produced or given in evidence in any Court within this Commonwealth, and be as effectual as any probate or letters of administration, made out in due form.

But the Court is of opinion, that the declaration also is defective. The action was upon an attachment bond, the 161 *condition of which was, that the defendant should pay all costs and damages that might accrue from wrongfully suing out the attachment. The declaration avers, that the defendant "did not pay all such costs and damages as have accrued, &c." But, there is no averment that the attachment was wrongfully sued out, or that any costs and damages had been sustained. The mere allegation that the defendant had failed to pay the costs and damages that had accrued, is not a sufficient foundation for inferring that costs and damages had been actually sustained. A direct averment was essential.

Upon the principle, therefore, of going back to the first fault, judgment was rightly entered for the appellee, on all the demurrers, and is therefore affirmed.

jury was sworn "to try the issue joined." The jury rendered a verdict for a portion of the articles claimed by the declaration, and the Court gave judgment accordingly.

Leigh, for the appellant.

Stanard, for the appellee.

March 17. JUDGE COALTER.

Although the record states that the jury were sworn to try the issue joined, yet, unless we can look to the plea which was directed to be entered nunc pro tunc, at a subsequent Term after the judgment, by way of amendment of the record, there was no plea entered, nor issue made up in the cause. As to the amendment in question, it was not one justified by the Act of Assembly, (1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, sec. 108,) and could not be made at a subsequent Term, independent of that Act, as has been decided in this Court, in many cases. Without deciding, therefore, on any other point made in the cause, the judgment must be reversed for this error, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be had.

It is unnecessary to decide the question arising under the Statute of Jeofails, in this case, (if we could give any opinion ¹⁶³ on it, there being no verdict or issue joined), as, whichever way they might be decided, still the cause must go back for the reason above assigned, and the plaintiff will have an opportunity to amend, or the defendant to demur to his declaration.

It may not be impertinent, however, to remark, that if this declaration, on the face of it, shews that the plaintiffs had no cause of action, as has been contended for, and if nevertheless, such declaration, and the judgment thereon, must be supported, when the jury, on an issue joined, find for the plaintiff; it is a strong illustration of the propriety of a remark made by counsel, some days ago, on this Act, "that counsel in the country, in order to guard the interests of their clients, ought to go constantly prepared with blank demurrers, and put in one in every case where they appear for a defendant; and that if this practice should be the result of the late amendment to that Statute, it may have a very beneficial effect, by producing more care in declaring, than was necessary even under the Act as it before stood; and thus preserve in the profession some attention to legal forms."

JUDGE CABELL.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Superior Court of Law for the county of Richmond.

Although the record states, that the jury were sworn to try the issue joined between the parties, yet it does not shew that any plea was filed by the defendant, nor that any issue was, in fact, joined.

The counsel for the appellee has exhibited the transcript of an order of the Superior Court, made at a Term subsequent to that at which the judgment was rendered, shewing that the Court received the evidence of the clerk, that a plea had been regularly filed, and that issue was joined thereon, and directing the plea to be entered nunc pro tunc. But, we cannot regard this transcript as any part of ¹⁶⁴ *the record. In the case of Vaughan and Field, ex'ors of Field v. Freeland, reported in a note to 2 Munf. 477, this Court decided that it was erroneous in the District Court, after the term, to amend the record, even by the written minutes of the clerk. It would be much more improper to allow such amendment, founded on the mere recollection and oral testimony of the clerk.

Without deciding any other question made in the argument, I am of opinion to reverse the judgment, on the ground that no issue was joined between the parties.

JUDGE CARR and the PRESIDENT concurred, and the judgment was reversed.*

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Staunton, where John Pate filed his bill against William M'Clure, Alexander M'Clure, George Lynham, James Breckenridge and Andrew Hamilton. The case, so far as it is material to the present report, is briefly this. Pate became indebted to William M'Clure & Co. and executed ¹⁶⁵ *his note for the sum of $6584, on the 7th day of June, 1798. Some payments were made; and for the balance, Pate endorsed two sterling bills of exchange in blank, and delivered them to M'Clure & Co. drawn by George Lynham, of Norfolk, on Walter Burrows of London, payable at ninety days sight. These bills were dishonoured by refusal to accept, on the 21st of October, 1799, and afterwards, at the proper time, protested for non-payment. M'Clure informed Pate by letter, dated the 2d of February, 1800, that the bills were refused acceptance, and not likely to be paid, when due: that Lynham had some property, and would pay, if able; and asks his instructions how to act. A correspondence then ensued, which is particularly de-

†Bill of Exchange Notice of Protest—Acknowledgment of Debt as Waiver of.—On this subject, the principal case is cited in Cardwell v. Allan, 33 Gratt. 166: Devendorf v. W. Va. etc. L. Co. 17 W. tailed in the opinion which follows. Pate then executed a deed of trust to Andrew Hamilton as trustee, to secure the payment of the debt due to M'Clure & Co. The land so conveyed in trust, was advertised for sale by Hamilton the trustee, to satisfy this debt.

The bill prays that this sale may be enjoined, on the grounds that M'Clure had not given timely notice of the protest of the bills, and that M'Clure had acted negligently and fraudulently in his agency; by which Pate was discharged from the debt. There are other small objections, which are sufficiently noticed in the following opinion.

The injunction was awarded to restrain the trustee from selling the land.

The defendants answered, and a variety of evidence was filed, consisting of depositions and correspondence between the parties, &c.

Hamilton, the trustee, having died during the progress of the suit, the Chancellor substituted the marshal of his Court in his place, to execute the decree, which was to the following effect: that the land should be sold, or so much thereof, as might be necessary to satisfy the claim of the defendants, by the marshal, and the purchaser at the said sale to have the benefit of a bond executed by the plaintiff with Matthew Pate and Edmund Pate, as 166 sureties to William M'Clure & Co. for the removal of a lien upon the said land, prior to the said deed of trust. But the dissolution of the said injunction, is without prejudice to any action or actions at law, which the plaintiff may think proper to institute against the defendants Alexander and William M'Clure, or either of them, for the purpose of recovering any damages which he may have sustained by the loss of the bills of exchange drawn by George Lynham on Walter Burrows, &c. And so much of his decree as dissolves the said injunction, and directs the said sale, is suspended, until the defendants Alexander and William M'Clure, or either of them, or some responsible person for them, shall execute to the plaintiff, or file with the clerk of this Court, bond with sufficient security, in the penalty of $6000, conditioned for paying to the plaintiffs all such damages as he may recover in any action or actions at law aforesaid.

The plaintiff appealed.

The cause was argued by Johnson, for the appellant, and Wickham, for the appellees.

The counsel for the appellant made several objections to the decree. These were, 1. That it was erroneous to make any decree against the appellant, further than dismissing the bill, even if he had not been entitled to relief. 2. The Court should not have appointed the marshal to conduct the sale, without having the heirs of Hamilton the trustee, before the Court. 3. That the decree was wrong in requiring that the purchaser should have the benefit of the bond, executed by Matthew and Edmund

Pate, before the Court. 4. The injunction ought not to have been dissolved, before the right to damages had been ascertained. 5. That the M'Clures were responsible for these bills, whether they were committed to them as agents, or as a security for the debt. In either character, they were guilty of such negligence as would exonerate Pate. It was their duty carefully to preserve the security put into their hands. M'Mahon v. Fawcett, 2 Rand. 53. Pothier on Obl. No. 427, 520, 521. Hays v. Ward, 4 Johns. Ch. Cas. 130. There ought besides, to have been a protest for non-acceptance. The bill was at 90 days after sight. In such case, a protest for non-acceptance was indispensable. Proof of protest cannot be furnished from any other source than the protest itself. Chitt. on Bills, 278, 279. That this evidence of protest is not sufficient, is proved by Chitt. on Bills, 280, 281.

March 25. JUDGE CARR.

This is a bill of injunction to stay proceedings on a deed of trust executed by the plaintiff to secure a debt to the defendants. In his bill, the plaintiff claims several small credits, as omissions in the accounts presented by the defendants; but these claims are inadmissible, as the plaintiff has settled the whole account, and acknowledged its correctness, twice at least; in 1803, when he settled with M'Credie, and executed his bond, and in 1806, when he executed a deed of trust to secure the debt then under the direction of Breckenridge; and there is no evidence whatever, that either of these settlements was procured by fraud, or any kind of concealment or misunderstanding.

Passing by these small items, we will consider the important question in the cause; that is, ought the plaintiff to receive a credit on his debt to the defendants, of 5721. 4 1 sterling, the amount of two bills of exchange, drawn by George Lynham, on Walter Burrows of London, in favor of Pate; by him endorsed in blank, and delivered to Alexander M'Clure, by whom they were endorsed to Miller, Hart & Co. or order. The circumstances are briefly these. Lynham had had property taken on the high seas, by the cruisers of 168 Great Britain. He had made *Burrows his agent, to solicit compensation from that government for these spoliations; and in the hope that he might have received funds from that source, he drew the bills on him, which he passed to Pate in payment for tobacco purchased of him. The bills were delivered to Alexander M'Clure, in the early part of September, 1799. They were payable at 90 days sight. On the 21st of October, 1799, it seems from a note of the notary public, that these bills were presented for acceptance, and dishonoured by a refusal to accept. Counting the 90 days from the 21st of October, the bills would be payable the 22d of January, 1800. They were regularly presented for payment, refused and protested; as we see by a copy of them in the record. On the 2d of February, 1800, M'Clure informs Pate by letter, that the bills are refused acceptance, and are not likely to be paid when due: that they were due in January, and might be expected in March or April: that Lynham has some property, and will pay, if able; but as he is informed, there are other bills in the same predicament, he asks instructions how he shall act most for Pate's interest, and most likely to prevent loss. "For instance, (he says,) he may be unable to pay money, and willing to give West India produce, or some other equivalent, which I might, from a knowledge of his situation, be induced to accept, rather than run any further risque by delay; and you may be assured, I will do for your interest, as I would for my own." There is no answer to this letter in the record. On the 21st of March, 1800, M'Clure writes to Pate, that he has no idea the bills will be paid, and is daily expecting to receive them under protest, when he will do his best to recover them; but in the mean time, the advance is heavy and severely felt, and he therefore expects that Pate will pay up his debt, in the course of the spring. On the 21st of June, 1800, M'Clure writes Pate, that not a shilling is paid on the returned bills, and presses him for payment. On the 20th of October, he writes to him pressing payment, and says nothing 169 has been gotten of Lynham: "that two of his vessels had been taken, and one returned in ballast: that there was no species of property he could get hold of, though he had left nothing untried. On the 20th of June, 1801, Pate writes to M'Clure, stating how hardly he is pressed by the protest of Lynham's bills: that he had better have given away the tobacco; expresses a hope that something might still be gotten from him; begs indulgence, and promises the best payments he can possibly make.

I have given thus much of the correspondence, to shew, that on the protest of the bills, M'Clure immediately looked to Pate for their amount, and that Pate explicitly acknowledged himself liable, and promised payment: that in every thing M'Clure did, towards attempting to get the amount of the bills from Lynham, he considered himself acting as the friend and agent of Pate, and that Pate also considered it in the same light. Many more letters are in the record, going to prove the same points; but it is useless to notice them farther. Pate, in 1803, gave a new bond, including the amount of the bills. In 1806, he gave a deed of trust on land, to secure the same debt. By various promises of selling the land and making payment, (as Breckenridge states in his answer,) he gained time, year after year, till 1812; and it was never till after his land was advertised for sale, that the objections to payment, and the claims of credit stated in his bill, seem to have been thought of.

It is now objected, 1st, that there is no evidence in the record, that he had a regular and timely notice of the protest, and that, therefore, he is released from paying the bills: 2dly, that M'Clure has been negligent in his agency, has acted fraudulently, in concealing the loss of the bills; and that on this ground also, Pate is released.

As to the first, Alexander M'Clure says, in direct response to a particular interrogatory in the bill, that immediately on the return of the bills, he gave due notice of the protest both to Lynham and Pate; and 170 this is strongly "corroborated by the correspondence. But in truth, the case is taken wholly off that ground, by the various subsequent promises to pay, and acts of sanction and ratification given and done by Pate; promises and acts, covering an interval of twelve years, and done in the most solemn manner, with full knowledge of the facts. After this, it is equally repugnant to reason and to law, that he should claim to be discharged for want of notice, and call on the other party to prove that he proceeded in strict conformity with all the niceties of the law merchant. If he had intended to place himself on this ground, the time for it was, when the bills came back, and he was pressed for payment of them. He should then have said, "shew that in all things, you have proceeded strictly; that the bills have been regularly protested, and due notice of protest given to me." Nor will it avail him to say, that he was ignorant of the law; every man is bound to know the law.

The cases on this subject, in the English books, are abundant; and there is also one in this Court, on the very point. It is Walker v. Laverty, &c., 6 Munf. 487. Debt on a protested bill of exchange against John C. Walker of the firm of Walker & Co. The declaration states the drawing, the presentation and protest of the bill, of which defendant had notice, &c. (in the usual form of declarations in such cases.) Plea, nil debet. On the trial, the defendant required proof of notice of protest for non-payment of the bill. The plaintiff introduced a witness, who proved, that he applied to the defendant for payment of the said bill, who acknowledged that the debt was a just one, and said he would pay it. But, nothing was said as to his receiving notice or not. Defendant then moved the Court to instruct the jury, that unless the acknowledgment was made, with a knowledge of all the facts in the case, as to the laches of the holders of the bill, the evidence of acknowledgment was not to be received; which opinion the Court refused to give, and instructed the jury that such acknowledgment was a waiver of no-

171 tice. Defendant excepted, "and a verdict being found against him, brought the case up by Supersedeas, contending that the Superior Court erred in not giving the instruction asked for by him, and referring in his petition to Blesard v. Hurst, 5 Burr. 2672. Goodall &c. v. Dolly, 1 Term. Rep. 712, and 12 East. 38. This Court, after argument, affirmed the judgment. As the Court do not state the reasons or the authorities on which they found their opinion, I will shew by a reference to some of the cases, that they have full authority for the decision.

In Bilbie v. Lumly, 2 East. 469, an underwriter had promised payment, with a knowledge of facts which would have released him from his contract, and afterwards attempted to avoid the promise on the ground of ignorance of the law. The Court said, "every man must be taken to be conversant of the law. Otherwise, there is no saying to what extent the excuse of ignorance might be carried. It would be urged in almost every case."

Lundie v. Robertson, 7 East. 231. Suit against an endorser, who relied on want of notice. Lord Ellenborough said, "the case does not admit of a doubt. The defendant is charged as endorser of a bill of exchange. When applied to for payment, he says, he has no cash by him, but if the witness will call again, he will pay it. Now, when a man, against whom there is a demand, promises to pay it; for the necessary facilitating of business in transactions between man and man, every thing must be presumed against him. It was therefore to be presumed prima facie, from the promise, that the bill had been presented for payment in due time, and dishonoured; and that due notice of it had been given to the defendant."

Stevens v. Lynch, 12 East. 38. The drawer of the bill, knowing that time had been given, but apprehending that he was still liable, three months after it was due, said, "I know I am liable, and if the acceptor does not pay it, I will." The Court said the defendant had made the promise with full knowledge of the facts, 172 three months after *the bill had been dishonoured, and could not now defend himself upon the ground of his ignorance of the law.

Potter v. Rayworth, 13 East. 417. A note was made payable to order of defendant, who endorsed it and delivered it to Fulford. It passed through several hands, and some time elapsed after its dishonour, before the defendant heard of it. At length, one Kirton, who then held it, applied to the defendant, and he promised payment. He failed to pay, however, and Kirton had recourse to his immediate endorser, who paid him, and then sued the defendant as first endorser. He relied on want of notice. The plaintiff relied on the promise made to Kirton, either as an admission of due notice, or a waiver of notice. It was insisted on the other side, that the promise being to a third person, and not in the plaintiff's presence, the case was not within the principle of Lundie v. Robertson. The Court held, that whether the promise were made to the plaintiff, or any other who held the note, it was equally evidence, that the defendant was conscious of his liability to pay; and must be considered either as an acknowledgment that he had due notice, or that without such notice, he was the proper person to pay.

The cases of Gibbon v. Coggin, 2 Camp. 188, and Jones v. Morgan &c. 2 Camp. 474, are also very strong to this point. In the former, Lord Ellenborough says, "by Colbourn's promise to pay, he admits his liability; he admits the existence of every thing necessary to render him liable. When called on for payment of the bill, he should have objected that there was no protest. Instead of that, he promises to pay it. I must therefore presume, that he had due notice, and that a protest was regularly drawn up by a notary." See also Pierson v. Hooker, 2 Johns. Rep. 68, and the cases cited in the note. I consider it clear from these authorities, as well as the reason of the case, that the plaintiff has no right to object on the ground of the failure of M'Clure to proceed regularly with notice of protest, &c.

173 *As little foundation is there, in my opinion, for the objection, that the negligence of M'Clure in his agency, or the loss of the bills, or his concealment of that loss, ought to release Pate from the payment of them. As to the loss of the bills, M'Clure was chargeable with no neglect on that score, for his store was broken open, and his strong box taken off, in which the bills were deposited; and where, it is in evidence, that merchants often keep valuable papers. But the loss could be of no serious injury, because notarial copies, with proof that the originals were lost, would be sufficient for every purpose. It is in full proof, that from the time of drawing the bills, or shortly thereafter, till he left Norfolk in 1802, Lynham was insolvent: that he left many creditors unsatisfied, who were so confident of his inability to pay, that they gave him a letter of license to leave the country, and promising not to molest him for five years. The only possible chance for recovering the money of him, seems to have been the claim on the French government, which was allowed and paid at the treasury in Washington. But I can see no ground for charging M'Clure with negligence on this point. There is no evidence that he ever heard of it 'till 1806, and the money was paid to Lynham's order in 1805. None of his numerous creditors in Norfolk seem to have been aware of this fact, in time to avail themselves of it; and it would be hard measure to mete out to a voluntary and gratuitous agent, to hold him to greater diligence, and more efficient exertions, than those were capable of, who were stimulated by the powerful motive of self-interest. We see too from the evidence, that Alexander M'Clure did write to his brother William, prior to his leaving France in 1808, making enquiries after Lynham &c. and that William did try to find him out, and could not. We also have it from William, in his answer, that after his return to France in 1809 or 1810, he made enquiries after Lynham; that he was told he had retired to the interior, somewhere in the vicinity of the Pyrenees, utterly insolvent: that

174 William *knew the notary in London, who had protested the bills, and could with ease have gotten notarial copies from him, which he would have done, if he had seen any prospect of benefiting Pate. From these considerations, it is perfectly clear to me, that Alexander M'Clure was guilty of no such negligence as would make him chargeable: that Lynham was utterly insolvent, so that no injury could result to the plaintiff from any negligence, from the loss of the bills, or the failure to disclose that loss to Pate; and that there is no ground for this second objection.

It was objected in the argument, that the Chancellor erred in supplying the place of the trustee, who had died pending the suit, and in committing the execution of the trust to the marshal, under the superintendence of the Court. I have reflected a good deal upon this point, and examined the cases. Upon the reason and the practice, I cannot think the thing wrong. The parties had submitted their case to the equity of the court. The Chancellor had arrested the proceedings in the country. This was done at the instance of Pate by bill of injunction, making such a case, as the Court of Equity thought justified its interference. The case was fully developed, and it appeared finally, that the plaintiff's injunction was wholly unsupported. The Chancellor decided all the points against him; and it was clear that he ought, in good conscience, never to have come into equity, to arrest the proceedings of the trustee. In the mean time, this trustee had died; and though the deed was to him and his heirs, the trust was a personal confidence placed in him. Who his heirs were, whether infants or adults, does not appear. The Chancellor was either to dismiss the bill and leave this matter in doubt and uncertainty, or to supply the place of the trustee, and thus place the parties as nearly as might be, in the situation they would have occupied, if the case had not been brought before the Court. The right to make such substitution by motion, and without putting the parties, who were all before the Court, to 175 new pleadings, seems to *me fairly to belong to those powers, which Courts of Equity, in order to do complete justice, exercise in all cases before them; and more especially, in injunction cases. If the trustee had continued in life, and there had been no objection to him on the score of interest, misconduct, or any other sufficient ground, I would by no means be understood to say, that the Chancellor could, of his own mere motion, set him aside, and put the execution of the trust into the hands of the marshal. This would be to deprive the parties against their will, of a trustee, to whom they had both confided the business, as their confidential friend, and to subject them to the commissions of the marshal, when that friend could probably execute the trust without expense. The case here is wholly different. The creditor has been deprived of the services of the trustee, by the interference of the Court, at the instance of the plaintiff; and the question is, cannot the Court, at the request of the creditor, and when the plaintiff makes no objection that we see in the record, repair the mischief which its interference has produced? I think what Lord Eldon says, in Pultney v. Warren, 6 Ves. 92, very applicable to this case. Speaking of the injury which had resulted to a party from an injunction granted by the Court, he says, "If there be a principle, upon which Courts of Justice ought to act without scruple, it is this; to relieve parties against that injustice occasioned by its own acts or oversights, done at the instance of the party against whom the relief is sought." He then cites a case from Shower, where a party came into equity to be relieved from a bond, which was sued on at law. The litigation was drawn out into such length, that before the decision, the principal and interest far exceeded the penalty of the bond; and the Court of Equity, finding that the injunction was unfounded, and the bond justly due, decreed that the plaintiff should pay the whole principal, interest and costs. Duval v. Terry, Show. Parl. Cas. 15. Commenting upon this case, he says, "by the mere circumstances of filing the bill, the 176 plaintiff would *be taken to submit to every thing conscience and justice require. Upon that principal, he would be held to do that which is just; and the Court, duly acting with him, would compel him to pay the principal, interest and costs, occasioned by his delay. It may be said," he adds, "that this is a relief against a plaintiff coming for relief. I consider these persons as plaintiffs, asking an injunction, and impliedly saying, they ask it upon the terms of putting the plaintiff (at law,) in exactly the same situation, as if it had been determined they were not entitled; for otherwise, there is no colour of justice in calling upon the Court to discuss the question, whether they are entitled to equitable relief. These, it seems to me, are sound principles, and very applicable to the case before us. There are also several cases in this Court, where the Court in order to render complete justice, have gone quite as far as the Chancellor has done in this case. I will only refer to the cases by name. Todd v. Bowyer, 1 Munf. 447. Fox v. Taliaferro, 4 Munf. 243. West v. Belches, 5 Munf. 187. Ball's devisees v. Ball's ex'rs and widow, 3 Munf. 279; and Humphreys' adm'r v. M'Clenachan's adm'r 1 Munf. 493, a very strong case.

It was also objected, that the decree was erroneous, in giving to the person who might purchase the land at the sale by the marshal, the benefit of the bond executed by Pate and his brothers to M'Clure & Co. and conditioned to remove the lien of Galt on the land. But I think this part of the decree perfectly correct, and so clearly equitable, that I rather think it would have followed without the decree. Nor can the sureties complain; for, it does not change their situation, nor affect any defence they may have against the bond.

Thus far, I think the Chancellor correct. But there is one part of the decree, from which I feel compelled to dissent. It is that which suspends the sale, till the defendants, or some one for them, shall give bond in the sum of $6000, conditioned to pay the plaintiff all such damages 177 *as he may recover of them, on account of the conduct of the defendant Alexander, touching the bills of exchange. I think the whole record shews, that the plaintiff has suffered no damages whatever from the conduct of Alexander; and though I would leave the plaintiff free to bring any suit he may choose, there does not seem to be the least ground for subjecting the defendants to give the bond.

I am of opinion, therefore, that this part of the decree be reversed, the residue affirmed, and that the cause be remanded to be proceeded in accordingly.

The other Judges concurred, and a decree was entered in pursuance of the foregoing principles.*

Harrison v. Tiernans.

Two Suits.

March, 1826.

Bail Bond—No Amount Specified—Effect.*—A bail bond which is returned to the clerk's office, but which specifies no sum to be paid by the obligor to the obligee is a mere nullity.

Deeds—Promissory Notes—Distinction between.—The difference between deeds, and bills of exchange, and promissory notes, as to the mode of their execution.

These were two actions of debt brought in the Superior Court of Law for the County of Rockingham, by the appellees against John Clarke, on two single bills. Each writ was endorsed, "Debt on single bill". Bail required." These writs were returned executed, with G. W. Harrison as appearance bail. At the same time, papers, purporting to be bail bonds, were returned to the clerk's office. These papers were in the usual form, signed and sealed by John Clarke and G. W. Harrison, but no sum is mentioned in the penalty of either bond. Declarations were filed, and office judgments obtained against the defendant and G. W. Harrison, his appearance bail.

Harrison applied for, and obtained a Supersedeas to these judgments, from a Judge of this Court.

Wickham, for the appellant, referred to the case of Shelton v. Pollock & Co. 1 Hen. & Munf. 423, as decisive of this question.

Nicholas, for the appellees, contended, that upon general principles, whenever a man signs a bond in blank, he gives authority to another to fill it up. That this is true of negotiable paper, is proved by Chitt. on Bills, 35, 113. 4 Mass. Rep. 45. The same principle exists as to bonds. 5 Mass. Rep. 538. But the case of bail bonds is still stronger. Our Act of Assembly prescribes no particular form. It is enough for the Sheriff to take the engagement of the bail, that the principal shall appear &c. This principle undoubtedly prevails in the case of forthcoming bonds. Wilson v. Beall, 4 Munf. 380. Bartley & Ferguson v. Yates, 2 Hen. & Munf. 398. The omission of a penalty is immaterial, as it is not required.

A bond may be with or without a penalty. Such an error would not be fatal in England, where the Statute is more particular than in this country. Sell. Prac. 143. Rogers v. Reeves, 1 Term. Rep. 418. The bond is not in question here. Judgment has been obtained against the principal and bail, in the original suit.

Wickham replied, that there was no analogy between the case of a bond, and a mere promissory note, or a bill of exchange. A bond is a deed and requires delivery to perfect it. As for the Massachusetts Case, it is not law. The other cases cited, are wholly inapplicable.

179 *March 28. JUDGE CABELL delivered the opinion of the Court.†

It was decided by this Court, in the case of Shelton v. Pollock & Co. 1 Hen. & Munf. 423, that if the Sheriff returns a writ executed, and the name of the appearance bail, but does not return the bail bond, or a copy thereof to the clerk's office, together with the writ, judgment ought not to be entered against the bail, but against the Sheriff.

In the case at bar, the Sheriff returned with the writ, a writing purporting to be a bail bond, but which specifies no sum of money to be paid by the obligor to the obligee; the part of the writing, in which the sum of money intended to be paid is usually inserted, being left entirely blank. And the question is, whether such a writing can be regarded as a good bail bond?

"A bond is a deed, whereby the obligor obliges himself to pay a certain sum of money to another, at a day appointed. If this be all, the bond is called a single one, simplex obligatio; but there is generally a condition added, that if the obligor does some particular act, the obligation shall be void, or else to remain in full force." 2 Black. Com. 340. The obligation to pay money, is then of the essence of a bond, and is, in fact, the only stipulation which the bond contains. But, in the case before us, the stipulation is to pay nothing. It is no bond; it is a nullity.

Nor can this defect be supplied by the recital in the condition. The condition forms no part of the obligation or bond. It is entirely for the benefit of the obligor; stating matter by which the obligation or bond may be discharged. He may, or he may not comply with it, at his election. If he be unwilling or unable to comply with the condition, the law intends that the bond shall charge him. But how can this be, when the bond itself is a nullity?

180 *The counsel for the appellant, endeavoured to assimilate this to those cases, which have been decided according to the principles settled in Russell v. Langstaffe, Doug. 496, and Colles v. Emmett, 1 H. Black. 313, concerning bills of exchange and promissory notes. According to those cases, a man who signs his name to a blank piece of paper, will, under certain circumstances, be considered as giving authority to fill it up with a bill of exchange or promissory note, which he will be bound to pay. But, those cases were decided on a principle totally inapplicable to this. Bills of exchange and promissory notes, are not deeds; and authority to execute them may be given by parol, or inferred from circumstances. But, a bail bond is a deed, which cannot take effect without delivery; and this delivery can only be made by the party himself, or by some attorney legally constituted by deed, for that purpose. Now, the writing in question could not take effect as a bail bond delivered by the appellant himself; because, being blank as to the sum of money intended to be paid, it was as a bail bond, a mere nullity. Nor could it take effect as a deed to the Sheriff, authorising him to execute a bail bond for the appellant, because it does not even profess to have such object in view.

This case, therefore, cannot be distinguished from that of Shelton v. Pollock & Co.

The Court is of opinion to reverse the judgment and remand the cause to the Superior Court, that it may be sent to the Rules, that it may be proceeded in according to law.

181 Calloway and Others v. Langhorne and Wife.

May, 1826.

Wills—Construction—Intention—Case at Bar.—The intention is to govern in the construction of a will. Therefore, where a testator, who devised his real estate to his children, and also a sum of money to one of them, so that his estate, both real and personal, not specifically given, shall be brought into estimate, and divided in such manner as to make their portions equal: the sum of money bequeathed as aforesaid, shall be taken into the general estimate, although the terms specifically given and estimate, do not strictly apply to money, it being the plain intention, inferred from the whole will, to make all his children equal.

Legacies—Interest upon Interest.—Interest upon interest on a legacy, will not be allowed, unless the testator plainly requires it.

Appeal from the Chancery Court of Lynchburg.

The question arose under the will of James Calloway, deceased. The testator, after devising portions of his real and personal estate to his wife and children, makes the following provision for the female appellant, one of his children. "Item, I give and bequeath unto my daughter, Catharine Calloway, the mansion house of land, with the mill on Lick run, and all the personal estate, except the slaves that I have given to my wife, after the termination of her estate thereto, unto my said daughter and her heirs forever. I also give her one negro named Peggy, and the sum of 1000l. to be paid to her by my executors, as herein after to be directed, and until this is fully done and completed, they are to pay her annually the interest thereon." He then devises all the residue of his estate, both real and personal, to his executors, for the purpose of paying all his debts, his daughter Lucy's legacy, and the legacy to his daughter Catharine, at her intermarriage, or arrival at the age of twenty-one years; and for these purposes, he gives his executors unlimited power to sell, dispose of, rent, hire out, &c. the above mentioned property. After these objects are satisfied, he empowers his executors to divide the residue of his estate among his children and grand-children, with an express injunction to make his children equal in point of property.

182 *The will then proceeds, "It is my will and desire, that in the distribution of this residuary estate by my executors, it shall be so done, that the estate, whether real or personal, or both, heretofore and not specifically given to my children, or either of them, shall be brought into estimate, and each charged with what they may have so received, and this residuum to be so divided, as to make each equal to the other."

The testator added a codicil to his will, declaring, that instead of the former distribution of the residue of his estate, (which he apprehended might be too uncertain,) his children should receive their respective portions, according to "the estimate, or true value of all the estate they have received, or may specifically receive under the will, and for which they are bound to account, in order to produce the equality contemplated by the will. He proceeds to affix a valuation on the several portions, and estimates the value of Catharine's part at 2300l. He then concludes, "These sums are to be considered by my executors as the standard value of the respective estates, and no further estimate is, to be made."

The bill was filed by Langhorne, and his wife Catharine, against the executors, alleging that the estate devised to her had not been received until the day of in the year , at which time the legacy of 1000l. with simple interest from the time of the testator's death to the time of payment, was paid: that the executors insisted, that the said legacy was not comprehended in the said sum of 2300l. the estimate made by the testator; and consequently, that in the distribution of the residuum, so as to equalize the children's portions, the complainants should be charged with the 1000l. over and above the 2300l. whereas they conceive, that the said sum of 2300l. comprehends all the property, real and personal, specifically devised to the female plaintiff: that by the will, the executors were expressly directed to pay to the female plaintiff, annually, the interest on the said 1000l. that is 60l. which 183 *was the only provision made for her maintenance, until the payment of the principal: that this annuity was withheld for many years; they therefore insist that they are entitled to receive interest on the said 60l. until the principal was paid. They pray, that the executors may be made to account for the plaintiff Catharine's proportion of the residuum, after estimating the property devised to her, including the said money legacy, at the sum of 2300l. and that they be required to pay interest on the annuity of 60l. so long as that annuity was withheld.

The executors, in their answer, admit all the facts stated in the bill, and being only anxious to discharge their duty correctly, they submit the construction of the will to the Court. The other defendants answered, resting on the objections which have been briefly stated in the bill.

Depositions were taken; but as they were not considered in the decree of this Court, they are omitted.

The Chancellor decreed, that in the distribution of the residuary estate of James Calloway, deceased, his executors ought not to pay interest on the interest of the legacy of 1000l. bequeathed to the plaintiff Catharine; that the said legacy forms a part of the 2300l. mentioned in the codicil to the will of the testator; and that for the legacy and other property devised to them, the plaintiffs are to be charged only with the sum of 2300l. in the distribution.

The defendants appealed.

Wickham, for the appellants, contended that parol evidence might be received to explain the will in this case. For this he referred to Shelton v. Shelton, 1 Wash. 45. Kennon v. M^r Roberts, Ib. 96. Reno v.

Davis, 4 Hen. & Munf. 283. The testator did not mean that the 1000l. should be estimated; nor could he have applied the terms "specifically given," to money. Those terms apply only to property, not money. The codicil is liable to the same observation. It speaks of property estimated.

184 *As to the question of interest, it never is paid on a legacy payable in futuro. 1 Ves. jun. 451.

Leigh, for the appellees.

Parol evidence is not admissible in this case. There was nothing absurd in estimating a sum of money, where the testator had made different provisions for his children, some in property, some in money, &c. In like manner, the term "specifically," is not used technically, but means "particularly." If the money is not brought into hotchpot, the legacies will be unequal, while the testator clearly intended equality. The codicil explains the will to mean all the estate which he had given, of every kind whatsoever, to render the portions equal. The phrase "account," applies to money.

As to the interest, it was nothing more than a bequest of 60l. per annum, for the maintenance of a child. This is not the case of a debt, but it was a voluntary gift; and the donor might give compound interest if he pleased.

May 5. The PRESIDENT delivered the opinion of the Court.*

It seems to be very clear, that the testator intended that his children should take equal portions of his property. He expressly declares his design to be, to make all his children equal in point of property. That it was to be an equal portion, in relation to what he had specifically devised to them, and not in relation to his whole estate, including money, is not to be inferred from the use of the words, "estimate," and "specifically devised," in the will, as was argued. Words in a will are to be construed according to the subject matter to which they are made to apply, by the whole context of the will. Though 185 money "cannot be estimated or valued, in the strict sense of those terms; yet, as it was his purpose, more than once expressed, to make the fortunes of his children equal, to that purpose money may be estimated and valued. So also, it may be said to be specifically devised. This last expression also, may have been used to distinguish the several bequests from the residuum. In the codicil, which is to be taken as a part of the will, the expression "previously given," and the term "provision," are also used in reference to the same subject. They clearly include money, as well as specific property. Money may be given, and is also included in the term "provision."

As to the claim to interest upon interest on the 1000l. legacy, there is nothing in the will to justify it. The testator may have designed it as maintenance, until the death of his wife, when provision is made for the legatee; but he calls it interest, which does not generally carry interest; and if he intended that it should, he would have said so. Such a construction would also make the portion unequal, which was intended to be equal.

The decree is therefore to be affirmed.

186 *Farmers' Bank of Virginia v. Reynolds.

May, 1856.

Banks—Mutilated Bank Notes—Rights of Holder of.*—

Where a bank note is cut in two, and one half sent by mail and lost, the holder of the remaining half has a right to demand payment at the Bank, upon presentation of the half in his possession, proving ownership, and giving bond with adequate security for the indemnification of the Bank.

Same—Same—Same.—But if these pre-requisites are not complied with, and the Bank is used in consequence of refusing payment, the holder shall not recover interest or costs, although he may perform the conditions after the suit is brought.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Richmond.

John Reynolds of Ohio, sent, by mail, to his partner, Isaac Reynolds, in Baltimore, the halves of three notes of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, amounting to $210. John Reynolds afterwards sent, by mail, the corresponding halves of the bank notes. The first letter, enclosing the halves of the bank notes, was duly received by Isaac Reynolds; but the second letter, containing the corresponding halves, never came to hand, and have never been heard of since. The lost halves were advertised in newspapers of Washington, Cincinnati, and Baltimore.

Reynolds & Co. filed a bill against the Farmers' Bank, setting out the foregoing facts, and charging that the half notes in their possession had been presented for payment, but that the Bank had refused; although they offered good and sufficient security to indemnify the said Bank against the future appearance of the corresponding halves, so lost or stolen. They therefore pray that the Bank may be decreed to pay the amount of the said notes, &c.

The Bank, by its proper officers, answered, that the plaintiffs had never proved their ownership of the said notes, except by the affidavits of the parties themselves, which are not admissible evidence: that the Banks in Richmond had adopted a regulation, that they would not pay half notes, except under the decision of some competent tribunal; which regulation they have made public. The answer requires, that the plaintiffs shall give bond 187 with ample security to indemnify the Bank, and contends, that as the Bank has been in no default, it ought not to be subjected to costs, &c.

A deposition was taken, by which it appeared that the half notes mentioned in the bill, were enclosed, as therein stated, to Isaac Reynolds, in Baltimore: that they were either lost or stolen; and immediately advertised.

The Chancellor decreed that the Bank should pay to Reynolds & Co. the sum of $210 with interest from the time of the presentation of the half notes at the Bank, until payment, and the costs of this suit; but the effect of the decree to be suspended, until the plaintiffs shall have entered into bond with good security, to the defendants, in the penalty of $420, against the claims of any persons, who might thereafter come against them, in consequence of having the possession of the halves of the said notes.

The defendants appealed.

Nicholas and Leigh. for the appellants.
Bacchus, for the appellees.

May 6. JUDGE CABELL delivered the opinion of the Court.

The evidence in this cause sufficiently establishes, that the appellees are the bona fide owners of the bank notes in the bill mentioned; that the said notes were cut into two parts for the purpose of being transmitted by the mail; and that one half of each of the said notes was lost, in consequence thereof. The Chancellor, therefore, was clearly right, according to the case of The Bank of Virginia v. Ward, 6 Munf. 166, in giving to the appellees the amount of the said notes, on their entering into bond with adequate security, for the indemnity of the appellants.

The only questions are, as to the propriety of compelling the appellants to pay interest and costs.

188 *Interest is in the nature of damages for improperly withholding a debt, beyond the time when it ought to be paid. But the appellants were in no default whatever, in not paying the notes in this case. Banks are under no obligation to seek out their creditors; they are bound to pay only on a demand for payment made at their offices of discount and deposit. And in the case of the presentation of the moiety of a note, the demand for payment at the Bank, must be accompanied with such evidence of the ownership of the note, as ought to satisfy the Bank. The Bank of Virginia v. Ward, 6 Munf. 166. The demand in the case before us, was unaccompanied by any such evidence. That demand, therefore, imposed no obligation to pay the principal, and of course, could give no claim for interest. Sufficient evidence of ownership has been exhibited since the institution of this suit; but no demand of payment has been made at the Bank, since that evidence was taken. The appellees, therefore, are not yet in default, and consequently ought not to pay interest.

The question of costs is still plainer. Costs are given or withheld at the discretion of a Court of Chancery; and the sound exercise of this discretion forbids the imposition of costs on a party, in no wise in the wrong.

The decree, therefore, is affirmed, so far as it directs the payment of the amount of the notes in the bill mentioned, but is to be reversed, so far as it directs the payment of interest and of costs by the appellants. And the appellants are to recover their costs, both in this Court, and in the Court of Chancery.

Cunningham v. Mitchell.

May, 1826.

Forthcoming Bond—Principal—Surety—Case at Bar.—A. B. & C. execute a forthcoming bond, to release the goods of A. taken in execution. C. pays the debt, and moves against B. as a principal in the bond. There is nothing in the bond to shew whether B. was principal or surety. B. contends that he was only a surety jointly with C. The Court below give judgment for C. on the motion. No evidence is in the record to shew whether B. was surety or principal. The judgment was affirmed in this Court, as it will be presumed, that the Court below had evidence before them, that B. was a principal and not a surety.

Record—Papers Inserted by Clerk.—Papers inserted in the record by the clerk, cannot be considered as part of the record, unless they are made so by the party wishing to avail himself of them.

Sheriff's Return—Contradiction of.—A Sheriff's return may be contradicted by evidence alunde; in which case the Sheriff himself would be a competent witness to prove its truth. But after judgment by default, a party cannot object in an Appellate Court, to the truth of the return.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Spottsylvania county. The case was this:

Two motions were made upon due notice, by Reuben Mitchell, against Joshua Long and James Cunningham, for the sums of $215 73, and $455 91, money which he had paid as surety on two forthcoming bonds executed by Long and Cunningham, and himself as their surety. The clerk certifies, that the plaintiff, in support of his motions, introduced two executions against Long and Cunningham, his appearance bail, and forthcoming bonds in pursuance thereof. These bonds are executed by Long, Cunningham and Mitchell, reciting in the condition, that a Fi. Fa. had issued against the goods and chattels of Long and Cunningham, his appearance bail, a negro man &c. of Long's taken and released upon giving the said

*For monographic note on Records, see end of case.

Principal and Surety—Parol Evidence to Establish the Relation.—In Williams v. Macatee, 86 Va. 684, 10 S. E. Rep. 1061, it was said that the relation of principal and surety can be proved by parol evidence and the principal case was quoted from to sustain the point.

Record—Papers Inserted by Clerk.—It is not the province of the clerk to make anything a part of the record, his province is to copy the record as it is; and the clerk's certificate that the papers were relied on cannot make them a part of the record. To this point the principal case is cited in Roanoke Land & Imp. Co. v. Karn, 80 Va. 593, 593; Davie v. Hughes, 86 Va. 920, 11 S. E. Rep. 488.

In Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 202, the clerk copied at the end of the record a certificate signed by the judge stating that a demurrer had been filed and overruled by the court but no entry of it had been made by the clerk. The record book failed to show the filing of the demurrer at any time; and this memorandum of the judge was not referred to on the record book. It was held that the memorandum of the judge could not be considered as a part of the record in the case, though the clerk did certify that it was a transcript of a paper in the cause; the court citing the principal case to sustain its holding. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Bowyer v. Chesnut, 4 Leigh 4; White v. Toncray, 9 Leigh 852; Phares v. Saunders, 18 W. Va. 341.

Sheriff's Return.—See monographic note on Sheriffs and Constables* appended to Goode v. Galt, Gilm. 152.

Appellate Practice—Notice of Suit—Waiver.—By appearing to the action and going to trial, on the merits, the defendant dispenses with a formal service of process and waives any objection to the alleged irregularity and cannot raise the objection for the first time in the appellate court. Pulliam v. Allen, 15 Gratt. 62, citing principal case as authority. On the same subject, the principal case is cited in Freeman's Bank v. Ruckman, 16 Gratt. 126; Watson v. Wigginton, 28 W. Va. 545.

bond; but they do not state whether Cunningham was a principal obligor or a surety. They only state that Long "hath tendered the above bound Reuben Mitchell, as security, &c." The Sheriff states in his returns, that the forthcoming bonds were taken of the said Long and Cunningham, with Mitchell as surety. Judgments 190 were obtained on *these forthcoming bonds, executions issued, and the money paid by Mitchell, as appears by the return of the Sheriff.

On these motions, judgments were rendered by default; and Cunningham obtained a supersedeas.

Standar, for the appellee.

No Counsel, for the appellant.

The principal question made, was, whether, upon this record, Cunningham was to be considered as a surety or a principal obligor. The counsel for the appellee, relied on the case of Preston v. The Auditor, 1 Call, 471, to shew that it ought to be presumed, that the Court below had evidence that Cunningham was a principal and not a surety; and that if the appellant contested that point, he ought to have made his evidence part of the record.

May 9. JUDGE GREEN delivered the opinion of the Court.

In these cases, the defendant in supersedeas having given due notice that he should move for judgments against the plaintiff in supersedeas and Joshua Long, for money paid for them, as their surety, under execution; the defendants in the motions failed to appear, and judgments were given according to the notice. The proofs upon which the judgments were given, do not appear in the records. The plaintiff in supersedeas, having obtained copies of the records, and also, certain papers which the clerk certifies were the evidence upon which the judgments were rendered, objects that the judgments were erroneous, because it appears from the papers, certified by the clerk as the evidence, that in truth, Mitchell was not the surety for Cunningham, but for Long only; and, that Cunningham was a joint surety with Mitchell for Long, the principal debtor. From these papers it appears 191 that two suits were *brought against Long, and judgments were rendered against Long and Cunningham as his appearance bail; upon which executions issued and were levied upon Long's property, which was restored upon his tendering Mitchell as his surety in forthcoming bonds. Cunningham joined in these bonds; but it is not said upon the face of the bonds, whether he joined as principal or surety. The Sheriff's returns upon the executions state, that forthcoming bonds had been taken of Long and Cunningham, with Mitchell as his surety, and forfeited. Executions were awarded upon these bonds, and being issued, were paid to the Sheriff by Mitchell.

If the papers which disclose these facts could be considered as properly a part of the record, the judgments were right upon the merits, taking the Sheriff's returns that Long and Cunningham were the principals and Mitchell the surety, to be true. These returns did not contradict the evidence afforded by the executions and bonds. Although Cunningham appears to have been Long's appearance bail in the first instance, and the executions issued against him in that character, yet he might have stipulated with Mitchell to execute the bonds as principal, and to save him harmless, as an inducement to Mitchell to execute them as surety; and Mitchell might have refused to execute the bonds on any other terms. The bonds themselves do not ascertain whether Cunningham executed them as principal or surety, and, as in all other cases of joint bonds, the question whether one was principal and another surety, was to be solved by evidence aliunde. Cunningham might have contradicted the Sheriff's return; and in that case, the Sheriff himself would have been a competent witness to prove its truth. He cannot now, after submitting to a judgment by default, object, in this Court, to the truth of the return; for it cannot be here supported by parol proof, as it might have been in the Court below, if it had been there objected to.

192 *But, the certificate of the clerk, that those papers were the evidence upon which the judgments were founded, cannot be received as a part of the records. His certificate to that effect can have no more effect than that of any other individual. He may certify that such records exist in his office, but not what use was made of them. That ought to have been shewn by the record; and it was the duty of the party wishing to avail himself of the fact, to have it made a part of the record. We are bound to consider the fact, that Mitchell was surety for Long and Cunningham, which was the foundation of the motions, was properly in proof before the Court, and this was the ground of the judgment in Preston v. The Auditor, 1 Call, 471.

The judgments should be affirmed.

I. PUBLIC RECORDS.

A. DEFINITION OF PUBLIC RECORDS.—A public record is a written memorial, intended to serve as evidence of something written, said or done, made by a public officer authorized by law to make it. Coleman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 865.

B. DUTY TO KEEP RECORDS.—Whenever a written record of the transactions of a public officer in his office, is a convenient and appropriate mode of discharging the duties of his office, it is not only his right, but his duty to keep that written memorial, whether expressly required so to do or not; and, when kept, it becomes a public document, a public record, belonging to the office and not the officer. Coleman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 865.

C. AUTHORITY TO MAKE RECORDS.—And it is not necessary that one who makes a public record should derive his authority from an express statutory enactment. Coleman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 865.

D. CONCLUSIVENESS OF ACT OF RECORDING.—The act of a clerk admitting a paper to record is conclusive upon the question whether the paper is what it purports to be. Tallafiero v. Pryor, 12 Gratt. 277; Grove v. Zumbro, 14 Gratt. 515; Johnston v. Slater, 11 Gratt. 321; Vaughn v. Com., 17 Gratt. 390; Quinn v. Com., 20 Gratt. 144; Herring v. Lee, 22 W. Va. 672; State v. Vest, 21 W. Va. 800; Burley v. Weller, 14 W. Va. 272.

II. JUDICIAL RECORDS.

A. MATTERS THAT ARE PART OF THE RECORD.

Bond Given under Order of Court.—A bond given pursuant to an order of court, becomes a part of the very record. Beery v. Homan, 8 Gratt. 48.

Writ and Inquisition.—And, upon a motion to quash a writ and inquisition founded on a judgment at law, the writ and inquisition are a part of the record. Wallop v. Scarborough, 5 Gratt. 1.

Warrant of Summons.—So, too, the warrant summoning the magistrates of an examining court is a part of the record, but the warrant of commitment is not. Com. v. McCaul, 1 Va. Cas. 271.

Execution.—An execution of the same court, used as evidence on the trial of the cause, will be regarded by this court as part of the record, without a certiorari. Preston v. Auditor, 1 Call 471.

Papers in Another Suit.—And, a decree which refers to the record of another suit as an exhibit in the cause makes such record a part of the record of the cause under consideration, though it is not referred to in the bill or answer, nor made an exhibit by an entry on the order book. Craig v. Sebrell, 9 Gratt. 131.

How Far Writ Part of Record.—But the writ is a part of the record, for the purpose of amendment only, where issue has been joined upon a plea to the action. Payne v. Grim, 2 Munf. 297.

B. MATTERS THAT ARE NOT PART OF THE RECORD.

Advertisements of Judicial Sale.—Where advertisements to rent are not referred to in the commissioner's report, or in decree of sale subsequently ordered, they will not, though copied into the record, be considered a part thereof on appeal. Mustain v. Pannill, 86 Va. 33, 9 S. E. Rep. 419.

Bill of Injunction.—And, a bill of injunction and the proceedings thereupon are not properly part of the record of the judgment at common law. Hite v. Wilson, 2 Hen. & M. 268.

Papers Not in Cause.—Papers upon which a cause was not heard in the trial court constitute no part of the record of the cause and cannot be considered. Flourance v. Morien, 98 Va. 26, 34 S. E. Rep. 890.

Caption of Orders.—Nor is the caption to the orders a necessary part of the record. Jones v. Janes, 6 Leigh 167.

1. QUERE.

Quere, as to Depositions and Commissioner's Report.—A cause is brought on to be heard upon the bill, answer, exhibits and award; quere, if the depositions and commissioner's report are a part of the record. Nelson v. Cornwell, 11 Gratt. 724.

C. ADDITIONS MADE BY CLERK.—The clerk can add nothing to the record, and his certificate that a deposition or other paper copied by him was the evidence whereon the judgment was founded, is no part of the record. Roanoke L. & I. Co. v. Karn, 80 Va. 589; Cunningham v. Mitchell, 4 Rand. 189; Watson v. Com., 85 Va. 807, 9 S. E. Rep. 418; Offending v. Ford, 86 Va. 917, 12 S. E. Rep. 1; Johnson v. N. L. & I. Co., 90 Va. 267, 18 S. E. Rep. 36; Com. v. Quann, 2 Va. Cas. 89.

D. MODE OF PROVING.—One of the usual methods of proving records is by examining copies. The method prescribed by the Code of Va., § 3343, is merely cumulative, and does not deprive parties of the right to resort to any other method allowable at common law. So. Ry. Co. v. Wilcox, 99 Va. 394, 39 S. E. Rep. 144.

E. CERTIFYING RECORDS IN REMOVED CAUSE.—Where a cause is removed from one court to another the clerk of the court to which it is removed is the only person who can certify the record. Smith v. Pyrites, etc., Co., 100 Va. 292, 40 S. E. Rep. 918.

F. CURING DEFECTS.

Supplying Defects by Averment.—No defect in a record can be supplied by averment. Wood v. Com., 4 Rand. 329.

Supplying Omissions by Intendment.—And, no intendment can supply an omission from the record in a criminal case of what is material, but all proper inferences may and must be drawn from that which does appear. Gilligan v. Com., 99 Va. 816, 37 S. E. Rep. 962.

G. CORRECTING ERRORS.—A court may, at any time, permit the correction of clerical errors in its records. Anderson v. Kanawha Coal Co., 12 W. Va. 526; Bohn v. Zeigler, 44 W. Va. 402, 29 S. E. Rep. 983; Gibson v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 111.

H. SIGNING COMPELLED BY MANDAMUS.—A judge who fails to sign the record may be compelled to do so by mandamus. Weatherman v. Com., 91 Va. 796, 22 S. E. Rep. 349; Quinn v. Com., 30 Gratt. 143.

III. AMENDMENT.

When Made.—During the term of a court at which a judicial act is done the record remains in the breast of the court, and may be altered or amended; but after the adjournment of the term amendments can only be made in cases in which there is something in the record by which they can be safely made. Amendments cannot be made after the term, upon the individual recollection of the judge, or upon proof aliunde. Barnes v. Com., 92 Va. 794, 23 S. E. Rep. 784.

So, after the term at which a judgment was rendered it is error for the court to amend the record. Sydnor v. Burke, 4 Rand. 161.

IV. INSPECTION.

The records and papers of every county court clerk's office are open to the inspection of any person. State v. Long, 37 W. Va. 266, 16 S. E. Rep. 578.

Proceedings of Electoral Boards.—And, so much of the record of the proceedings of electoral boards as relate to the appointment and removal of judges and commissioners of election and registrars, or the ordering of a new registration, is a public record, open to inspection by any citizen and voter of the county in which the record is kept, and he may take therefrom at and within a reasonable time, in the presence of the secretary of the board, memoranda or notes of the proceedings of the board as to which no secrecy is enjoined. But so much of said records as relate to the preparation and printing of the official ballots prescribed by law, certification of the same, and their distribution to the judges of election, is not a public record that is open to the inspection of any one, other than the officers of the county to whom the duties of preparing, printing, certifying and distributing the ballots are confided by law, and the secretary of the board cannot be compelled to allow memoranda or notes thereof to be taken, or that portion of the records to be inspected, by any other voter. Gleaves v. Terry, 93 Va. 491, 25 S. E. Rep. 552.

V. LOST RECORDS.

Where a record is lost it may be supplied by an authenticated copy or proof of its contents, but this rule does not apply to records in criminal cases. Bradshaw v. Com., 16 Gratt. 507; Hudson v. Yost, 88 Va. 347, 13 S. E. Rep. 436.

VI. REMOVING RECORDS.

At the suit of a citizen an injunction will be granted to prevent the illegal removal of the public records of a county. Osburn v. Staley, 5 W. Va. 85.

But, transferring the records of a county to an extension of the clerk's office is not such a removal of them as is prohibited by law. Board of Supervisors of Norfolk County v. Cox, 98 Va. 270, 36 S. E. Rep. 380.

VII. REJECTED PLEAS.

Cottom v. Cottom.

May, 1823.

Judgment—Conclusiveness of.—When the judgment of a competent Court is pronounced on any question, it is conclusive on all other tribunals, until it is reversed by a regular course of proceedings. Same—Same—Case at Bar.—Therefore, where two successive applications are made to a County Court for administration, and rejected; appeals taken to the Circuit Court from both decisions, and the judgments of the County Court affirmed; upon an appeal to this Court on the second case, the Court cannot reverse the first judgment, and grant administration.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Law for the town of Petersburg. The case was this:

In September, 1823, Samuel Cottom, moved the Hustings Court of Petersburg, for administration of the estate of Richard Cottom, deceased, by whose will the said Samuel had been appointed 193 executor. The Court being "equally divided, the motion was over-ruled, and an appeal taken to the Superior Court, where the judgment of the Court of Hustings was affirmed.

In August, 1824, Samuel Cottom made a second application to the Hustings Court to be permitted to qualify as executor as aforesaid; which motion was again over-ruled, and the administration with the will annexed, was granted to Charlotte Cottom, the widow of the said Richard.

Samuel Cottom filed a bill of exceptions to the opinion of the Court, setting forth the evidence by which his motion had been supported; but, as this Court decided the case on the ground of jurisdiction, it will be unnecessary to insert that evidence here.

Samuel Cottom appealed to the Superior Court, where the judgment of the Court of Hustings was affirmed. From this second judgment, he appealed to this Court; but no appeal was taken from the first judgment.

Daniel, for the appellant.

Spooner and May, for Charlotte Cottom, the appellee.

The argument turned, principally, upon the merits of the judgment of the Hustings Court, in rejecting the application of Samuel Cottom; and it was urged, in addition, by the appellee's counsel, that the first judgment was not appealed from, and must be a bar to any future application on the same subject, until it was reversed. For this doctrine, they referred to the case of Webb v. M'Neil, 3 Munf. 184.

May 10. The PRESIDENT delivered the opinion of the Court.

The proceedings on the first application of the appellant to qualify as the executor of Richard Cottom, his testator, ought to have put at rest the controversy now 194 before the Court. The record of those proceedings was properly before the Circuit Court, upon the appeal from the second order of the Hustings Court, refusing to permit the appellant to qualify as executor as aforesaid. The Circuit Court had both appellate and original jurisdiction of the controversy; and the record of the proceedings on the first application to qualify, was properly presented to it as a bar to the application in the second instance. Until the judgment of a Court of competent jurisdiction, upon the same matter, is reversed in a course of regular proceedings on it, a resort to any other tribunal, or to the same tribunal, for its judgment on the same controversy, is inadmissible. Though the Hustings Court, on the first application by the appellant to qualify as executor, was divided, and only virtually refused his application, yet, an appeal lay to the Circuit Court from that refusal, and was prosecuted by the appellant here to a judgment against him; from which, he failed to appeal to this Court. The record of those proceedings is, therefore, not before this Court, for the purpose of re-viewing the judgment against him in that case; although it was properly before the Circuit Court, in the proceedings now appealed from, as a bar to any further application to qualify as executor, no pleadings being required in such case; and of consequence, is also now before this Court for the same purpose.

Without noticing, therefore, the other points made in the argument, the judgment is to be affirmed.

195 *Jackson v. Arnold.

May, 1820.

Injunction—Judgment against Principal and Surety—Parties.*—The principal and surety to a bond obtain an injunction to a judgment against them. The surety dies pending the suit in Chancery. After referring the cause to a Commissioner, exceptions to the report on account of set-offs disallowed, (some of which were claimed by the surety himself.) and the Court rejecting them, because not filed in time, the injunction is in part dissolved, and in part perpetuated, without making the representatives of the deceased plaintiff a party. This proceeding is erroneous. A rule should have been given him, at the instance of the defendant, that unless he revived the suit by an appointed time, the injunction should stand dissolved.

This case was submitted by counsel, and the following opinion gives a sufficient history of it.

May 11. JUDGE GREEN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The appellant Edward Jackson, and Jackson, filed their bill against the Arnolds, and obtained an injunction to a judgment obtained by them upon a bond in which Edward Jackson was principal, and John Jackson surety. In the progress of the cause, the accounts between the parties were referred to a commissioner, who made his report on the 12th of October, 1820. On the 16th of October, 1821, it was suggested that John Jackson had departed this life since the last Term; and the cause came on to be finally heard, as to the surviving plaintiff and the defendants. By the decree of the Court, the injunction was in part dissolved, and in part perpetuated. Exceptions to the report were filed by the plaintiffs, on the 8th day of May, 1821, which were disregarded by the Court, because they had not been filed within the time prescribed by the rules of the Court. Amongst other claims to set-offs against the bond, submitted to the commissioner, rejected by him, and insisted on by the exceptions, were two claimed by John Jackson, the surety, on a receipt alleged to have been executed by George Arnold, 196 for 45l. as paid expressly on *account of the bond, proved by the subscribing witness, but denied upon oath by George Arnold; the other, for $6, a debt due to him by James Arnold, admitted by the latter.

The representative of John Jackson, who had been a party to the suit, was interested in the fate of this injunction; and it ought not to have been dissolved, without affording him an opportunity to be heard. This opportunity should have been given to him, by making a rule upon him, at the instance of the defendants, if they chose to make a motion to that effect; that unless he revived the suit by an appointed time, the injunction should stand dissolved. If he failed to revive accordingly, the injunction might have been dissolved in whole or in part, as to John Jackson, if, upon a hearing as to Edward Jackson, it ought to have been dissolved, in whole or in part, as to him. The hearing of the cause, as to Edward Jackson, was therefore premature; and it would not be proper, in this Court, now to examine the merits of the cause, in the absence of the representative of John Jackson, who has had no opportunity to be heard.

On this ground, the decree should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

197 *The Trustees of the Presbyterian Church v. Manson, &c.

May, 1826.

Principal and Agent—Liability of Agent.*—Individuals who contract for the benefit of a company or society, where the credit is given to them, and not to their constituents, are personally liable. Equity Jurisdiction—Account.—The principles of Smith v. Marks, 2 Rand. 449, confirmed.

This was an appeal from the Richmond Chancery Court, where Manson and Sturdivant filed a bill against Parkhill and others, trustees or committee for building the First Presbyterian Church in the City of Richmond. The bill states, that the plaintiffs entered into a contract with the persons above mentioned, in their character aforesaid, to erect the First Presbyterian Church in the City of Richmond; and that after the work on the main building was completed, a new contract was made between the plaintiffs and two of the same committee or trustees, for the construction and completion of a steeple to the said church: that the said contract was made with the persons aforesaid, with the consent and authority of the other members of the said committee or trustees: that the plaintiffs did, accordingly, proceed with and fully complete a steeple for the said church: that the contract was made with the said trustees, and none other, solely on their credit and responsibility, and the individual contributors or subscribers were unknown to the plaintiffs, and still are so: that frequent application has been made for an adjustment and payment of their account, but to no purpose: that a measurement of the work performed was effected under a mutual order of the plaintiffs and three of the said committee; but the said committee have totally failed and refused to pay the same. The bill prays, that the defendants may be compelled to pay the sum of money due as aforesaid, &c.

Several of the defendants answered, alleging that the sum stipulated for had been fully paid; but it is unnecessary to go into detail, as the cause was decided on the question of jurisdiction.

tract with the appellees, in their character of trustees for the pew-holders of the church, whereby they employed them to finish the steeple. They did so. The parties disagreed about the contract, and the appellees filed this bill. It seeks no discovery; states no difficulty in the way of proceeding at law; nor any other reason for coming into equity, except that equity could do more complete justice, by apportioning the debt among the defendants. There could have been no difficulty from the trustees being fiduciary characters; for, we know from Willis v. M'Williams, Cullen v. The Duke of Queensbury, and many other cases, that individuals who contract for the benefit of a company or society, where the credit is given to them, and not to their constituents, are personally liable; and the bill states, that his contract was made with the trustees alone, and solely on their credit and responsibility; the individual pew-holders being then and still unknown to the plaintiffs. In the argument of the cause, the counsel referred to several cases, to shew that Chancery would sometimes take jurisdiction, in cases of this kind. The authorities have been examined, and they are found to present some feature of equity, which is wanting here. Either a discovery was sought, or a multiplicity of suits must have been encountered at law. This case is, in principle, exactly like the case of Smith v. Marks, 2 Rand. 449. The reasons and authorities there cited, may be referred to, and need not be repeated here.

Same—Same—Validity of.—Such a sale will be void, if the Sheriff is the only bidder, or there is another who only bids to give a colour of fairness to the sale.

Appeal from the Lynchburg Chancery Court.

Harris, stating the following case. James Dickie, by deed dated the 14th of July, 1819, and duly recorded, conveyed in trust to the plaintiffs, all his real and personal estate, and all debts owing to him, for the purpose of paying all the just debts of the said Dickie, and then of maintaining him and his wife, the education and maintenance of his children, &c. Some time before the execution of this deed, Dickie became indebted to Claiborne, and gave his note for $100, which was assigned to Benjamin D. Harris; on which the said Harris instituted a suit and recovered judgment, in March, 1819. Execution issued, 200 *a delivery bond was taken and forfeited, and execution awarded on the delivery bond in May, 1819. The said Benjamin D. Harris, being then Deputy Sheriff of Nelson county, in order to remove the difficulty that would attend the levying an execution in his own favor, endorsed it to his father, Edward Harris, and then levied it on a female slave of the said Dickie, named Savory, whom he advertised, and purchased, at the day of sale, for about $120. The said slave was worth at least $400 or $500, and would have commanded that price, if she had been fairly disposed of. The sale is charged to be illegal and void, and the plaintiffs say that they are entitled to the said slave, on payment of the execution, interest, &c. On the day of sale, there were no real bidders present, and Harris purchased the slave at the price aforesaid, having procured a by-stander to make a nominal bid, in order to give an appearance of fairness to the sale. The bill prays that the said sale may be set aside, upon the plaintiffs' paying the sum due upon the execution, &c. and that an account might be directed of hire and interest, &c.

Harris answered, denying that the plaintiffs had any right to sue for his alleged injury; that it is true, that he directed the execution to be endorsed for the benefit of Edward Harris; and this was a fair bona fide transaction, intended to secure to the said Edward Harris, the proceeds of the said execution, to re-pay money which he had advanced for the defendant, to enable him to farm the Shrievalty: that the slave in question was sold at a public place, to satisfy two executions: that she sold for about $157, being the amount of both executions, and the defendant became the purchaser: that the sale was fair: and the girl was sold for as much, (as the defendant believes) as she would have brought, if sold at any other place in the county, under an execution, considering the great scarcity of money, &c. at that time.

Many depositions were taken, the material parts of which, are so fully stated in Judge Carr's opinion, that it is unnecessary to insert them here.

†Fiduciaries Purchase of Trust Fund.—As a general principle, it is well settled that trustees, agents, auctioneers and all persons acting in a confidential character, are disqualified from purchasing the subject committed to them. The functions of buyer and seller are incompatible, and cannot be exercised by the same person without great danger of fraud. Such transactions are constructively fraudulent, and are therefore voidable at the instance of the beneficiary, although, if he chooses to recognize them, they are binding upon the trustee. Feamster v. Feamster, 35 W. Va. 13 18 S. E. Rep. 57, quoting from 2 Min. Inst. 212, and citing the principal case. 201 *The Chancellor dismissed the bill of the plaintiffs, and they appealed to this Court.

Leigh for the appellants, contended, that the endorsement of the execution, did not effect a transfer of the debt from B. Harris to E. Harris. It was still the property of B. Harris; and he could not, as Sheriff, levy his own execution. Fraud is distinctly proved by Perrow, and many corroborating circumstances. A Sheriff cannot purchase at his own sale, at all, in England; and whether this rule is strictly followed in this country, or not, yet any circumstances to prove unfair dealing, will certainly invalidate the sale.

Dickie, is no party to the suit. It is brought by his trustees, and the sale took place before the deed of trust was executed. If so, Dickie alone had a right to sue, and he could not transfer that right to any person whatever. It is said, the property was sold for less than its value; but this was produced by the state of the times, want of bidders, &c. The fraud is not sufficiently proved. Perrow is the only witness to that point, and he speaks doubtfully. None of the circumstances go to establish fraud. It is not proved, that there was only one bidder; and if it was, it is not necessary to the validity of a sale, that there should be more than one.

May 12. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

It was objected by the counsel for the appellee, that the trustees were not the proper parties to file this bill, nor equity the proper forum. We must settle these points first.

By the deed of trust, it seems to have been intended to divest the grantor of all property, rights and credits, of every kind. After a long and minute enumeration of the different articles of property, it adds, "with all the other estate, both real and personal, of the said James Dickie." This would convey, I presume, equitable as well as legal estate. The question raised by the bill, is, whether the sale of the slave was not so conducted, that a Court of Chancery would pronounce it invalid, and the purchaser, a trustee for Dickie, holding the property subject to redemption, by payment of the amount of the executions. In this point of view, it seems a question of property, which the trustees are the proper parties to litigate. Nor do I think the objection to the jurisdiction of the Court, well founded. Though it be true, as was contended, that the Sheriff might have been sued for the fraud, that does not seem to take from the party aggrieved, the power of waiving such suit, and coming into equity to redeem the slave. This is the every day jurisdiction of that forum. The books are full of such cases; and it is much the most favourable course for the defendant, as it ensures to him, if the sale should be set aside, the payment of the executions, with their interest and costs, without further delay or litigation.

Upon the merits, the first question seems to be, was Harris interested in the execution? If he were, there need no authorities to tell us, that he was not the person to levy it; to sell and to buy under it. Sheriffs are confidential and highly responsible officers of the law. They are the trustees and agents, of both plaintiff and defendant; not selected by them, but imposed on them by the law; and therefore, for the honor of the law, and the purity of the administration of justice, it is vitally essential, that their conduct should be watched over with a vigilant and jealous eye. This is the more necessary, as their office clothes them with great power, and is constantly assailing them with strong temptations to abuse and pervert that power to sinister and selfish purposes. To permit them to wield the process of our Courts, in their own cases; to cut and carve for themselves; to exact such measure of justice, as self-interest might dictate; would lead to oppression and abuse; would tend to subvert the foundation of private rights, and cover with deserved shame the ministers of justice. The defendant seems to have felt somewhat conscious of this; for, we see that the first execution, (while the debt was confessedly his own,) was levied by the High Sheriff; and before he would take the second into his own hands, he directed the clerk to endorse it for the benefit of his father.

Was the debt really and bona fide, transferred to his father, by this endorsement? I confess, I rather think that it was not. The whole case shews, that the execution was the property of Harris, up to the time of the endorsement. The bill charges this act to have been a mere sham, to enable the defendant to take the levying and sale into his own hands. In reply, the defendant says, that the transfer was not a sham, but a real transaction; the purpose of which was, to secure to his father the proceeds of the execution, to re-pay money which his father had advanced, to enable him to farm the Shrievalty.

In the first place, this seems to me to be one of those substantive and affirmative allegations, which a defendant ought to prove by something more than his answer. If he was the owner of the execution, it disqualified him to act. When this act is questioned, can he support it by the mere endorsement, and his own evidence that it was bona fide? We see no vestiges of a contract between him and his father, neither prior nor subsequent to the endorsement. We see no evidence that his father had advanced him money to farm the Shrievalty; and I think it was his place to have furnished us this evidence. He declared to Perrow, on the day of sale, that the execution under which he was about to sell, was his own; and that he must bring it to a close, for he wanted his money. He dealt with the execution, in every respect, as owner, rather than as an officer, acting for another. When he bought the negro, *it was for himself, not his father; and yet we hear of no settlement with his father since. There is no such allegation in his answer.

But, even if it appeared that the transfer was a real one, to satisfy a debt bona fide due to his father, I should, as at present advised, still think that he could not deal with the execution as Sheriff. He was still too much interested to be that impartial and unbiassed agent, whom the law interposes for the protection of the rights of both plaintiff and defendant. He was still liable to his assignee for the debt, unless he made it by the execution. Nay, I am inclined to go even further; and though I do not mean positively to decide, I am free to state it as my impression, that a Sheriff, who is selling property under an execution, though he has no sort of interest in the debt, cannot legally buy of himself. I can find no decision of this point in our Reports; but all the analogies of the law are against it. It is well settled as a general principle, that trustees, agents, auctioneers, and all persons acting in a confidential character, are disqualified from purchasing. The characters of buyer and seller are incompatible, and cannot safely be exercised by the same person. Emptor emit quam minimo potest; venditor vendit quam maximo potest. The disqualification rests, as was strongly observed in the case of the York Buildings Company v. M'Kenzie, 8 Bro. Parl. Cas. 63, on no other than that principle which dictates that a person cannot be both judge and party. No man can serve two masters. He that is interested with the interests of others, cannot be allowed to make the business an object of interest to himself; for, the frailty of our nature is such, that the power will too readily beget the inclination to serve our own interests at the expense of those who have trusted us. Lord Eldon says, in ex parte James, 8 Ves. 337: "The doctrine as to purchasers by trustees, assignees, and persons having a confidential character, stands much more upon general principles than upon the circumstances of any individual case. It rests upon 205 *this; that the purchase is not permitted, in any case, however honest the circumstances; the general interests of justice requiring it to be destroyed in every instance, as no Court is equal to the examination and ascertainment of the truth in much the greater number of cases." To my mind, these principles seem to apply with great strength to the case of Sheriffs. They are appointed by the law, for the important purpose of carrying the judgments of Courts into fair and impartial execution. Clothed with the power of the Commonwealth, they levy their execution on what property they please. They fix the time and place of sale. They cry the property. There are a thousand ways in which they may discourage bidders, without committing themselves. They can say to those who wish to buy, "nothing but the money will do." They may even demand specie; while, if they bid themselves, there is no need of having a cent of cash. They can bid out the property to themselves, return the execution satisfied, and leave the plaintiff to get his money by legal measures. These are my impressions on this important and interesting point.

But, there are other objections to this sale. It is laid down in many cases, that if the plaintiff in an execution raise doubts or make impressions, unfavorable to a fair sale, and then avail himself of these impressions, to buy in the property at an under rate, the sale will be set aside. In this case, it appears that there was a general impression among those present, that the Sheriff was to buy in the negro, and Dickie was to redeem. Garland says, there were but three or four persons at the sale. Montgomery says, he thinks there were four besides himself; others say, there were several, speaking in general terms. Now Perrow says, Harris told him there was such an understanding. Garland says, that while at the place of sale, Montgomery told him, that he had no doubt there was an understanding between the parties; and Clarkson says, that he had heard, (though he does not exactly know from 206 what quarter,) *that such an arrangement had been made. This evidence shews, that whatever was the foundation, such an impression was general among those present; and so far as Perrow's evidence will weigh, that impression came probably from Harris; for, he says that Harris told him so. This, though of itself, it might not form a decisive objection to the sale, certainly adds to the others.

But there is yet another objection. No person, I presume, would contend, that if the Sheriff were the only person at the sale, or the sole bidder, he might make a single bid, knock out the property, and support this as a valid sale. Such a proposition would contradict the whole tenor of the law, which has provided so anxiously for the publicity of the sale; would arm the Sheriff with a power truly tremendous; would subject the whole personal property of every debtor in the Commonwealth, to his grasp; and is, indeed, a position too monstrous to be debated. How was the fact in this sale? The Sheriff and Perrow were the only bidders. Perrow did not bid, till called on by the Sheriff; and then merely (as he says in his deposition,) to make a sale, without the intention or the power to purchase; and this known to the Sheriff. Was not the Sheriff, then, in truth, the only bidder? Unquestionably.

I am, therefore, clearly of opinion, that the decree should be reversed; the sale set aside; the cause sent back for an account, in which the Sheriff should be charged with the hire of the slave, and credited by the amount of the executions, interest, and costs at law; that the trustees be decreed to pay the balance, if any, appearing due, in a given time, such as the Chancellor may direct; and if so paid, that the assignee be decreed to deliver the slave and her increase, if any, to the appellants; and in default of such payment, that there be a re-sale of the slave. And if it should appear from such account, that a balance of hire of the said slave is due from the Sheriff, the same, as well as the said slave and her increase, shall be decreed to the appellants.

207 *JUDGE GREEN.

Without determining or giving any opinion upon the question, whether a Sheriff can purchase property sold under execution by himself, I think it clear, that he cannot acquire an irredeemable title by such a purchase, unless it appear that his conduct has been perfectly fair, and with a view to procure the best price. In this case it appears that a pretty general impression prevailed among those who were present at the sale, (an impression which is traced, in part at least, to the Sheriff as its author,) that Dickie was to be permitted to redeem the slave, if purchased by the Sheriff; which was calculated to damp the biddings, and to sacrifice the property. Upon this ground, I concur in the decree proposed.

JUDGE CABELL concurred in the principles contained in JUDGE CARR'S opinion; and the decree was reversed, and one entered up, in pursuance of the foregoing principles.*

May, 1828.

Sheriff—Sale of Mortgaged Slave—Rights of Purchasers.—If a Sheriff sell under execution a slave mortgaged by a deed not recorded, and void against the creditor, and he sells and the purchaser buys the property, subject to the claim asserted in the deed, the purchaser takes the slave subject to the payment of the mortgage debt. But if, in such case, the Sheriff sells all the title that he has a right to sell in the property, under the execution, whether the deed be valid or void, the absolute title passes to the purchaser discharged of any claim on the part of the mortgagee.

Unrecorded Deed—Effect of.—An unrecorded deed is void as to creditors, whether they have notice or not; but it will be good against purchasers with notice, or who have not purchased for valuable consideration.

Same—Same—Purchaser at Sale in Behalf of Creditor.—A purchaser under a sale in behalf of a creditor, holds the rights and occupies the place of the creditors; and therefore he will not be affected by notice of an unrecorded deed.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Law for the county of Buckingham, where Guerrant brought an action of detinue for a female slave, against Anderson. Issue was joined, on the plea of non detinet, a verdict was rendered for the defendant, and judgment given accordingly.

On the trial, a bill of exceptions was filed by the plaintiff, stating, that the plaintiff, to support his action, introduced an execution against Catlett and others, which was levied on a female slave of Catlett's, sold under the said execution, and purchased by Guerrant, the plaintiff; in which sale, Catlett's title only was sold: that at the time of the sale, the defendant made known his title to the said slave, which was derived from a deed of mortgage, conveying the slave in question, dated the 6th day of August, 1820; and said, that he was ready to relinquish his title to the slave, if the money was paid to him; to secure which the deed was made, and not otherwise; but the plaintiff refused to pay it: that it appeared that the plaintiff knew of the deed before the sale under the execution: that the Sheriff admitted that he had seen the deed, before the day of sale; and he swore that he sold such right as Catlett had in the slave, subject to the deed, if it was, in law, liable and subject to it; and not subject to it, if the deed was not, in law, sufficient to subject it; and that the deed was produced and exhibited publicly on the day of sale by the defendant, who forbade the sale, and claimed the slave: that at the sale, the Sheriff held the deed in his hand, read it aloud, and proclaimed that he was selling subject to the defendant's claim under the deed. The plaintiff moved the Court to instruct the jury, that if, from the evidence in the cause, they did believe that the Sheriff did sell the slave for such right as he might sell under the execution, and independent of the deed, the title of the plaintiff under the sale was independent of the deed, and that they were not to regard the deed as evidence in the cause, because the same had not been recorded, or delivered to be recorded. The Court overruled the motion, and permitted the deed to go as evidence to the jury, and instructed them, that if they believed from the evidence, that the Sheriff sold and the plaintiff purchased the slave in question, subject to the defendant's claim asserted by the deed, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the slave from the defendant, without first satisfying the claim, according to the terms of the deed; and if they believe, from the evidence, that the Sheriff sold, independent of, and without any reference to, the deed; yet, if they believed, from the evidence, that the Sheriff and plaintiff both had notice of the deed, at and before the day of sale, the plaintiff's title under the sale would be affected by it, and the deed evidence for the defendant, although not recorded, if otherwise satisfactorily proved to the jury, and that all the transactions were within eight months after the date of the deed; to which opinion, the plaintiff excepted, and appealed.

The case was submitted, without argument.

May 17. The PRESIDENT delivered the opinion of the Court.

The questions which belong to this case, turn on the two instructions of the Judge to the jury, which are set out in the bill of exceptions. The suit is in behalf of the purchaser of the slave in question, at a public sale, under an execution levied in the property, and proceeded in according to law, against the appellee, who claims the property under an unrecorded mortgage, executed by the defendant in the execution.

The counsel for the plaintiff moved the Court, upon the evidence exhibited to the jury, to instruct the jury, that if from the evidence, they believed that the Sheriff did sell the slave, for such right as he might sell under the execution, and independently of the deed, that the title of the plaintiff, under the sale, was independent of the deed; and that they were not to regard the deed as evidence in this cause, because the deed was not recorded, or delivered to be recorded. This motion was over-ruled; and the Judge instructed the †Unrecorded Deed—Effect.—To the effect that an unrecorded deed is void as to creditors whether they have notice or not, but good against purchasers without notice or who have not been purchasers for valuable consideration, the principal case is cited in Roanes v. Archer, 4 Leigh 562; Smith v. Smith, 19 Gratt. 548; Heermans v. Montague, 2 Va. Dec. 19; Delaplain v. Wilkinson, 17 W. Va. 275; State v. Johnson, 28 W. Va. 70; Abney v. Ohio Lumber, etc., Co., 45 W. jury, that if they believed from the evidence in the cause, that the Sheriff sold, and the plaintiff purchased the negro in question, subject to the defendant's claim, asserted by the deed, he, the plaintiff, is not entitled to recover the slave from the defendant, without first satisfying the claim, according to the terms of the deed. To this instruction, there seems to be no valid objection. If the plaintiff purchased only the title of the mortgagor, the possession of the mortgagee could not be divested, until his claim under the deed was satisfied.

The second instruction under which the merits of the case turn, was in the following words; that "if the jury believed from the evidence, that the Sheriff sold independent of, and without reference to the deed, yet if they also believe from the evidence, that the Sheriff and plaintiff both had notice of the deed, at and before the day of sale, the plaintiff's title under the sale, would be affected; and the deed evidence for the defendant, though not recorded or delivered to the clerk to be recorded, if otherwise satisfactorily proved to the jury; and that all the transactions were within eight months after the date of the deed." The error in this instruction, consists either in not distinguishing between a purchaser of the rights of a 211 creditor, *from a purchaser from the debtor, or in confounding the condition of a creditor with that of a purchaser, with notice of a prior deed, and must have grown out of a misapprehension of the Statute, in relation to the subject. By the 4th section of the Act, to reduce into one the several Acts for regulating conveyances, and concerning wrongful alienations, it is declared, that all deeds of trust and mortgages whatsoever, which shall hereafter be made and executed, shall be void as to creditors, absolutely and without qualification; and as to subsequent purchasers, with the qualification, "for valuable consideration, and without notice." The words, "for valuable consideration," in the section, certainly have no application to creditors, there being none of any other denomination; nor have the words, "without notice," which make a part of the qualification of a purchaser to resist the unrecorded deed, any relation to a creditor, either by its position in the sentence, or its context. The sentence following this provision in the 4th section, makes this more plain, if it were necessary. Its words are, "but the same, as between the parties and their heirs, and as to all subsequent purchasers with notice thereof, or without valuable consideration, shall nevertheless be valid and binding;" omitting entirely, the word "creditors," and thereby fully explaining the meaning of the provision in the section that precedes it. The 2d section in the same Act, might be resorted to for the same purpose. In that section, the words, "for valuable consideration, and without notice," are only applied to subsequent purchasers; and the provision as to creditors, is included in a substantive sentence coming afterwards, to which those words can have no application. A contrary exposition, would be in conflict with both the language and intention of the Legislature. Before the words "for valuable consideration without notice" were inserted in the Act, it was the settled law of a Court of Equity, though the unrecorded deed was void at law, to postpone such subsequent purchaser, on the ground that he was guilty of 212 a "fraud, in purchasing what he knew, in justice, belonged to another. Since the insertion of those words in the Statute, that rule has become a rule of law; but that rule was never extended by a Court of Equity to creditors, nor was it intended to be so extended by the Legislature; because, though a creditor has notice of an unrecorded deed, he commits no fraud by crediting the grantor upon his general responsibility. If, in the lawful pursuit of his rights, he gets a lien on the property by the delivery of an execution to the proper officer, as in the case before us, or otherwise, having equal equity with the party claiming under the deed, he falls within the settled rule of equity; that between parties having equal equity, he who has the law also, shall prevail. That the second instruction of the Judge would violate this rule, is perfectly clear; for, though the appellee was a purchaser and not a creditor, and in that character, in an ordinary case, would fall within the provisions of the Act in regard to purchasers, yet being a purchaser under a sale in behalf of a creditor, he holds his rights and occupies his place in this controversy; otherwise, the rights of a creditor would be of no avail.

On these grounds, the judgment is to be reversed, and the verdict set aside, and the cause ordered for further proceedings, in which the second instruction in the bill of exceptions is not to be given, but a contrary instruction, in the event that a similar motion is made by either party.

*Land, &c. v. Otley.

May, 1826.

Wills—Construction—Intention Governs.—*In the construction of Wills, the first object is, to gather the intention of the testator from the whole will; and this intention must prevail, unless it violate some rule of law.

Same—Same—Case at Bar.—Where a testator leaves one half of his estate to his wife for life, and the use of the other half to her until his child or children come of age or marry, with directions that his children shall be supported and educated out of the latter half: the wife had no interest

Wills—Construction—Intention Governs.—The cardinal rule for the interpretation of wills is, to collect the intention of the testator from the whole will, taken together as a consistent whole formed of all its parts, and, if such intention be lawful, full effect must be given to it. Intention is the life and soul of a will, and the great point to be ascertained: when it is clear, and violates no rule of law, it must govern with absolute sway. McCant v. Nuckolls, 86 Va. 337, 12 S. E. Rep. 160, citing principal case. And in Graham v. Graham, 4 W. Va. 322, it is said: "In the construction of a will the first object is to ascertain the intention of the testator, for what he intended is to control. It is in fact the soul of the will; but it is to be drawn from the will, the whole will taken together, and not from an isolated clause. Kennon v. McRoberts, 1 Wash. 96; Reno v. Davis, 4 Hen. & M. 283; Land v. Otley, 4 Rand. 213." See the principal case also cited in Wallace v. Dold, 3 Leigh 266.

under this will, which, upon her death before the children attained their age or married, was transmissible to her representative.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Williamsburg. The case was this:

Thomas Calvert died in the year 1813, leaving a will dated in 1808, at which time he had a daughter named Polly, and the prospect of another child. At the time of his death, both children were under age. The child afterwards born, in 1809, was called Thomas. He left also a widow, named Kezia. This controversy grew out of the construction of the will.

In the first clause, he gives to his daughter Polly, "now an infant, the whole of my personal and real estate, be it more or less; provided my wife, Kezia Calvert, should have another child lawfully begotten by me, I in that case give the whole of my property, to be equally divided between them both, and in case of their deaths before they either married or become of age lawfully, I wish all my estate to go to the children of my sister Polly Jones, wife of Col. Briton Jones, of Southampton county. Further, I desire it to be in the power of my wife Kezia, to have the full use of all my negroes, lands and all species of property, except my money, until my children or child become of age, or be lawfully married; then, one half of said estate, with all my money, to go to my child or children: during my wife Kezia's natural life, she shall be entitled to hold the half allotted for her as above, and at her death, to go to my children and their heirs, as above

214 mentioned. *Item: I desire that my child or children, as above, shall be supported, educated in a Christian-like manner, out of the money arising from the estate I leave, as above, and monies due me from different persons by bond, note or otherwise; and all money I may leave in the bank, to be put out at lawful interest, and the interest only to go into the hands of my wife Kezia, for the benefit of education of my child or children, and to be used for their benefit only. Item: I further say, in case of loss of my slaves, or misfortune attending my estate, if there should be not a sufficiency to support my children, and also to educate them, I desire, after the children or child is of the age of nine years, then to take a sufficiency of the money, which will be on interest, to defray their necessary wants. Item: It is my desire, that in case it should take the whole of my money allotted for them, my child or children, as above on interest, for their education, it must be disposed of. Further say, nothing is to be charged to my child or children by my wife Kezia for board or clothes, and in short, no charge that might affect their estate, as I have provided for them in the foregoing of this instrument, as well as for my wife Kezia," &c. "I wish there to be no sale of my estate, but that all my just debts to be paid out of the money I leave behind. Further, wish my wife to live on this plantation of her own, and endeavour to make a living in a plain and frugal manner for her own benefit."

Kezia, the widow, administered on the estate, and in 1814 married Otley. She died in 1815, and Otley administered on her estate. The estate of Thomas Calvert deceased, was committed, by the County Court of Princess Anne, to Peter Land, Sheriff of that county, who took possession of all the said Calvert's personal estate, and received the rents of the real estate.

The bill was filed by Otley against Land and Thomas Calvert, by his guardian, claiming the rents, hires and profits received by the said Land, on account of the estate of Thomas Calvert, deceased, 215 until the determination of the estate of the said Kezia, which, he contended, did not happen at her death, but extended to the time when the children would have come of age, if they had both lived.

Land and Thomas Calvert, by his guardian, answer, that the estate of Kezia terminated by her death; and therefore, her administrator can have no claim for rents, &c. accruing after that period.

The Chancellor decreed, that the estate of Kezia did not terminate until Thomas, the surviving child of Thomas Calvert, should become of legal age, or marry; and that therefore, Otley, as administrator of Kezia, was entitled to the use of a moiety of the said estate, until the period above mentioned.

Land appealed to this Court.

The cause was argued by Leigh and Johnson, for the appellant, and by R. Taylor, for the appellee, with great ability and research; but the question is so fully discussed by the Court, that a report of the arguments at the bar is unnecessary.

May 22. JUDGE CARR.

This case turns wholly on the construction of Calvert's will. The will was made in 1808, when he had a daughter about 15 months old, and the prospect of another child. That child, a son, was born in 1809. The testator died in 1812; his daughter in 1813 or 1814; his wife administered on his estate; intermarried with the appellee Otley, and in 1815, died. Administration de bonis non was committed to the appellant, as sheriff. Otley delivered up to him all the estate; and afterwards filed this bill against him and the infant son of Calvert, claiming, that by the will, his wife had the use of all the property, both real and personal, till the arrival of the son at the age of 21; and that he, as her administrator, has the same right. The Chancellor has decided that such was the true construction of the will; and Land has appealed.

216 "In the construction of wills, the first enquiry is into the meaning of the testator. This is the animating spirit, the essence, the soul, of the will. The words are the clothing, the mere vehicle used, to convey his ideas. When we once ascertain the intention of the testator, that is the governing principle, and must prevail, unless it violate some rule of law. It would be a waste of time to quote cases to prove this. There is nothing technical about a will; no set form of words necessary. They are very often written (like the present) by persons who, wholly ignorant of forms, use their own homely and awkward style to express their ideas; and if the language, however uncouth, be intelligible, and the meaning, when gathered, be lawful, it must be carried into effect.

In the case before us, the testator had real estate, slaves, money, &c. and his wife, it seems, had a plantation of her own. The first clause in the will gives all his estate, real and personal, to his daughter Polly; and if his wife should have another child by him, the whole property to be divided between them; and if they die before they come of age or marry, all the estate to go to the children of his sister Polly Jones. Having thus given to the primary objects of his bounty, the fee simple of his whole estate, he proceeds to carve out of it lesser and temporary interests. To his wife, he gives the power to have the full use of all his negroes, lands, and all species of property, except his money, till his children or child come of age or marry; then, one half of his said estate, with all his money, to go to his child or children; and his wife, during her life, to hold the other half allotted to her as above, and at her death, that to go to the children. The rest of his will is almost entirely taken up, in assigning funds, and giving other directions for the support and education of his children; about which he discovers great solicitude. They are to be supported and educated, 1st, out of the estate, of which his wife has the use; 2d, out of the monies due to him; 3d, his money in Bank is to be put out to 217 interest, and the interest *to go into his wife's hands, and to be applied solely to the benefit and education of his child or children; 4th, if from loss of slaves, or other misfortune to his estate, it should not be found sufficient to support and educate his child or children, then, when they reach nine years of age, so much is to be taken from the money at interest, as will be sufficient to supply their wants, and the whole, if found necessary. 5th. His wife is to make no charge against his children, for board or clothing, or any other charge, which will affect their estates.

The question for consideration is, what interest did the testator mean to give his wife Kezia, in the use of his estate, real and personal. Did he mean to give her a fixed and certain interest, a term for years, which would expire when the youngest of his children should, if living, reach twenty-one? Or, was this use a mere personal trust and confidence, given to her for a special purpose, and ceasing, of course, with the person? My idea of the will is this. The testator was chiefly solicitous about his children, one, a girl of very tender years, the other, unborn. He considered that the half of his estate, real and personal, was a sufficient provision for his wife, in addition to the plantation which she possessed, in her own right. The other half he wished applied to the support and education of his children, during infancy, and to go into their possession, at their marriage, or attainment of age. To the care of their mother, he must confide them while infants. No other could supply her place to them, or be so safely trusted with their care. As she must have the care and the expense of rearing, sustaining, clothing and educating them, he gives to her the use, during their non-age, of the whole of his estate, and also the interest of his money, and assigns this as the fund in her hands, for their education and support; but, so soon as they married or came of age, and this care and expense would cease, the use of one half of the estate, and the interest of the money, were to cease also; and she was to retain the other half for life.

218 *It is insisted by the counsel for the appellee, that there is a clear, distinct, express gift of the use of the whole estate to the wife, till such period as would bring the children to 21; and that this vested interest could not be affected by the death of the wife before that time, but that her interest would survive to her representative. But, it must be recollected, that the polar star is the intention; and that to come at this, you must take the whole will, not a single sentence; and you are also to look at the relative situation of the testator. As to intention, when he was providing so anxiously for the support and education of those children, assigning first one fund, then another, to that purpose; injoining it upon his wife to make no charge against them, for board, clothes, or any thing else; can we possibly suppose, that he meant, in the event of her death, to abandon them to chance and dependence; that this fund, which he was so carefully husbanding for their support, should, by the same blow which deprive them of a mother, be transferred to her representative, and they cast upon the bounty, and committed to the care of an unknown guardian, an alien to their blood, with no tie to bind him to their protection, and interests in direct hostility with theirs? That, during a long minority of 18 or 19 years, the whole profits of his estate should be enjoyed by strangers, and his children dependent on them for the pittance which they might, to quiet their consciences, bestow on their maintenance and education? It is impossible that such a construction can, for a moment, be considered as called for by the intention of the testator, or as otherwise than in direct conflict with his intention. No man (it seems to me) can look upon this will, without seeing at a glance, that the testator did not intend to extend the provision for his wife, a moment beyond her life; had no idea of vesting in her such an interest in any part (much less, the whole) of his estate, as, at her death, would survive to her representative. That portion, in which he evidently meant to give her the interest which should endure longest, is the half which she is

219 *to retain, when his children come of age, or marry; and this is expressly limited to her life. How then can we say, that this half, so expressly limited, shall go, on her death, to her representative, together with the other half, as clearly intended, under no possible circumstances, to exceed her life, and very probably to end much sooner. It was attempted to answer this, by stating an equal dilemma on the other side; that it is clear that the testator did not intend his children to have more than a maintenance till they attained their age, or married; and yet, if you do not suffer the property to go to the second husband, the surviving child must take it before either event. But, I deny this position. In the very first clause of his will, he gives his whole estate to his children. If I have shewn that he did not intend to vest in his wife, any interest which would survive her, there can be no question, that on her death, this clause would dispose of what she had; for, her interest was carved out of it, and only suspended its full operation, while that interest continued.

It was also contended, that the clause, giving his wife the half of his estate for life, contemplated a state of things which never happened, and therefore can have no influence on the construction of the will, but must be thrown out entirely. This would violate two settled rules. 1. That the construction now must be the same as at the moment of the testator's death, uninfluenced by subsequent events. 2. That in the construction of wills, you must take the whole together.

It was contended also, that there was no personal trust here, but a charge merely, for support and education of children, upon the fund in the wife's hands, which would follow it into the hands of her representa and could be discharged by him. That the testator intended to confide to his wife the bringing up of his children, is most evident. His very silence, if he had said not a word on the subject, would have been decisive of that; for, where the guardianship is not given by the father to 220 another, the conclusion *is inevitable that he intends the wife to discharge that office; a conclusion, strengthened by the actual situation of things in the case before us. The child then born was a girl 15 months old; the other unborn. With whom could these helpless beings be trusted, but the mother? But, the conclusion is not left to be drawn from the silence of the testator. Almost every clause in the will is predicated on the idea (which he seems to consider of course) that his wife was to have the bringing up of the children. Thus, although it is clear, that he thought the use of half his estate, a provision sufficient for his wife, he gives her the whole till they come of age, or marry, and charges it in her hands, with their maintenance and education. So, of the interest of his money. He dedicates this exclusively to the education of his children, and directs that it shall be paid into his wife's hands for that purpose. So again, he directs that his wife should make no charge against his children, for board or clothing, or any other charge, which would affect their estate. Why forbid her to do this, if she was not to have charge of them? It being most clear, that the testator intended that his wife should bring up the children, it seems to follow, from the very nature of the thing, that it was a case of personal trust and confidence; and to those who know the important influence, which training and education exercise over the future conduct of individuals, there can be few trusts which would be considered more highly important, responsible and delicate; few more incapable in their nature, of being assigned or transferred. This, then, being a personal trust of such a nature, and the interest, (beyond the half which she had for life) being coupled with this trust, and given as the means of executing it, it must of course cease with the trust, which her death extinguished. I think I may truly say of this case, as Lord Mansfield did of Haywood v. Whitley, 1 Burr. 228, "tis so plain, upon the true intent and meaning of this will, that it is a shame to cite cases upon it." Yet as very many were cited, and most elaborately 221 *commented on at the bar, I will take notice of one or two.

But, I must first remark, that this case does not present at all, the question, on which so many of these cited, turned: whether the estate given to the children was a vested interest, or contingent, and dependent on their marriage, or arrival at age. The first clause settles that point. It gives absolutely and immediately, the whole estate to his children; and subsequently, only excepts out of it, the use of the property, upon a particular trust, limited both as to time and object; and it is a rule laid down by the Court, in the case last cited, "that wherever the whole property is devised, with a particular interest given out of it, it operates by way of exception out of the absolute property."

There were two cases cited from 2 and 3 Leon. Rep. A. devised that his land should descend to his son; but, that his wife should take the profits until his full age, for his education and bringing up. The widow died. It was resolved, that the second husband should not have the profits. "Nothing," (say the Court,) "is devised, but a confidence. The wife is a guardian or bailiff to the infant." These cases run on all-fours with that before the Court. It would be a waste of words, to point out the striking resemblance between them.

In Everts v. Chittenden, 2 Day's Rep. 378. Joel Everts made his will, as follows: "I likewise give to my wife the use and improvement of all my real estate, until my son Joel, (then five years old,) arrives at twenty-one years of age," (then she to have and enjoy the use and improvement of one-third of the said real estate, during her natural life,) "she, my said wife, bringing up my said son, until he arrives at twenty-one years of age. Item, I give to my son J. E. the whole of my real estate, to be and remain an estate to him for ever, excepting the use to be disposed of, as above mentioned." The widow entered upon the premises, married a second husband, and died, leaving her son a

222 minor. The infant brought ejectment *against the second husband for the land; and the question was, whether the wife's interest ceased with her death, or continued until her son would, (if he lived,) attain twenty-one years. A case more precisely like the one at bar, cannot be imagined. It was argued with great ability by counsel, and all the cases in the books, bearing on the subject, discussed. The opinion of the Court, too, is given with excellent sense, and sound discrimination of the cases. They decide with great clearness, that the fee passed immediately to the son, subject to a personal confidence or trust reposed in the mother, which ceased at her death.

There are several other cases very strong for the appellant, such as Lomax v. Holmeden, 3 P. Wms. 175. Mansfield v. Dugard, 1 Equ. Cas. Abr. 195. Haywood v. Whitley, 1 Burr. 228.

The cases cited on the other side do not apply. They were either devises of property for a certain period, without any expression implying a limitation of the period, in any event; or, there was a trust raised by the devise, for payment of debts, or the performance of some other thing, which required that the trustee should hold till the term expired. In other words, the decision in those cases was founded on the settled doctrine of giving effect to the manifest intention of the testator. To follow those cases here, would be, not to give effect to, but to defeat, most palpably, the clear intention of the testator.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the wife's interest ceased with her life.

JUDGE GREEN.

Thomas Calvert having one child, Polly, born September 15th, 1806, made his will in April, 1808. He had afterwards another child, Thomas, born January 27th, 1809, and died in 1813, leaving his widow, Kezia, and his said two children surviving him. The daughter, Polly, died 223 *in 1814. Kezia, the testator's widow, intermarried with J. T. Otley, the appellee, and died in 1815. The principal question in the cause is, as to the extent and nature of the interest, given by the will to the testator's widow, and whether that interest terminated by her death, or by the death of one of the children in her life-time.

In determining the question, as to the extent and nature of the interest given by the will to the widow, the intention of the testator is the sole criterion; and that intention is to be collected from the whole will; so that if the intention of the testator, in respect to the interest of the wife, plainly expressed, were found to be inconsistent with the intentions of the testator, in respect to the children, the express limitation to her would be restrained by construction, for the purpose of giving effect to the whole will, as in ex parte Davis, 6 Ves. 147. The testator gave to his wife his whole estate, during the minority of the son, "his said wife, during that period, finding him with suitable education, maintenance and clothing; and if his said wife should die before his said son attained the said age, he appointed guardians and trustees for him, during his minority." In this case, it was clear that the testator contemplated the event of his wife's dying during the minority of his son; and in that event, appointed guardians and trustees for the son. This shewed, that in the event of his wife's death, during the minority of the son, the estate should immediately devolve upon the son, to be managed by the appointed guardians and trustees; otherwise, there would be nothing for them to manage; and this manifest intent in favor of the son, corrected the generality of the devise to the wife. So the estate given to the wife expressly, would be enlarged by construction, if that were necessary to effectuate the intention of the testator, in respect to his children or his creditors, so as to give effect to the whole will, as in Borraston's case, 3 Co. 19. The devise was to the executors, until Hugh attained his age of 21 years, the profits to be employed towards the performance 224 *of the will. Hugh died before he attained the age of 21, and the question was, whether the executors' interest continued until he would have attained the age of 21, if he had lived. The Court held, that the interest continued, although it was admitted by the whole Court, that the legal effect of a grant or devise to one, until another attained the age of 21 years, was, that the estate expired upon the death of that other, before he attained his age of 21; because it became impossible, by his death, that he could ever attain that age, and consequently, that if the estate did not cease upon the death of that other, it could never cease; and, that it was necessary, in that case, to enlarge the estate of the executors, beyond the strict legal effect of the devise to them, taken by itself, in order to effectuate another expressed intention of the testator, to provide for the payment of his debts, &c. and this term, until the time when Hugh would have attained the age of 21, would not have ceased, if the debts had been paid before it expired by its limitation, and the surplus profits would have belonged to the executor, who was not bound, at that time, to make distribution. Powell on Devises, 301, and the cases there cited. The reasons of the judgment in Borraston's case are not given at large in the report; but are stated in subsequent cases, affirming the principle of that case, as in Lomax v. Holmeden, 3 P. Wms. 175.

In these cases, the estate or interest, expressly given, is limited or enlarged beyond the legal effect of the terms in which it is expressly given, for the purpose of effectuating some other intention of the testator, plainly expressed or necessarily inferred from his will, which would be frustrated, if the express terms of the devise or bequest were allowed to have their strict legal effect. Examples of this rule may be found in the multitude of familiar cases, in which express devises for life or in fee simple, have been enlarged or limited to estates in fee tail, for the purpose of effectuating the manifest intention of the testator, as to the issue of the first taker. But, there is no example 225 of the *Courts controlling, by construction, the legal effect of the express terms of a devise or bequest, unless some intention of the testator, which would be frustrated without such control, appeared upon the face of the will, clearly expressed or necessarily inferred from the terms of the will itself.

What was the nature and extent of the interest, given to the wife of the testator, by his will? After devising his whole estate, real and personal, to his daughter Polly, and any other child he should have by his wife, and in case of their deaths under age and unmarried, to the children of his sister Jones, the testator proceeds: "Further say, I desire that it be in the power of wife Kezia, to have the full use of all my negroes, lands, and all species of property, except my money, until my children or child come of age or be lawfully married; then, one half of said estate, with all my money, to go to my child or children; during my wife Kezia's natural life, she shall be entitled to hold the half allotted for her as above, and at her death, to go to my children and their heirs, as above."

There can be no serious doubt, that this clause of the will, standing alone, gave to the wife a beneficial and personal interest, either legal or equitable, to the profits of the whole estate, except the money, until the children attained their age or married, with remainder for her life, in one half of what had been given to her until that period. I incline to think that the interest given was a legal interest. "The full use of property," is an expression equivalent to the "profits" of the property; and a desire that the profits of a lease shall be put out to the use and benefit of B. is a devise of the lease itself. Blamford v. Blamford, 3 Bulstrode, 101. This, however, is a question of no moment in this case; for whether the interest be legal or equitable, it was transmissible to her representatives, unless it terminated in her life-time, or upon her death.

Some stress was laid in the argument of the cause, upon the expression, "I desire it to be in the power of my wife 226 *to have the full use of all, &c." as if this indicated an intention to give the wife only a personal authority or power, to be exercised by herself only in person, and which ceased with her life. This, I think, would be a dangerous refinement in the construction of wills. The devise of the profits or full use is, in substance, a devise of the thing itself; and as a power to dispose, or give at pleasure, is equivalent to an absolute property, so I should think, an unlimited power to have is equivalent to an absolute right of property.

It was also argued that the expression, "during my wife's natural life, she shall be entitled to hold the half allotted for her as above," meant that as the half was allotted to her for life, so the whole allotted above was allotted to her for life. Such a construction would produce singular effects. It would be giving her, at the same time, a life estate in half and the whole; or rather, a life estate in the whole for a limited time, and a half afterwards. The obvious meaning of that expression is, to designate what property it was, to a moiety of which she was to be entitled, after the children attained their age or married; to wit: half of what was allotted to her above; and it was used for the purpose of excluding her from any participation in the money. "Allotted to her as above," designed the thing, of which she was to have one half, and not the estate or interest, of which she was to have half. Half of a life estate would be quite unintelligible.

It is also urged, that the intent of the testator was, that if his wife died before his children attained their age, or married, her interest should determine, because he has given her an estate for life, in half of the estate, after that period; and he could not have intended that she should have the whole estate longer than the half. An estate for years in all, with remainder for life in half, does not seem to me to imply any such inconsistency. Before the estate for life in the half could take effect in possession, the first estate in the whole must have expired in the life-time of 227 *the widow. The condition that she should be alive at that time, was implied, just as if the first estate had been given to another, with remainder to his wife for life. The intent of the testator to give a life estate in half, after the expiration of a specified term, does not at all conflict with an intent to give her the whole estate, for that term; even if he had contemplated the possibility of her dying within the term, as well as of her living beyond it. But it is perfectly clear, that the testator, when he made this will, never for a moment thought of the event of his wife's dying before his children attained their age or married, and had no intention to provide for that event, either directly or indirectly. To say, therefore, that he intended to give her the whole for a given time, and if she survived that period, one half for her life, is not to say that he intended to give her the whole for a longer time than he intended to give the half. It was possible, that her title to the half might never accrue; but if it ever did, then that interest must have lasted longer than her interest in the whole. The former interest was not to commence, until the latter ceased to exist. Upon the legal effect and apparent intent of this clause taken by itself, I think it clear that the wife took a personal and beneficial interest in the property devised to her, to endure until the children came of age or married, with remainder in one half of that property for her life; an interest which did not terminate by her death before her children attained their age or married. A grant to one during the minority of another, does not determine by the death of the grantee, but the interest is transmissible to the representative of the grantee. Dedicot's case, 3 Leon. 9.

This being the legal effect, and expressed intention of the testator, in respect to the interest of the wife, is there any other intention expressed in the will, or necessarily implied, which would be frustrated by carrying into effect this intention as to the wife, and which, therefore, renders it necessary, in order to effectuate the gen-228 eral intent of the *testator, to limit the wife's interest to a shorter period than this clause of the will imposes on it; that is, to add the provision, that her interest should cease, if she died before the children attained their age or married? It is insisted that there is such conflicting intent.

The will proceeds, "I desire that my child or children, as above, shall be supported and educated in a christian-like manner, out of the money arising from the estate I leave as above;" "and monies due to me, and all my money I may leave in the banks, to be put out at interest, and the interest only to go into the hands of my wife for the benefit of education of my child or children, and to be used for their benefit only." He then provides, that in case of the loss of his slaves, or misfortune to his estate, there should not be a sufficiency to support and educate his children, then after they were nine years old, "to take a sufficiency of the money at interest, for that purpose, if it should require all." He then proceeds, "Further say, nothing is to be charged to my child or children by wife Kezia, for board or clothes, and in short, no charge that might affect their estate, as I have provided for them in the foregoing of this instrument, as well as for my wife Kezia." The will concludes, "Further wish my wife to live on this plantation of her own, and endeavor to make a living in a plain and frugal manner for own benefit."

The effect of these clauses of the will, was, to charge upon the property devised to the wife, so much as would be sufficient to maintain the children; and if the interest of the money was insufficient to educate them, then so much more as would be sufficient, with the interest, to effect that purpose. If the interest was more than sufficient to educate the children, the surplus belonged to them; but if the interest of the money, and the produce of the property, were not sufficient to maintain and educate them, then the principal of the money at interest, was to be resorted to, as far as might be necessary, for that purpose.

These funds, appropriated for the 229 support and education, were to *be applied to that purpose by the wife; she advancing a due proportion of the profits of the property, and receiving the interest of the money for that purpose; and she was, in no event, to bring any charge against the estate of the children.

Upon these provisions in favor of the children, and the first clause of the will, giving in terms, the whole estate immediately to them, it is said, that they were the chief objects of the testator's solicitude and bounty, and therefore, the will should be liberally interpreted in their favor. If the first clause of the will were expunged, the estate of the children would be as completely vested in them, immediately upon the testator's death, as it is by force of that clause. A devise to A. for years, or until B. attain his age, with remainder to B. vests the estate immediately in B. Borraston's case, 3 Co. 19. Stanley v. Stanley, 16 Ves. 489. A devise to his wife, until his children attained the age of 21 or married, would have been precisely the same in effect, and would have shewn as bountiful an intention in the testator, towards his children, as the devise in the form in which it stands. But, the provisions of the will, in fact, were intended by the testator, to favor his wife, and not his children. He gave her more, and to the children less, than the law would have given them respectively, in case of intestacy; one half instead of one third. The testator, as I have before observed, never contemplated the event of her dying, before the children attained their age or married; or he would have made a provision for that event. Allowing that the children were the chief objects of the testator's care and bounty, what then? We cannot therefore disregard the testator's expressed will. He gave to his wife, his whole property, except his money, charged partially with their maintenance and education, until they came of age or married; and has indicated no intention, that they should enjoy any portion of the capital of his estate, until that period.

230 "It is said, that taking into consideration the relations between the testator and his wife and children, it is impossible to believe that he intended, in the event of his wife's marriage and death (which have happened,) that her second husband should succeed to all the profits of his estate, beyond the sum necessary to the support and education of his only surviving child, to the exclusion of that child. This is unquestionably true. The testator never had any such intention; and if he had anticipated either of these events, he would undoubtedly have taken care effectually, to prevent such consequences. But the testator had no such events in his mind, when he made his will, and had no intention whatever, either way, in respect to them. He gave to his wife an interest in the property, and looked no further. That interest devolved on her legal representative; he gets it by operation of law, and not by the will of the testator; and the disposition of the law prevails, because it is not against the expressed or implied will of the testator. This is the unexpected consequence of his expressed will. If the Court were, when an event has happened, as to which the testator has declared no intention whatever, (and because we believe that if he had foreseen or contemplated the event, he would have provided for it) to declare that his will has provided for the event, and that, contrary to the legal effect of the estate vested by the express terms of the will; what would this be, but to make, not to expound, the will?

It is argued, that the testator's wife was only intended to have the personal benefit of maintenance, out of the profits of the estate; a benefit which would, of course, cease at her death, and that the expressions that it should be in her power to have the full use, &c. and the wish that she would live on her own plantation, and endeavor to make a living in a plain and frugal manner, for her own benefit, indicates such intention.

I have already observed upon the first of these expressions. The other, so far 231 from indicating an intention to *limit his wife to a mere subsistence, to my mind, shews obviously, that he contemplated and wished his wife to accumulate money and property, for her own benefit, by the use of his property. He had already declared, that he had provided for his wife, and prohibited her from charging any thing to his children. Why this prohibition, if she could have nothing of her own to advance, as would be the case, if she was only entitled to a maintenance. His property was to be used upon her land; why recommend her to make a plain and frugal living, for her own benefit? If she were only to be entitled to a maintenance, then her plainness and frugality would not be for her own benefit, but for that of her children. No inference, then, can exist, that her interest ceased on her death, upon the ground that she was only entitled to a maintenance.

Finally, it is said that the will gave to the wife no interest, but only created a personal trust and confidence for the benefit of the children, which expired on her death. What I have just said, shews that there was a beneficial interest vested in the wife, for her own benefit. Independently of the particular expressions, shewing an express intention on the part of the testator, to give her such an interest, the terms of the bequest to her give, of themselves, such an interest. Thus in 8 Vin. 292, pl. 15, it is said, "I give to my wife all my lease at F and all my household goods, she maintaining my children; but if she should marry, then a moiety of it among my children. The children shall have no more than a maintenance, unless she marry." This beneficial interest, however, was coupled with personal trust and confidence, for the maintenance, and in part, for the education of the children, out of the profits of the property devised to her; and the question is, whether, upon her death, as she could no longer perform the trust in person, her interest ceased. Powell, in his Treatise on Devises, p. 301, treating of such interests coupled with trusts, says, "In all these cases of interests, the estate shall not determine,

232 "the object of their creation fail; as, if the children to be maintained, die, or the debts be paid before the time limited to answer them, determines; and if the devisee in such cases, die, his representative shall have the lands in the mean time." To support these propositions, he cites many cases, some only of which I have seen. It is alleged, that the cases do not support the author's propositions. Let us examine some of them.

In the case of Balder v. Blackburn, Hob. 285, the testator devised the profits of his lands to his wife, to her own use and without account, till her daughter should arrive at the age of 18, provided the wife should pay the quit-rents and fines, and keep and bring up the daughter; remainder to the daughter in fee. The wife took a second husband, and died before the daughter attained the age of 18. The Court held, that this was "a plain term given to the wife, to her own use, which accrues to the husband; and the keeping and education of the child is not such a particular privy, but it may be performed effectually by another." This is precisely our case, except as to the wife being charged with the payment of fines and quit-rents. There the estate was given to the wife, until the daughter attained her age of 18, "to her own use, without account;" here, "for her own benefit," and consequently and necessarily, without account. There, there was a direct personal trust upon the wife, to bring up the daughter at her own expense; here, there is a partial charge upon the property devised to the wife, for the maintenance and education of the children; and the personal trust to apply the funds to that purpose, is raised, not expressly, but by implication. There, the remainder was to the daughter; here, to the children. In that case, it was not necessary to enlarge the estate of the wife beyond the legal effect of the terms in which it was given to her, for the purpose of effecting the intention of the testator, to provide for the bringing up of his daughter; for, the remainder to the daughter would have taken effect immediately, on the termination of the mother's estate, *by any means, before the daughter attained the age of eighteen.

It was said at the bar, that the direction that the wife should pay the fines and quit-rents, had the effect of continuing the wife's interest, after her death; and in Everts v. Chittenden, 2 Day's Cases in Error, 357, the Supreme Court of Connecticut suggests the same opinion. The Court, which decided the case of Balder v. Blackburn, suggest no such argument; and that provision could not have had, upon any just principle, the effect to enlarge, in the slightest degree, the duration of the wife's interest. If land be devised to one without words of perpetuity, charged with the payment of money, an estate in fee is implied; because, the devise being intended to benefit the devisee, as he might die immediately after the testator, he might lose by paying the money, if he had only an estate for life. This goes upon the inferred intention of the testator. But, I have never before seen a suggestion, that an express estate for life or years, could be enlarged by a charge on the devisee to pay money. If you could enlarge it in such a case, by construction, it must be enlarged to a fee; for, there can be no criterion to determine upon any intermediate estate, between that expressly given and a fee simple. This case, therefore, and the case at bar, appear to be precisely the same.

In the case of Smith v. Havens, Cro. Eliz. 252, the testator devised, that if his wife think good to bring up his children, that then she shall have his lands, until his son attain to his age of 24 years. The wife died before the son attained to that age; and it was resolved, that that event did not determine her estate. The question was, "whether this was a matter of confidence only, or of an interest also in the land." Here, there was, most emphatically, a personal confidence in the wife, which her death made it impossible for her to comply with; yet, being coupled with an interest, the failure of the personal confidence did not destroy the interest. No matter what reasoning induced the 234 Court *to adjudge that there was an interest connected with the confidence; having determined that point, the estate was considered as continuing of course.

To the same effect, in this point, is the case of Cawthorpe v. Hayman, Cart. Rep. 25.

It is true, when it appears from other parts of the will, that a clear intent of the testator will be frustrated, by continuing the estate, in such a case, of the wife, beyond the period of her life, such construction will be given, as will effectuate the whole intentions of the testator, as in the case of ex parte Davis, already noticed; and so, if it appear that the wife, upon the whole of the will, was not intended to take any personal interest, but only to take the profits as guardian, and upon a personal confidence, for the use of the child, upon her death, her power expires. Thus, 2 Leon, 221, pl. 280, A. devised that his lands should descend to his son; but he willed, that his wife should take the profits thereof, until the full age of his son, for his education and bringing up. The wife married another husband, and died before the full age of the son; and two Justices held, that nothing was devised to the wife, but a confidence, and she was a guardian or bailiff for the infant, which was determined by her death. But contrary, if he had devised the profits of the land to his wife, until the age of his son, to bring him up and educate him; for, that is a devise of the land itself. It appears from this, that the real question in such cases is, whether an interest passes, or not? If it does, then whatever personal confidence is connected with it, the death of the wife does not destroy her interest.

The case, before cited from Connecticut, was this: The testator bequeathed to his wife, the whole of his moveable estate; and gave her, likewise, the use of all his real estate, until his son came of age; "she, my said wife, bringing up my said son, until he arrive at 21 years of age. I give to my said son the whole of my real estate, excepting the use to be disposed of, as above mentioned." The wife

235 *married another husband, and died before the son attained his age; and the question was between the husband and son. The Court determined that the real estate vested in the son, subject to a personal confidence or trust reposed in the mother; and that she had no term for years in the land. The Court having determined that the wife took no interest under the will, but a trust and confidence alone was thrown upon her, the consequence necessarily followed, that the husband could claim nothing. In coming to this conclusion, the Court were obviously strongly influenced by the bequest of all the personal property to the wife, and also a third of the land for her life. These cases are distinguishable from the case at bar, in the decisive particular, that in those cases, the wife took no personal interest whatever in the property. In our case, she took some personal interest for her own benefit; and if she took any such interest, it did not terminate with her death. The plaintiff would, therefore, be entitled to recover, unless the interest of his wife in the estate of her former husband, so far as it depended on the children's attaining their age of 21 years, or marrying, was destroyed by the death of one of the children in her life-time.

It was admitted by the counsel for the appellee, that if a grant be made to A. until B. attains his age of 21, and B. dies before he attains his age, the term ceases from the moment of B's death, because it is then ascertained, that he can never attain that age; and if the term did not cease at his death, it could never cease. An interest given by will in the same terms, would have the same effect, unless there were something in the will to shew, that the testator intended that the estate should continue, notwithstanding the death of the infant, until he would have attained his age, if he had lived; which was Boraston's case, 3 Co. 19, where the devise was for the payment of debts. In the absence of any evidence of intention to the contrary, the effect of a devise, is the same as of a deed. This was decided in Lomax v. Holmeden, 3 P. Wms. 176, and 236 Mansfield v. Mansfield*, 8 Vin. Abr. 291, pl. 13; the same case in the name of Mansfield v. Dugard, Equ. Cas. Abr. 195.

When the testator wrote his will, he had one child living, and expected, though not confidently, another. He therefore gives his whole estate to his living child, Polly; and if he should have another, to both. In the after part of his will, he usually speaks of his child or children, meaning his child Polly, if he had no other, and both his children, if he had another. He gives all his estate, except his money, to his wife, "until my children or child become of age, or be lawfully married." He meant by "children," both, if he had two; and by "child," his child Polly, already born. His will was, in effect, to give to his wife, "until his child Polly, if he should have no other, should come of age or marry," or, "until his children, Polly and another, if he should have another, both became of age or married." Upon the death of Polly, this became impossible; and upon the principles already stated, the wife's interest in the whole terminated, and her right to one moiety for her life, took effect in possession; that being a vested remainder depending on her former estate, and the other moiety vested in Thomas, in possession. Or, if the term for years of the wife, in the moiety of the estate of which the remainder was given to her for life, merged in this vested remainder, (Black v. Pagrave, Cro. Eliz. 532;) then she was entitled, upon the death of the testator, to a life-estate, immediately in that moiety, with remainder vested in the children in fee; and to an estate for years in the other moiety, until the children attained their age of 21, or married, determinable by the death of both or either of them, before those events occurred, with a vested remainder in fee to the children. It is immaterial to enquire, whether the term for years, in the moiety given to her in remainder for life, merged in the life-estate; since her interest, in the events which have happened, was precisely the same, whether the term was merged in the life-estate or not.

237 *Upon this construction of the will, upon the death of Polly, the interests of the widow and surviving child, became separate; each being entitled to the profits of the moiety of the estate; and the child must have been supported and educated out of the interest of the money, and the profits of his moiety of the residue of the estate, under the guardianship of his mother, as long as she lived, or until he attained his age or married. This consequence may be supposed to contradict the intent of the testator, to give his wife the whole profits, charged as aforesaid, until his child or children came of age or married. But it does not. His intent was, that if he had another child, his wife should have the profits of the whole, in consideration of supporting both; which she could not do, after the death of one; and upon the death of one, her interest ceased in a moiety, which vested in possession in the surviving child, as upon the death of both before their age of 21 or marriage, that moiety would have vested in possession, in the children of the testator's sister; the purpose, for which a moiety was given to the widow, having ceased, as well in the event of one, as of both. It is true, that this results, not from any expressed intention of the testator, in relation to the disposition of his property, in the event of the death of one only, or both of his children. For as to that, he had no intention; since he no more contemplated the death of both or either, before their age or marriage, than he contemplated the death of his wife, before that period. If he had contemplated the event of the death of one of the children, before his or her age or marriage, he probably would have continued his wife's interest in the whole estate, until the other attained full age or married. The effect of the deaths of one of the children and the widow, before the children attained their age or married, upon the duration of the estate of the wife, must be determined, not according to the intentions of the testator, (for, he had no intentions touching these events;) but according to the legal effect of those events, upon the estate given by the terms of the will.

238 *The difference between my construction of this will, and that adopted by the majority of the Court, does not materially affect the interests of the parties, in the events which have happened. I have gone thus at large into the subject, only for the purpose of avoiding, if I could, the establishment of a precedent for the construction of wills, of which I do not approve.

JUDGE COALTER.

As the testator lived until after a second child was born, and as the will speaks at his death, and may have been read over by him the day before, and have been intended as applying to the then situation of his family, it may, perhaps, be most proper to consider it as then made, and as speaking of his two children.

It may also be proper to consider the questions arising under this will, as at the time of the death of Polly the daughter, and as if a suit had then been brought by Thomas, the surviving child, against his mother, to ascertain their respective rights on that event; or rather, to ascertain the then rights of Kezia, the widow of the testator, in his real and personal estate; for, except so far as limited by those rights, the whole would belong to the surviving child.

It is contended, on the one side, that she took an estate for years in the whole property, real and personal, to continue until the children came of age, or married; and that nothing but the marriage of both under age, or the coming of age of both, or the marriage of one, and the coming of age of the other, could determine this term for years, until the youngest child actually did, or might have come of age; and that after this, she was to have one half for life. On the other side, it is contended, that, taking the whole will together, it must be construed to mean, that the term for years was to cease at her death, if she died before they married or 239 came of age: that so long as they all lived, or *any one child lived and was under age, she still alive, and charged with their or its support, and in want of a support herself, she was to hold all: but when she died, even if they or either of them was then under age, as she could no longer support them, nor wanted any support for herself, the term ceased; in the same manner as if the testator had said, "For the support of my wife, and to enable her to support and educate my children, until they marry or arrive at 21 years of age, I give her power to use my whole estate until that time, provided she lives so long. If she dies before that time, then it is to go to them; but, if she lives beyond that time, then she is to have one half as long as she lives."

But, if the will cannot admit of this construction, then it is contended, that the terms for years ceased, nevertheless, at her death, and did not go to her personal representative; because she took a mere personal trust and confidence, uncoupled with such interest, either in herself or third persons, as would transmit the term to her personal representatives: that there was no interest of third persons to protect, after her death, (the children being better protected by receiving the whole estate, than a mere right to maintenance and education charged on it;) and her temporal comfort, the other object, ceasing with her life, then there was no future interest, as it regards her, to protect which would require the continuance of the term; and consequently, that on this ground, if not on the other, it must cease with her life, as aforesaid.

It was also said, though not much pressed in the argument, that on the death of Polly, the term for years was determined, unless there was something in the will which would prevent it and continue the term beyond that time; and that if it was determined by that event, either the whole estate then passed over to Thomas, or one half to him in fee, and the other half to his mother for life.

According to these last pretensions, if the term for years ceased by the death of Polly, and the whole estate went 240 *over to Thomas, then the personal representative of the wife would be responsible for the use she had of it, from that time; or for the use of one half of it, if she was entitled to the other.

It is proper, therefore, to examine the question, as one between Thomas and his mother, in order to ascertain her rights on the death of Polly; and also to examine it as one between him and her personal representative, in relation to the continuance of the term after her death.

If the will had given to the wife a term of this kind, uncoupled with any interest, charge, trust, or any thing to shew that a further duration of the term was intended, and without any express direction that she was to hold, until they or the survivor actually had, or should have come of age, had they lived, it may be admitted that it would have determined on the death of one or both, under age. But, this operation of the rule of law on such an estate, may be done away, either by express words in the will, or by manifest intent, deducible from the whole will, as in Borraston's case, 3 Co. 19; where, from construction, it was determined it should continue, until the son would have come of age, had he lived. Whether the term, then, determined on the death of Polly, or not, will depend on a sound construction of the will, taken all together. It seems to me, from its whole structure, not only that the wife was intended to have the nurture and education of the children; but that a provision for her, at least during her life, was intended to be made. She was to make a living in a plain and frugal manner, for her own benefit. For these purposes, she is to have the use of the whole, until they come of age or marry; and then, they are to take one half, and she the other half for life. She is no longer charged with support and education; and they must have the means of their own, and one half will be enough for her. But, if the term was to cease on the death of Polly, either the whole must go over to Thomas, or her life estate must then commence in a half,

241 and the other half must *go over to him. He then would take either the whole or one half, before he came of age or married; which would be contrary to the letter of the will. Would it be according to its intention? If it would, then his nurture and education by her would cease; for, if he took all, nothing would be left for her to support him with; if one half, she would only have the means of her own support left. She would not be compelled, (nor would she forfeit that by a refusal) to support him out of it; nor would his support be a charge on that part, leaving his half to accumulate; and although the will speaks at the death of the testator, yet it may not be improper here to remark, that when he had but one child, he designated the whole as a fund for the support of that child, and the mother; and even charged monies with education also. Suppose Polly had come of age or married; this would not have determined the term, until the other had also come of age, or married; although Polly would want, and might have been entitled to, some support; and if she had died after marriage, and before Thomas came of age, would this put an end to the term; and would the whole estate go over, one half to her children, and the other to Thomas? Or, if only half went over, who would get it, Thomas or her children; or must they both be supported out of it?

But again. If the term ceased by the death of Polly, and the whole estate went over to the survivor, then, as before said, there would be nothing left for the maintenance of the wife, which, it seems to me, would so entirely defeat the will, that such construction could not be put on it. But, then it is said, the term only would cease, and her life estate in one half would begin, discharged from the support of Thomas, as much so, as if he had come of age; that the remainder in her for life, in one half, though limited on a term which has ended, not by marriage or coming of age, as specified in the will, but by another event, (and which, by that will, was to take effect, not on the death of one or both,

but on their marriage or coming 242 *of age,) was nevertheless a vested remainder in her, to take effect on such determination of the particular estate; and, that it was not a contingent remainder, which would be bad, there being no freehold to support it. But, even if this would be the case, and she would thus not be deprived of all support; yet, her right to support and educate, and take the surplus would be defeated; as also, the intention of the testator, that she should have the rearing and education of the child, who was of very tender years, and who would thus be thrown on his guardian. Indeed, I understood it was admitted in the argument, that the trust, being for both, did not determine by the death of one; and that no Court could invade her right to rear and educate out of this fund, after which she was entitled to the surplus: that she would have forfeited the whole, had she failed to support and educate, and would not have the residue on merely paying for board, &c. But, if she is thus forced to take one half in remainder, long before the time specified in the will, it will be by mere operation of law upon the estates granted in the will, and not from any intention expressed or thought by the testator. But, as before said, although operations of law, of this kind, may take effect, when there is nothing in the will to control; yet, if there be over-ruling provisions there, these general rules of law will yield to such intention.

If I have succeeded in shewing, that the whole estate would not have gone over to Thomas, on the death of Polly, but that to do so, would manifestly violate the intention of the will; if a similar violation would take place in case one half went over; the argument is equally strong as to it. But if the term did not cease on the death of Polly, then the question, whether the remainder for life in one half was vested or contingent, does not arise. Borraston's case shews, that the term may continue beyond the time, when, in ordinary cases, it would cease by the rule of law, if such continuance appears by the will, to have been intended. It seems to me, it was intended that it should 243 continue after *the death of one child, living the mother; whether beyond her life, it is not at present, necessary to consider. But if it did continue beyond the death of Polly, then the remainder for life in one half, if vested, did not then begin in possession, the particular estate not being ended; and this would decide the question, as between Thomas and his mother. If, however, the term then ceased, and the remainder was contingent and void, then the whole would also go over to the son, and leave no support to the wife; which would be a strong argument to prove, that the rule of law ought not to be permitted thus to operate on the term, and produce this effect, if by any sound construction of the will, it might be avoided.

My impression is, that if there had been nothing else in the will, which, by construction or otherwise, would continue the term beyond the death of Polly, the mother could not, on that event, take one half for life, as a vested remainder in her; but whether she would or not, I shall not stop to enquire; being satisfied, as before stated, that there is enough in this will to continue the term, down to the time when the youngest child shall attain, or would have attained his age of 21 years; and had the mother survived that time, that she would then have taken one half for life.

This brings us to the enquiry, whether, notwithstanding the death of the mother, before Thomas arrived at his age of 21 years or marriage, the term is to continue and pass to her administrator, until it is determined by the marriage, or coming of age &c. of Thomas? This also, is to be determined by the whole will.

A provision was intended for a two-fold object. First, for her personal comfort, and to enable her to make a plain and frugal living, for her own benefit; and secondly, to enable her to raise and educate the children, until marriage, or their coming of age. For this purpose, the estate is to be kept together, and used on her plantation, and his debts to be paid out of the money he leaves behind. She is to 244 *charge nothing for their board and clothes; and in short, no charge is to be made that may affect their estate, inasmuch, he says, "as he has provided for them in the foregoing of this instrument, as well as for his wife." Was it his intention, that in case his wife died, during the minority of his children, that the estate still should be kept together on her farm by her heirs, that they might make a living for themselves, merely deducting the price of board and tuition, &c. of his children, though she could not have held it discharged of personal care, &c.? Or, was he looking simply to her personal comfort, and to that dependence on her for sustenance and education, calculated to preserve the parental authority; at the same time that she would be rewarded by the surplus, to be taken for her own benefit, for that care and attention he expected her to pay? He thus provides for them, as well as for her. He looked to her personal comfort, and to a discharge by her, of the most important duties to his children, and enables her to discharge them. He looked to no other state of things. Shall we carry the provision farther? When they are no longer a charge, either for education or support, still she is to be provided for. Her comfort is looked to; though not beyond the time, when she will cease to want it. When that event happens, he looks to no one beyond her, but his children, and those of his blood, who are to take in remainder after them. Why shall this event's happening at one time, have a different effect from what it would have, happening at another? If we give it these different effects, it must be because we are forced to do so, by the rules of law operating on the estates devised, from which we cannot escape by any sound interpretation to be put on the will. I think we are not driven to this; but that the whole will justifies the interpretation that has been contended for. Plain men, unversed in legal subtleties, I think would put this construction on it; and it would seem, until otherwise advised, the appellee himself so considered it. Unlettered *men

On the whole, I am for reversing the decree.

Faulkner's Administratrix v. Brockenbrough.

May, 1836.

Mortgages—Payment of Money after Day Stipulated.—Where it is stipulated in a mortgage, that money shall be paid on or before a given day, and it is paid after that day, the mortgagee is not deprived of his right of action at law on the mortgage.

Same—Same—Effect of Acceptance.—The acceptance of the money by the mortgagee, after the day appointed for payment does not change the rights of the parties, at law.

Austin Brockenbrough, brought an action of detinue against Catharine Faulkner, administratrix of Thomas Faulkner deceased, in the Superior Court of King & Queen county, to recover a slave. The defendant pleaded non detinet, and issue was joined.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant moved for a new trial, which was refused by the Court. To this decision, the defendant filed a bill of exceptions, setting forth the evidence which was introduced on the trial. It states, that the plaintiff proved at the trial, that Elliott Muse and wife, had conveyed to him by deed of mortgage, for valuable consideration, the slave in dispute, on the 9th day of April, 1816. This deed recites, that the said Muse had executed his bond, with Walter Healy and George Healy his sureties, for the sum of 246 *$3000, payable to Austin Brockenbrough, on or before the 18th day of

*JUDGE CABELL, who was absent from indisposition, authorised the PRESIDENT to say that he concurred with JUDGE GREEN.

†See monographic note on "Mortgages" appended to Faulkner v. Stuart, 6 Gratt. 197.

April, 1817; and the said Muse, wishing further to secure the payment of the said sum of money, conveyed the property therein described, consisting of real and personal estate, and among other things, the slave in dispute; provided, that if Elliott Muse, Walter Healy or George Healy, should pay or cause to be paid to the said Brockenbrough, the said sum, on or before the 18th day of April, 1817, with interest, &c. the deed should be void.

The plaintiff also proved, that the defendant was at the institution of this suit, in possession of the said slave.

The defendant then proved, that the plaintiff, before the institution of this suit, had been paid by Walter Healy, one of the sureties to the bond above-mentioned, the whole amount of the money due to him, which the said mortgage was intended to secure; but that the said plaintiff had never executed a release; and that this suit was brought and carried on, for the benefit, and at the costs of the said Healy, the said plaintiff having consented thereto. On these grounds, the defendant moved the Court, at the trial, to instruct the jury, that the plaintiff could not recover in this action, if he was so paid off his debt; which motion being over-ruled, he moved for a new trial, which was also refused; judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

Leigh, for the appellant, admitted that, at law, if there be a feoffment with a defeasance, the condition must be strictly performed; but he contended, that in this case, the facts were not stated with the necessary precision. But, even if the money was paid after the day, Brockenbrough, could not recover, after he was fully satisfied; and he could not surely recover for the benefit of another, what he could not recover for himself. But the acceptance of the money by Brockenbrough, waives the forfeiture. In Co. Litt. 211, b. sec. 341, 342, 343, 344, there are analogous cases, in which the forfeiture is waived, by acceptance of money, &c. It appears by the same author, that a condition for a mortgagor to do some act, is always construed favorably for him, because its object is to create, and not to defeat the estate.

Stanard, for the appellee, denied that the record was uncertain, and insisted that it sufficiently appeared, that the money was paid after the day, appointed by the condition of the mortgage. The rule of law is express, that conditions of this sort must be strictly performed. The instances cited by Coke Littleton, do not apply. They only prove, that the place of performance may be changed by consent of parties. But the time of performance does not admit of such alteration. If a party receives money at a different place, from that stipulated, the payment is good, because if it was not there received, the debtor might go to the right place, if the money was not accepted there. But when the time has passed, he has no such option.

But it was incorrect in the appellant, to move for a new trial, on the ground of improper instructions given by the same Judge, before whom the motion is made.

Where there is a satisfied trust, an action may be maintained, either by the trustee, or the cestui que trust. Hopkins v. Stevens, 2 Rand. 423.

May 23. The PRESIDENT delivered the opinion of the Court.

The only question in this case, on the merits, which is presented by the bill of exceptions filed in the record, is, whether the instruction to the jury, asked for by the defendant, was properly refused by the Judge? After the plaintiff had exhibited his evidence, to wit: that Elliott Muse and wife had conveyed to him, by deed of mortgage, for valuable consideration, the slave in the declaration mentioned, and also the deed of mortgage duly recorded; and also had proved, that the defendant was, at the institution of the suit, in possession of the said slave; the defendant then proved, that the said plaintiff, before the institution of the suit, had been paid by Walter Healy, one of the sureties to the collateral bond, in the said mortgage mentioned, the whole amount of the money due to him, which the said mortgage was intended to secure; but, that the said plaintiff had never executed a release, and that the said suit was instituted and carried on, for the benefit and at the costs of the said Healy, the said plaintiff having consented thereto. The defendant then moved the Court to instruct the jury, that the said plaintiff could not recover in this action, if he was paid off his debt for the benefit of the said Healy; which instruction, the Court refused to give.

Upon these premises, it is not easy to imagine, in what the Court erred, in refusing the instruction. There is nothing in the mortgage, which, by any possible construction of it, would make a payment after the day stipulated in the mortgage, equivalent to a payment at or before the day; and, as it lay upon the defendant to prove the payment at or before the day, in discharge of the defeasance in the mortgage, he ought to have stated it in the bill of exceptions, if the fact was so. Having omitted to state it, it must be taken, that the payment relied on, was after the day in the defeasance; and in that point of view, the law is very plain.

The estate of the mortgagee in the property included in the deed, until forfeiture, continues as at the common law, before the interference of the Courts of Equity. He is entitled to an estate as tenant in mortgage in fee, or for a term of years, as the case may be; or to an absolute estate in personal property, as regards the title; subject to any agreement as to the possession, and defeasible at law, by performance of the condition. Ryall, &c. v. Rolle, &c. 1 Atk. 179. 1 Pow. on Mortgages, 204. After the forfeiture by failing to perform the condition, whereby the estate becomes absolute, the mortgagee may enter upon it, and take possession, without any possibility at law, of being evicted by the mortgagor; 1 Pow. on Mortg. 185; or, if the possession be in the mortgagor, he may recover it by suit, unless there be some agreement in the deed, (which does not exist in this case,) varying the rights of the parties at common law. The judge, therefore, was correct in refusing the instruction to the jury, asked for by the defendant. The mere acceptance of payment after the day in defeasance, cannot, by implication or inference, change the rights of the parties, as to personal or real estate, at law; or the Statute of 7 Geo. 2, chap. 20, (which is not in force here,) would have been unnecessary, as regards the latter, in England. The fact that the mortgagee agreed that this suit should be for the benefit of Healy, the surety, who had paid the money, and at his costs, has no influence on the rights of the parties, at law, or in equity; as there also, a surety who paid the money would be entitled to the legal effect of the deed, upon the principle of substitution; which jurisdiction of equity would be entirely frustrated, if payment after the day, by the surety, would divest the legal title of the mortgagee.

Judgment affirmed.

250 *Clarke v. Tinsley's Administrator.

May, 1826.

Chancery Practice—No Issue—Order for an Account.*— In a Chancery cause, when a replication has been entered, and afterwards withdrawn, it is error for the Court to order an account, or to render a decree, until a new issue is made up. A deposition which had been taken, while the replication was standing, cannot be read, after it is withdrawn.

Same—Answer—Exceptions.—When exceptions are filed to an answer, they must be disposed of, before any further proceedings can take place in the cause.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Lynchburg. The whole subject is so fully unfolded in the following opinion, that nothing more need be said.

Wickham, for the appellant.

No Counsel, for the appellee.

May 24. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

Tinsley's administrator filed his bill against Clarke, a former Sheriff of Pittsylvania, stating, that his intestate had sent by mail to the defendant, Clerks' tickets for collection, keeping a list, and sending on one for the Sheriff to enter a receipt on, and return: that no receipt has been returned, so that he is without remedy at law. The bill, therefore, prays a discovery, an account, and decree for what may be found due. The defendant filed a very vague and unsatisfactory sort of answer, stating the length of time that his deputies did the business: that he has no doubt, if they ever received any fee bills, they have accounted for and paid them: that some of them are removed, some dead, and he does not think he ought to be sued after such a length of time. (He was Sheriff in 1808 and 1809, and deputy in 1810. The bill was filed in 1814.) At the May Rules, 1815, the answer was filed, the plaintiff replied to it, and a commission issued. Under this commission, the deposition of Richard Jeffries was taken. At the October Term,

1815, by consent, the replication was 251 set aside, and leave *given the plaintiff to amend his bill, and to the defendant, to amend his answer. The amended bill calls for a more particular answer; that the defendant may say, whether he did not, while Sheriff, in 1808-9, or while deputy, receive tickets from Tinsley, as per list filed with the bill; whether he or his deputies did not keep books, and if so, is there not some entry of these there; and calls for extracts, &c. &c. The amended answer gives rather a lame account of the matter, speaks of the books, of tickets being entered in them, of payments made, &c. but produces no extracts. This answer was filed at the May Rules, 1817, and a replication and commission taken; and at the April Rules, 1818, the cause was set for hearing by the plaintiff. At the May Term, 1818, for reasons appearing to the Court, the replication is set aside, and the cause remanded to the Rules. At the October Rules, 1818, the plaintiff filed exceptions to the answers, and gave a Rule for a better answer; and the defendant insisting on the sufficiency of his answers, the plaintiff set down his exceptions for argument. Then comes this entry, at the May Term, 1819. "This cause came on this day to be heard on the bills, answers, exhibits and the examination of a witness, and upon the exceptions to the answers; on consideration whereof, the Court doth refer the accounts to a commissioner, who is to examine, &c." in the usual style. The commissioner reported a balance against the defendant, stating that the account was founded on the bill and answer, and deposition of Jeffries. After the report returned, but before it was acted on, the defendant took two depositions; one of his clerk, stating the information given by the books; the other of a witness, proving that the former was his clerk, while he was Sheriff. The Chancellor, in October, 1820, renders a decree on the report, as one to which there was no exception.

The course pursued at the hearing, as the record terms it, when the case came on upon the exceptions, was a singular one.

The replication having been with-252 drawn, and *the cause sent to the Rules; all which had been done under the replication, was undone; and among other things, the deposition, which had been taken, was suppressed. When the cause came again before the Court, it was not for a hearing; there was no issue between the parties on the main subject. It was simply an appeal to the Court, to decide whether the answer was sufficient, or not. If it was thought sufficient, the exceptions would be over-ruled, and the cause sent back for further proceedings, to give the plaintiff a chance to reply, and take evidence. If the answers were deemed insufficient, the exceptions would be sustained, and the defendant ordered to put in a better answer; and the cause would be sent back to be matured for hearing. Instead of doing either of these things, the Chancellor simply directs an account, as on a hearing; and thus sends the matter to the commissioner in that crude state, without a decision whether the exceptions were good or bad, without any issue between the parties, without giving the defendant a chance to support his answer by evidence, and with the deposition to be read against him, which, by the subsequent proceedings, had been annulled. This was no doubt an oversight, occurring in the hurry of business. If the course pursued by the Court, could be considered as over-ruling the exceptions, then the answer, standing unreplied to, must be taken as true in every particular; but the record states, that the deposition of Jeffries was read, and the commissioner reports, that it was one of the grounds of his account. The evidence afterwards taken for the defendant, is not regarded in the slightest degree by the Chancellor; but the report is confirmed, simply because unexcepted to. Whether a formal exception was necessary, when the commissioner stated that it was founded wholly on the bill, answer and deposition, and when the defendant had taken evidence to impeach it, I shall not decide, as it is unnecessary. The proceeding upon the exceptions to the answer, was wholly irregular; and I think the decree should be reversed, and the 253 cause sent back, the *proceedings set aside subsequent to the exceptions to the answer, and those exceptions to be set down for hearing by the Chancery Court.

JUDGE COALTER and GREEN concurred, and the decree was reversed, &c.*

Mann v. Sutton.

May, 1826.

Specialty—What Constitutes—Joint Suit against Drawer and Endorsers—A single bill, under seal, is not a note, but a specialty; and therefore, the drawer and endorsers of such a note made negotiable and payable at the Farmers' Bank, cannot be sued jointly.

William Mann brought an action of debt in the Superior Court of Law for Caroline county, against Francis V. Sutton, maker, and William Sutton, John Sutton, jun. James T. Sutton, and Anderson Barrett, endorsers, of a negotiable note under seal, for $3000, drawn and endorsed by the defendants, as aforesaid.

The defendants pleaded payment, and also demurred generally. The Court gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff obtained a supersedeas.

Wickham, for the appellant, said that by our law, negotiable notes at the Virginia and Farmers' Banks are put upon the footing of foreign bills of exchange; and that a bill of exchange would not lose its character, by being under seal. If so, a joint action is given in both cases, by force of our Acts of Assembly.

254 *Stanard, for the appellees, denied that any case could be found, which supported Mr. Wickham's assertion, that a bill of exchange can be made under seal. By the fixed principles of law, the contracts of the maker and endorsers of an instrument under seal, are of different natures and dignity. The first is a specialty; the others are simple contracts. The form of action, the pleadings, and the verdicts are different in the two cases. But the law only places notes negotiable and payable, &c. on the footing of bills of exchange. Can a specialty be called a note, without confounding the legal definitions of the two things? The law, in giving a joint action against the drawer and endorsers of a promissory note, committed some violence on the principles of the common law. Shall we extend this violence still further, by giving a joint action on a specialty?

May 25. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

The instrument, which is the foundation of this action, is a single bill under seal, by which F. V. Sutton promises to pay to W. Sutton, or order, six months after date, negotiable and payable at the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, the sum of $3000. There are several endorsers, and a joint action of debt is brought against the obligor and endorsers. A demurrer to the declaration was put in, and sustained by the Court below. The simple question presented is, can this action be sustained?

Upon general principles, there could not be the doubt of a moment. The contracts of the obligor, and the different endorsers, are several, distinct, and of different grades. The obligor has bound himself by a sealed instrument; the endorsers, by their hands merely. The defence cannot be the same.

But, we have an Act of Assembly, which authorises the holder of a foreign bill of exchange protested, to commence and prosecute an action of debt, for principal, 255 damages, interest, *and charges of protest, against the drawers and endorsers, jointly, or against either of them separately; and we have another Act, saying that notes made negotiable and payable at the Virginia and Farmers' Banks, shall be placed on the footing of foreign bills of exchange; and as this obligation is made negotiable and payable at the Farmers' Bank, it has been supposed, I presume, that this authorised the joint action. The conclusion to which I have come in this matter, differs toto cælo from this. The Act says, that notes made negotiable, &c. shall be on the footing of bills of exchange. This is not a note, but a specialty; differing in dignity, in the mode of defence, indeed, in all the legal consequences, flowing from it. It is a general rule, that these new remedies, innovating upon the settled doctrines of the common law, shall be taken strictly. But, the most liberal and latitudinous construction, it seems to me, could not extend the Act of Assembly to the case before us. I am clear that the judgment be affirmed.

JUDGES GREEN and COALTER concurred, and judgment was affirmed.*

Same—Ex-Officio Jailor—Liability.—A sheriff is ex-officio jailor, and is liable for the misconduct of his turnkey or servant.

Instruction—Weight of Evidence.—An instruction by the Court, that the facts proved are not conclusive evidence, does not amount to an instruction as to the weight of evidence, because it leaves the whole matter open to the jury.

Sheriff—Jailor—Liability.—Quære. If a jailor is regularly appointed by the Sheriff, is he thereby discharged from responsibility for the acts of his jailor?

This action was originally brought in the Superior Court of King William county. It was an action of trespass on the case, brought by Taliaferro against Dabney, as Sheriff and jailor of the county of King William, to recover the value of a negro man slave, the property of the plaintiff, who was confined in the jail of the said county, as a runaway; which slave was rendered entirely useless to his master, by neglect of duty, on the part of the defendant, as Sheriff and jailor, in not furnishing diet, fire, and bed covering.

The declaration charges, that Dabney, by the law and custom of the land, was keeper of the jail, by virtue of being Sheriff of the said county, and bound to keep the said jail in all things as the law directs, for the confinement and safe keeping of all persons lawfully committed to the said jail, as prisoners: that by the same law, he was bound to furnish every prisoner, with wholesome and sufficient food, with sufficient fuel, when necessary and proper, and with cleanly and sufficient bed covering, &c. that the said Dabney, as Sheriff, and keeper of the said jail, on the day of January, 1821, received into the said jail, a certain runaway negro slave, named Bartlett, the property of the plaintiff, of the value of $500: that the said Dabney, and those acting for him, so negligently and carelessly behaved and conducted himself and themselves, in that behalf, that the said slave became diseased and 257 *frost-bitten from cold, crippled and maimed, and was injured by and through the mere negligence, carelessness, and default of the said Dabney, and was wholly lost, and of no value to the plaintiff, to his damage $1000.

The defendant demurred generally to the declaration; and pleaded, that at the time of the supposed injury, he was not the jailor or keeper of the jail of the said county of King William. Issue was joined, and a verdict was found for the defendant. On motion of the plaintiff, a new trial was granted; and on the like motion, the venue was changed to the Superior Court of King & Queen county, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his declaration, and to the defendant, to plead any additional plea or pleas in bar, within ninety days.

The cause was tried in the Superior Court of King & Queen, where the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and $400 damages.

At the trial, the defendant filed two bills of exception. In the first, it is stated, that the defendant move the Court, to instruct the jury, that the defendant, if the jailor of King William county, was not bound by the law of the land, to have furnished the runaway slave in the declaration mentioned, who was committed on the 7th of January, 1821, with blankets, or other bed covering, and with fuel; which motion was over-ruled by the Court, and an instruction to the contrary thereof was given to the jury.

The second bill of exceptions stated, that the defendant introduced evidence to prove that James R. Thornton, who was tavern-keeper at the court-house of King William, had the custody of the keys of the jail, before and after, and at the time the runaway slave was committed to King William county jail: that he received all prisoners who were committed to the said jail: that he dieted them, and received the compensation allowed by law for that service: that he held the keys, by consent of the Sheriff, and acted in his stead; and that he exercised complete control over the jail aforesaid. The plaintiff introduced 258 evidence to *prove, that the defendant was allowed by the Court, the public allowance authorised by law to be made to the jailor, which was received by him. Whereupon, the defendant moved the Court to instruct the jury, that under the law of the land, the said Thornton, if it was proved to them that he was appointed by the Sheriff, keeper of the jail aforesaid, was alone answerable to the plaintiff's action, and not the High Sheriff; which motion was over-ruled by the Court, who instructed the jury, that the High Sheriff was ex-officio jailor of the county, unless he appointed some other person as jailor; and that the defendant was liable for the misconduct of the said Thornton, as his turnkey or servant, unless he could prove that he had regularly and legally appointed him the jailor; and that the mere facts attempted, as above, to be proved by the defendant, were not conclusive evidence of such regular appointment by the defendant.

Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

Wickham, for the appellant, said that this action was founded on our Act of Assembly, and not on the common law: that the 1 Rev. Code, 235, sec. 34, which points out the duties of jailors, has no relation to runaways, as is proved by the allowance of forty cents per diem, for their maintenance and support. The Act concerning runaways is found in 2 Rev. Code, 284; but the term prisoners, which is used in the Act just quoted, is never applied to runaways. The allowance of forty cents per diem would be exorbitant for the maintenance of a slave.

But, if this action is founded on the common law, no specific duties, such as are required by the Statute, are imposed on the Sheriff. The declaration should only have alleged the breach generally, that the slave was negligently kept, &c. not that he was not furnished with wholesome and sufficient food, with sufficient fuel, with cleanly and sufficient bed covering, &c.

259 *But, the Sheriff is not answerable for the acts of the jailor. The jailor, it is true, is the servant of the sheriff; but the the jailor his mere servant. Stephenson v. Salisbury (W. Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 217.

See monographic note on "Jurisdiction" appended to Philpen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457.

Sheriff is not the jailor. As to runaways, certain duties are imposed on the jailors by name, and not on the Sheriffs. In the 1 Rev. Code, 235, jailors are required to perform certain acts, which clearly do not belong to Sheriffs. In other cases, the Sheriffs are required to do certain things, where jailors are certainly not intended. These laws shew that the Legislature considered jailors and Sheriffs as distinct persons. The same distinction is observed in 2 Rev. Code, 285; where it is made the jailor's duty to advertise at the door of the court-house; but the Sheriff is to sell the slave, if it should be necessary. 2 Rev. Code, 287, sec. 12, 13, affords further instances of this distinction. That the jailor is liable for negligent conduct, is proved by Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 93-8, and 12 Co. 137, and Hawk Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 1.

The instruction was wrong, because it pronounced an opinion on the weight of evidence.

Stanard, for the appellee, said, that it was the duty of the Sheriff to treat his prisoners with humanity; and if so, the declaration was good, in charging specifically, such gross negligence, as amounts to a violation of his duty in that respect. Besides this particular enumeration of instances of negligence, the declaration charges, in general terms, that the defendant negligently and carelessly conducted himself, &c. which removes Mr. Wickham's objection to the manner of charging the gravamen. 1 Chitt. Cr. Law, 808. 1 Institutes, 295.

The instruction was correct. The Court was called on to instruct the jury, that the Sheriff was not bound, under any circumstances, to furnish the prisoner with blankets or other bed covering, and with fuel, and the Court refused. In doing so, it well supported the spirit and humanity of our law. The law is express to this effect. 1 Rev. Code, 235. The distinction between prisoners and runaways, 260 *committed to prison, is unfounded.

Sheriffs are jailors. 2 Inst. 589; and 1 Black. Comm. 346, says that jailors are the servants of Sheriffs. Therefore, the latter are responsible for the acts of the former. An Act of Assembly gives the Sheriff an action against the magistrates of the county, for keeping insufficient jails. 1 Rev. Code, 250. Why is this given, unless the Sheriff is responsible for escapes and other injuries, arising from the bad condition of the jail? It is even doubtful, whether any action would lie against the jailor. 2 Bac. Abr. Tit. "Escapes in Civil Cases," E. 2. The Sheriff and jailor are treated as the same persons, in all our laws.

May 26. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.*

Tallafarro had a negro man committed to the jail of King William county, on the 7th of January, 1821, as a runaway. The slave having become frost-bitten, while in jail, Tallafarro brought an action on the case against the Sheriff, charging that the Sheriff is, by the law of the land, jailor, and as such, bound to furnish necessary food, covering, fire, &c. to all prisoners:

that the defendant, as Sheriff, received into the jail of the county, his slave committed as a runaway; and that he, and those acting for him, so negligently and carelessly conducted themselves in that behalf, that the slaves became diseased, frost-bitten from cold, crippled and maimed, by and through the mere negligence, carelessness, and default in duty, of the said Sheriff and jailor, and was, and still is of no value to the plaintiff.

To this declaration, the defendant demurred generally, and also pleaded several pleas. A trial was had, and a verdict for the defendant. The Court granted a new trial; and, for reasons appearing, changed the venue to King & Queen. Leave also was given to the defendant, to plead anew, and to the plaintiff to amend. After 261 the removal, *a jury was sworn, and found a verdict for the plaintiff, for $400; and the demurrer being over-ruled, the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff.

During the trial, two bills of exceptions were filed; and it was to the correctness of the Court in deciding these points, that the argument was principally confined.

In the first bill, the counsel moved the Court to instruct the jury, that the defendant, if jailor, was not bound by the law of the land, to furnish the runaway committed on the 7th of January, 1821, with blankets or other bed covering, and with fuel; which motion was over-ruled by the Court, and an instruction to the contrary given.

That the Court did not err in refusing the instructions asked for, seems very clear to me. For I cannot for a moment suppose, that by the law of the land, a human being may be imprisoned in mid-winter, and yet the jailor not bound to provide him with covering or fire. I should as soon think that he was not bound to furnish him food. If the Court, therefore, had stopped at merely refusing the instructions asked, there could have been no doubt of their correctness; but they over-ruled the motion, and gave instructions to the contrary; that is, being asked to say, that a jailor was not bound to furnish covering and fire to a runaway, committed on the 7th of January, the Court said that he was bound; and I think they were right. Can we suppose a state of the weather at that season, which would justify the jailor in neglecting to make any sort of provision for the cold, neither a blanket to cover, nor a fire to warm the prisoner? If the particular day on which he was committed was so warm, as to have rendered such provision unnecessary for the moment, could the continuance of such weather be counted on, with so much certainty, as to justify the total omission of attention to the subject? I speak not now under the Act of Assembly, but on the principles of the common law; and I am clearly of opinion, that these principles do not warrant or excuse such omission and neglect. The genius of our law is not so cruel and unfeeling. Non obtusa adeo gestamus pectora.

262 *The second exception. The defendant introduced evidence to prove, that one Thornton, the tavern-keeper, at the court-house, kept the keys of the jail, received prisoners, dieted them, and received the compensation allowed by law for that service: that he held the keys by consent of the Sheriff, and acted in his stead: that he exercised complete control over the jail. The plaintiff proved, that the defendant was allowed by the Court, the public allowance, authorised by law to be made to the jailor, which was received by him. Whereupon, the defendant moved the Court to instruct the jury, that under the law of the land, the said Thornton, if it appeared to them that he was appointed by the Sheriff, keeper of the jail, was alone answerable to the plaintiff's action, and not the High Sheriff; which motion was over-ruled, and the Court instructed the jury, that the Sheriff was ex-officio jailor, unless he appointed some other person jailor; and that the defendant was liable for the misconduct of the said Thornton as his turnkey or servant, unless he could prove, that he had regularly and legally appointed him the jailor; and that the facts attempted to be proved as above, were not conclusive evidence of such regular appointment.

This instruction consists of three positions taken by the Court. 1. That the Sheriff is ex-officio jailor. This I take to be the settled rule of the common law; nor do I see anything in our Statute changing it. On the contrary, they seem to take it as the basis, on which their provisions are founded. 2. The Court say, that the defendant was liable for the misconduct of Thornton as his turnkey or servant, unless he proved a regular appointment of him as jailor. This, I presume, would scarcely be denied. It would be strange to say, that the principle which pervades the whole law, qui facit per alium, facit per se, did not apply here. Suppose the Sheriff were to deliver the keys of the jail to his slave, and order him to attend to the prisoners, and carry them food, and this slave were to set the jail door open, and let them escape; would *not the Sheriff be answerable? Assuredly he would. 3. The Court said, that the facts attempted to be proved, were not conclusive evidence of the regular and legal appointment of Thornton, jailor. If this be considered an opinion as to the weight of evidence, it was erroneous; for this belongs solely to the jury. But it does not strike me in that point of view. On the contrary, it was submitting the weight entirely to the jury. To say that evidence is conclusive, is to decide that nothing can rebut it; is to conclude the jury and the party. Here, every thing was left at large. Bogle v. Somerville, 1 Call, 561. There was no error then in this. I have not touched the question, whether, if the Sheriff had regularly appointed Thornton his deputy, he could thereby have relieved himself from all responsibility for his acts, because the Court gave no instruction on that point, and it is not therefore directly raised. But, the inclination of my mind is, that the Sheriff, notwithstanding such appointment, would be liable, as in other cases, for the acts of his deputy.

JUDGES GREEN and COALTER concurred, and the judgment was affirmed.

May, 1826.

Statute—Sequestration—Case at Bar.—The representative of a British subject, whose estate was sequestered under the law of 1777, and who does not apply to the Auditor until 1822 for a certificate. Is not entitled to interest on his claim, after the 1st of January, 1811.

This was an appeal from the Richmond Chancery Court, where J. P. Martin, as administrator of S. Martin deceased, filed a petition of appeal from a decision of the Auditor of public accounts. The objects of the petition are fully stated in the following opinion. The Chancellor dismissed the appeal, and the petitioner appealed to this Court.

Wickham, for the appellant.

Attorney General, for the appellee.

May 27. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

In October, 1777, the Assembly passed an Act sequestering the estates and property of British subjects, and directing the profits to be paid into the loan office, and certificates of such payment to be taken in the name of the proprietor, and delivered to the Governor and Council. In 1796, they pass a law saying, that in all cases where estates have been sequestered under the law of 1777, and money paid into the treasury, it shall be lawful for the Auditor to issue to the person, on whose account such payment has been made, a certificate for the value thereof, with interest at 6 per cent. from the date of the payment. In 1802, it is enacted, that the owners of certificates do deposit them with the treasurer, who shall give a receipt for them, specifying the amount, and distinguishing principal from interest; and upon such receipt being presented to the Auditor, he shall issue a new certificate for the principal, and a warrant for the interest. Secondly. If the holders of certificates do not apply before the 1st of January, 1803, for warrants for interest thereon, such interest shall cease after that period. An Act passed in 1809, reciting this second section, extends the time for which interest shall be given, on application to the Auditor, to 1811; with a saving to infants, femes covert, and persons of unsound mind.

The appellant is the administrator of Martin a British subject, whose estate was sequestered. He applied, in 1822, to the Auditor, who gave him a certificate for the principal, bearing date the 14th of May, 1822, without interest, and a warrant for the interest up to the 1st of January, 1811. The question is, has Martin a right to the interest from 1811 to 1822, the date of his certificate? And this question is to be solved by the Acts of Assembly, which I have stated. It is not a question of power, or of justice, but of intention purely.

The law of 1796, on the presumption, probably, that the certificates directed by the first Act, had been lost or destroyed during the revolution, dispenses with their production, and entitles every person, in whose name money had been paid into the treasury, to a certificate for the value thereof, with interest at 6 per cent. In 1802, the Legislature, anxious to liquidate and discharge, as far as they could, these debts, direct that the certificates shall be produced to the treasurer, who shall give a receipt, on which the Auditor shall issue a new certificate for the principal, and pay off, by warrant, the interest; and that, if the holder did not apply before January, 1803, he should lose his interest after that time. This law the Legislature had a right to pass, and its meaning seems very clear. They intended, I have no doubt, to include in its provisions, every British subject, who had a claim for payments into the treasury; no matter whether he had obtained a certificate of such payment, or not. It is true, they say "the owners of such certificates," &c. but these terms are used, I think, because having, by a former law, directed all claimants to procure this evidence of their debt, they presumed 266 that "this was done; and that the "owners of certificates" comprehended all claimants. On what possible ground of policy or justice, could they intend to make a distinction against the diligent, who, in obedience to their law, had gotten certificates, and in favor of the negligent, who had slept on their claims? That non-residence would not give this advantage, or suspend the operation of the law, is clear; because the whole class, on which it was meant to operate, were foreigners; and this is more especially clear, under the law of 1809, extending the interest to 1811; for, this law has a saving of the rights of infants, femes covert, and insane persons; but none as to persons out of the Commonwealth.

Being convinced, therefore, that the law meant to embrace the case, and that the spirit and equity, if not the letter, does embrace it, I am for affirming the decree.

JUDGES GREEN and COALTER concurred, and the decree was affirmed.*

Garland v. Richeson.

May, 1826.

Bonds—Assignee—Title of—Suit by.—The assignee of a bond under our Statute, does not acquire the legal title to the debt, but an equitable right, which, by virtue of the Statute, he may assert at law in his own name; and he has his election to sue, at law, in his own name, or in that of the original obligee, for his benefit.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law for the county of Amherst.

Hudson M. Garland brought an action of covenant against John Richeson, for the benefit of Samuel Garland. The instrument, on which the action was 267 brought *was a paper signed and sealed by the defendant, by which he bound himself to pay to Hudson M. Garland for his services as an attorney, as

*The PRESIDENT and JUDGE CABELL absent.

Bonds—Assignee—Title of—Suit by.—It is a general rule that an action on a contract must be brought in the name of the party in whom the legal interest in such contract is vested. The legislature alone has power to make an exception to this rule. An exception is made by the Code, ch. 144, § 14, p. 583, which authorizes the assignee of any bond, note or writing not negotiable, to maintain thereupon any action in his own name which the original obligee or payee might have brought. The assignee acquires only an equitable right with a capacity, expressly given him by statute, to assert it at law in his own name. But the legal title, still remaining in the obligee or payee, a right of action is incident much money as two persons, therein named, should certify, by endorsement on the said instrument, that the said services were worth. This instrument was assigned to James Garland, and afterwards assigned by him to Samuel Garland. The paper in question exhibited these facts on its face.

The defendant, after craving oyer of the instrument, pleaded two pleas, the first of which it is not necessary to notice. In the second plea, the defendant alleged that the plaintiff could not maintain this action, because the plaintiff, Hudson M. Garland, had assigned over the writing to James Garland before the institution of the suit, whereby he had no legal right or title whatsoever to the said written contract, at the time of the commencement of the said suit. Issue was joined, and the jury found for the plaintiff, on the first plea; and on the second, they found specially the facts relating to the assignment, as above set forth. The Court gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

Stanard, for the appellant.

May 27. JUDGE CARR.

I have carefully examined the reasoning and the authorities relied on by my brother Green, in this case; and I have come to the conclusion, that upon precedent and authority, he is right. At the same time, I must say, that I believe the Legislature intended to give the assignee the legal title; and if this were res integra, I should strain hard to effectuate that intention. In the actual state of things, it is safest stare decisis, and leave it to the Legislature to explain their intention, or express their will. I concur.

268 *JUDGE GREEN.

This case turns upon the question, whether the assignee has, under our Statute authorising assignments of bonds, &c. a legal right to the debt, or only, as at common law, an equitable right to the debt, with a capacity to sue in his own name in a Court of Law, by virtue of the Statute, to enforce this equitable right? If the legal title to the debt passes by the assignment, then the assignor having no longer any title, legal or equitable, no action can be maintained in his name. If the equitable title only passes, then the assignee may sue in the name of the assignor, as at common law, upon the legal title remaining in the assignor, or in his own name, by virtue of the Statute, on his equitable right; the Statute, upon this construction, giving a new remedy without abolishing the old.

By the common law, anciently, a chose in action was not assignable; and the assign-thereto, and the assignee may, at his election, sue at law in his own name, or in that of the obligee or payee for his benefit. Clarkson v. Doddridge, 14 Gratt. 44, citing principal case as authority. On the same subject, the principal cases are cited in Feazle v. Dillard, 5 Leigh 34; Dunn v. Price, 11 Leigh 209; *Pates v. ment had no effect at law, or in equity. 3 Vin. Abr. 151, pl. 2, 152, pl. 10. Afterwards, Courts of Equity protected assignments made in satisfaction of a precedent debt, but not such as were made, either voluntarily, or for a consideration then paid; since, to protect such assignments, would lead to maintenance. Ibid. 151, pl. 5, and note. The Courts of Law adopted this distinction, and took notice of the equitable rights of the assignee, when a suit was brought in the name of the assignor for his benefit. Ibid. 152, pl. 9. At and after period, Courts of Equity respected and protected all assignments made on good consideration, without regard to the distinction above mentioned; and the Courts of Law followed the example. Ibid. 152, pl. 10, note; 150, B. pl. 2. And now, in all cases, the Courts of Law in England protect the rights of an assignee, suing in the name of the assignor, so far as not to permit the assignor to dismiss the suit or to release the action.

Our first Statute, authorising assignments, was enacted in 1705. 3 Hen. Stat. at Large, 378. It provides, "that 269 *it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons, to assign or transfer any bond or bill for debt, over to any other person or persons whatsoever," and that "the assignee or assignees, his and their executors, &c. by virtue of such assignment, shall and may have lawful power to commence and prosecute any suit at law, in his or their own name or names, for the recovery, &c. as the first, (obligee) his executors, &c. might or could lawfully do. Provided, that in any suit, commenced on such bond or bill assigned, the plaintiff shall be obliged to allow all discounts that the defendant can prove, either against himself, or against the first obligee."

An Act of 1730, 4 Hen. Stat. at Large, 275, extended the provisions of the Act of 1705, to promissory notes. In 1786, these Statutes were re-enacted in an abridged form, providing that "assignments of bonds, bills and promissory notes, and other writings obligatory, for the payment of money or tobacco, shall be valid, and an assignee of any such may, thereupon, maintain an action of debts in his own name, but shall allow all just discounts, not only against himself, but against the assignor, before notice of the assignment was given to the defendant." In 1795, the provisions of the Act of 1786, were extended to all writings obligatory whatever; and these Acts were re-enacted at the revival of 1819.

I consider the Acts subsequent to that of 1705, as not intended to vary the construction of the first Act, in respect to the effect of the assignment, although the phraseology is varied, with a view to abridge the law, as is common in our revisals; and this opinion seems always to have prevailed in this Court, where it has been held, that the assignee takes the bond, not only subject to all discounts, according to the terms of the Statute, but to all equities (whether coming within the term discounts or not,) to which it was subject in the hands of the obligee; Norton v. Rose, 2 Wash. 233. Pickett v. Morris, Ib. 255. Stockton v.

Cooke, 3 Munf. 68; and that, notwithstanding the *Statute, the assignee was entitled to the same remedy in equity, that he was entitled to before the Statute; the remedy at law being cumulative, and not exclusive. Wynne v. Bowles, 6 Munf. 23.

To justify these decisions, the Court must have considered, that the legal title to the debt did not pass by the assignment, but only an equitable right, with the right to sue at law, in the name of the assignee: that the declaration, that it should be lawful to assign, was intended only to abrogate the rule of the common law, that the assignment of a chose in action was not available to any purpose; and that the right of the assignee to sue in his own name, resulted from the express provision, to that effect, of the Statute; which right would, without such provision, have resulted from the transfer of a legal title to the debt, and if such legal title had passed, the authority to sue in the name of the assignee would have been superfluous. If the Court had held, that the legal title to the debt passed by the assignment, then they could not have held, that any equity against the bond, not coming within the description of discounts, could bind the assignee, without notice of the equity; as, if the equity was founded on a fraud in the consideration of the bond. This could be no defence at law, not being a discount; and after judgment for the assignee at law, if the debtor applied for relief on that ground, to a Court of Equity, a plea that the assignee was a bona fide purchaser of the legal title to the debt secured by the obligation, without notice of any equity, would be a complete defence, on the maxim of the Court of Equity, which is without exception, that he who has the legal title, and equal equity, must prevail in that Court; and a purchaser without notice has a perfect equity. But, where a purchaser acquires only an equitable title, the maxim is, qui prior est tempore, potior est jure. So, if the legal title to the debt passed by assignment, a Court of Equity could not aid the assignee, otherwise than they could have aided any other person having a legal title, when he was prevented

271 *from pursuing his right at law, by fraud, accident or mistake. The original jurisdiction of the Court of Equity, to aid an assignee of a chose in action, was founded on the fact, that he had only an equity, which he could not assert at law. If the Statute had the effect of giving the assignee the legal title to the debt, as well as a remedy at law, then this foundation of the jurisdiction would fail; and although the assumption, by a Court of Law, of a jurisdiction once confessedly belonging exclusively to a Court of Equity, will not take away the original jurisdiction of the latter; yet, when a Statute converts an equitable estate into a legal estate, it destroys the jurisdiction of the Court of Equity. Thus, before the Statute of uses, all uses were solely of equitable jurisdiction. After that Statute, all uses executed by it, became subjects of the jurisdiction of the Courts of Law, and were taken away from equity; the latter retaining no juriadiction over any uses, but those not executed by the Statute.

Upon authority, therefore, I conclude, that an assignee, under our Statute, does not acquire the legal title to the debt, but an equitable right, which, by virtue of the Statute, he may assert at law in his own name; and that he has his election to sue at law, in his own name, under the Statute; or, in the name of the original obligee, for his benefit, upon the strength of the legal title remaining in the obligee: that the judgment must be reversed, and judgment given for the appellant, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury upon the issue joined upon the second plea; that plea and verdict alleging matter, which, although true, is no bar to the plaintiff's action.

JUDGE COALTER concurred, and the judgment was reversed.*

*Hays v. Wood.

May, 1826.

Real Estate—Purchase Jointly—Lien for Purchase Money Advanced.—Where two persons purchase a tract of land jointly, and one of them pays more than his proportion of the purchase money, while the other takes a conveyance of the whole to himself, the person who has advanced more than his share, has a lien on the land for the money so advanced.

Equity Jurisdiction.†—In such case, if the plaintiff does not pray to subject the land, but only for a personal decree for the balance due, equity will have jurisdiction.

Appeal from the Staunton Chancery Court, where Wood filed a bill against Hays, stating that Hays and himself made a joint purchase of a tract of land, which was sold for the sum of $4000; and articles of agreement were entered into between them and the vendor, whereby the vendor bound himself to make a title for the said land to the said Hays and Wood; and they bound themselves in return, to pay to the vendor the purchase money aforesaid, in the manner stipulated; that the plaintiff paid up his full moiety of the purchase money, and more; whereupon he expected a conveyance to himself and the said Hays, of the land aforesaid; that the said Hays had fraudulently procured a conveyance of the said land, to be made to himself alone. The bill, therefore, prayed, that an account might be taken, if necessary, to ascertain how much the plaintiff had over-paid his moiety of the purchase money; that the said Hays might be decreed to re-pay the surplus to the plaintiff, and to convey one moiety to him, &c.

The answer of Hays states, that he made a verbal agreement for the land, for his own benefit alone; but afterwards, being unable to furnish all the means necessary for the purchase, he entered into a verbal agreement with the plaintiff, by which the plaintiff should aid the defendant in making his payments; and, if the defendant could sell the land in a short time, the plaintiff should have half of the profits; if not, the defendant should pay him back his advances and keep the land; that accordingly, the written contract was executed, mentioned in the bill, and 273 deposited *in the hands of captain John Field, as a mere security; that the plaintiff advanced to the defendant, towards the immediate instalment, a slave, &c. The defendant stated a variety of transactions, by which it would appear that the plaintiff was in his debt on other accounts, &c.

The accounts between the parties were referred to a commissioner who reported a balance due to the plaintiff of $492 15 cents with interest, &c.

Depositions were taken, and the Chancellor decreed, that the report of the commissioner should be affirmed; and, dismissing so much of the plaintiff's bill as seeks a conveyance of the land therein mentioned, decreed that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff the sum reported by the commissioner, viz: $492 15 cents, with interest, &c.

From this decree the defendant, Hays, appealed to this Court.

Leigh, for the appellant.

No Counsel, for the appellee.

May 29. JUDGE COALTER delivered his opinion, in which the other Judges concurred.‡

Richard Wood the appellee, and David Hays the appellant, on the 9th of October, 1815, purchased a tract of land from John Wood, for the consideration of $4000, payable, as mentioned in the articles of agreement, entered into between them, on that day.

The bill alleges, that the appellee had paid more than his moiety of the purchase money; but that the appellant had received a title for the whole land. He therefore prays, that the appellant may be decreed to re-pay the surplus, and convey the 274 moiety of the land. The answer *alleges, that the appellant, in 1815, made a verbal agreement to purchase the land of John Wood, on his own account, but finding that he was unable to furnish all the property, paper, &c. necessary to make the first payment, and wanting some one to be responsible with him for the deferred payments, he entered into a verbal agreement with the appellee, that he should aid him; and if the appellant could sell the land in a short time, the appellee should have one half of the profits, and if not, that he would pay him back his advances, and keep the land; and in consequence of this, the written agreement aforesaid was entered into; and, as a better security for his performance, the agreement was to be deposited in the hands of captain John Field: that the appellee did make certain advances towards the purchase, &c. but afterwards agreed, that if the appellant would pay him the amount which he had advanced, he would give up all claim to the land, which he agreed to, and paid various sums to him, and orders he drew on him, &c. so as fully to reimburse his advances: that the appellee is in his debt on other accounts, &c. He admits, that he obtained a conveyance for the whole tract, but denies that it was fraudulently obtained, as charged in the bill; and should the Court direct an account, he prays that the balance due him, may be decreed, &c.

*The PRESIDENT and JUDGE CABELL, absent.
†See generally, monographic note on "Jurisdiction" appended to Philpen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 467.

‡The PRESIDENT and JUDGE CABELL, absent.

Taking it that these verbal agreements could have been proved, and were proved, which is not admitted; the appellee would have been entitled to a lien on the land, for the purchase money advanced by him, and not re-paid by the appellant; and in amending the bill according to this statement, the Court clearly would have had jurisdiction to settle the accounts, and decree payment, &c. But, without amending the bill, so as to subject the land as aforesaid, (which the appellee had a right to do, admitting that the statements in the answer are true,) the parties consent that the accounts should be taken, and a balance appearing due from the appellant, a personal decree is rendered against him for that balance. This it was competent for 275 them to *do; and this personal decree alone, when it might have been made to extend to the land, is beneficial to the appellant, and ought not to oust the Court of Equity, of its legitimate jurisdiction in this case.

On this ground, I perceive no error in the decree, so far as it regards the jurisdiction of the Court.

But it is said, that the exception by the appellant to the commissioner's report, ought to have been sustained. I have examined the accounts with considerable attention, and am not satisfied that the Court erred in this respect.

I think, therefore, that the decree ought to be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

Rison v. Berry.

May, 1826.

Arbitration and Award—Award—Validity—Joint Award by Arbitrators and Umpire.*—Where a submission is made, of all matters in difference between two parties, in a particular suit then depending, to two persons, and such umpire as they shall choose, and their award to be made the judgment of the Court; and the arbitrators and umpire act together and make a joint award: such award will be good.

Same—Same—Same.—Although the award does not state that the third person, who signed the award, had been chosen by the arbitrators, as umpire, yet that fact may be proved by other evidence.

Same—Same—Same.—If the third person who signed the award, were a mere stranger, this would not vitiate the award.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Amelia county.

Berry brought an action of slander against Rison; and afterwards, the parties came into Court in person, and agreed to submit "all matters in difference between them in this suit, to the final determination of Allen Jeter and John Baldwin, and such umpire as they shall choose, and that their award thereupon shall be made 276 the judgment of *the Court; and that said arbitrators and their umpire may proceed to make the award ex parte, in case either party shall fail to attend them, after receiving ten days notice of the time and place appointed for that purpose."

The arbitrators returned their award, in these words: "On hearing the evidence and argument of counsel, on both sides of the question, we, as referees, are of opinion, that the defendant Rison pay unto the plaintiff Berry, the sum of one thousand dollars."

(Signed,)

Allen Jeter.

John Baldwin.

Henry Haskew.

The defendant objected to the paper exhibited as an award, on the grounds that it does not conform to the order of reference made in this case, whereby the case was submitted to Allen Jeter and John Baldwin, and their umpire: that the award is made and signed by Allen Jeter, John Baldwin, and Henry Haskew, and does not shew on the face of it, that Henry Haskew was the umpire chosen by the referees; which objection the Court over-ruled, because it should be inferred from the award that Haskew was regularly chosen, and because it was proved by oral evidence, that he was so chosen; to which opinion, the defendant excepted; and judgment was rendered on the award.

The defendant appealed.

The case was submitted without argument.

May 29. JUDGE CARR delivered the opinion of the Court.†

The appellee brought an action of slander against the appellant. Pending the action, the parties in person came into Court, and agreed to submit "all matters in difference between them in this suit, to the final determination of Allen 277 *Jeter and John Baldwin, and such umpire as they shall choose, and that their award thereupon, shall be made the judgment of the Court; and that the said arbitrators and their umpire may proceed to make their award ex parte," on giving notice, &c.

The arbitrators, (as the bill of exceptions states) regularly chose Henry Haskew their umpire; at what time, does not appear. The arbitrators and the umpire proceeded together, to hear the cause, each signing their proceedings prior to the award; and finally returned into Court the following award: "On hearing the evidence and arguments of counsel on both sides of the question, we, as referees, are of opinion, that the defendant Rison, pay unto the plaintiff Berry, the sum of one thousand dollars." Signed, A. Jeter, John Baldwin, Henry Haskew.

It has been objected to this award, 1. That the submission was to Jeter and Baldwin, and such umpire as they may choose; and the award is signed by Jeter, Baldwin, and Haskew, without any statement by the arbitrators, that they had chosen Haskew umpire; so that he may be a stranger, which would vitiate the award. 2. Supposing Haskew, the umpire, it is contended, that he could not act, till after the disagreement of the arbitrators.

With respect to the first objection, I think there can be no doubt, that we must take Haskew as regularly appointed umpire. I see no necessity, either in reason or authority, to confine the evidence of the appointment to a statement in writing made and returned by the arbitrators; and the bill of exceptions states, that the fact was proved in Court. But take him for a stranger, who had joined the arbitrators in making the award. There is authority, both ancient and modern, that this would not vitiate. Beck v. Sargent, 4 Taunt. 232.

Supposing Haskew an umpire, we will consider, whether a joint award by the arbitrators and the umpire, be good? In Bulstr. Rep. 184, the case was this: A submission to four persons, and the umpirage of another; and the assumpsit was mutually to stand unto, and perform, the order of them five. The four persons, and the fifth as umpire, did make the award; and the question was, whether it was made according to the submission? Williams, Justice, said, "that the award was well made, and pursuing the submission; but otherwise it had been, if in the submission, they had been divided. As if it had been in this manner; that if the four could not agree in their award, that then the submission be to the umpirage of the fifth man; then these five could not all of them join in making this award. But the submission being here to four, and to the umpirage of a fifth, they all five may well join in their award; and so the award here made, by them all five, is clearly good and well made according to the submission; and the same award ought to be performed. The whole Court agreed with him herein." The case before the Court in Bulstrode, was exactly that which is before us. There, it was a submission to four, and the umpirage of another. Here, it is a submission to two, and their umpire; and their award to be the judgment of the Court.

It will be observed, that Justice Williams, not satisfied with deciding the case before him, went on to say, that if the submission had been to the four, and if they could not agree, then to the umpirage of a fifth man; they could not have joined in their award. This was an obiter dictum merely.

Soulsby v. Hodgson, 3 Burr. 1474. That case was this: A submission to arbitrators, and if they did not agree in a limited time, they were to choose an umpire. They disagreed, chose an umpire, and joined him in the award. The question was, whether the umpirage was duly made, according to the powers given to the umpire, or was vitiated and rendered void by the arbitrators joining in it. Wallace, for the defendant, cited the case from Bulstrode, "where, (as he says,) Williams, Justice, says such an umpirage would be bad." The Court were unanimous and clear, that this was the umpirage of the umpire only. He was at liberty to take what advice, or opinion, or assessors, *he pleased. The Court add: "The case which was cited at the bar, is certainly a mistake, an error of the reporter. No such thing could be said, as is there reported; at least there could be no determination founded upon it. It is a distinction in words, without any real difference in sense and meaning." It is very clear, that this case did not intend to overrule the decision in Bulstrode; for it takes even stronger ground than is there assumed. But, it meant to shew the absurdity of the distinction attempted to be taken, between the case actually before the Court, and the case supposed in the dictum of Williams. It is a little curious, that Kyd, in his Treatise on Awards, has taken the dictum for the decision of the Court, and the actual decision for the dictum; and refers to this case in Burrows, as over-ruling, in effect, the case in Bulstrode. Kyd on Aw. 105.

In Underhill v. Van Cortlandt, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 339, the submission was to two persons, to value some mills, and other works; and if they could not agree, to choose an umpire. They chose the umpire before they went into the evidence, and all acted together. They were some days engaged, with the parties and witnesses before them; and finally, all three signed and sealed the award. One objection taken to it, was, that L. (the third man,) was chosen to assist the other two, and not as an umpire to decide, independently by himself, as he ought to have been, according to the intention of the covenant. In reply to this objection, the Chancellor considers that all parties having acquiesced in this appointment, and acted under it without objection, must be deemed to have concluded themselves, by their own free consent and agency, from setting up this objection to defeat the award. This reasoning applies strongly to our case. The umpire acted with the others from the first. The parties were before them by counsel; and their proceedings had all the form and publicity of a Court of Record. Exceptions are filed to their opinions on other points. Yet we find no objection made, *no exception taken, to the arbitrators and the umpire acting together. Would it not be unreasonable and unjust, to suffer the defendant, who had lain back, and taken the chance of a decision in his favor, to come forward as soon as he finds it against him, and urge an objection, open to him from the first; and which, in good faith, he ought to have taken (if at all) at the earliest stage of the business? To return to the New York case. The Chancellor further lays it down, that if the umpire ought to have been chosen, and to have acted strictly as an umpire, still the act is valid; for the association of the other two appraisers with him, in viewing the premises, in consultation, and in the award, does not vitiate the award by him as umpire; and he states it as settled by Soulsby v. Hodgson, (before cited) that if the arbitrators join in the umpirage, it does not vitiate it.

Lord Alvanley also, in Emery v. Ware, 5 Ves. 848, says, "An arbitrator may make use of the judgment of another, on whom he can depend, and the valuation of that person is his, if he chooses to adopt it."

I know that the decree of Chancellor Kent, in Underhill v. Van Cortlandt, was reversed by the Court of Error, 17 Johns. Rep. 405; but the reversal was wholly on other points; and Spencer, C. J. (with whom the majority of the Court agreed,) says, "The objection to the choice of an umpire, (if it were true, that the two persons first chosen had not differed in opinion,) is equally untenable. It is well settled, that arbitrators may nominate an umpire, before they proceed to the consideration of the subject submitted; and it is the fairest way of choosing an umpire." 2 Term. Rep. 644.

The latest case I have examined on this subject, is Beck v. Sargent, 4 Taunt. 232. That was a submission, "so that the two arbitrators should make their award, before or on the 21st of June; but, if no award made, before or on that day, then the parties should observe the award of an umpire, to be chosen by the arbitrators, so that such umpirage be made before the 28th of June." The arbitrators 281 *did not make their award, or choose an umpire, before or on the 21st of June; but chose one before the 28th; and the umpire, together with the arbitrators, before the 28th, made their joint award in the following terms: "We the undersigned, arbitrators and umpire, do award, &c." One of the objections taken to this award, was, "that the award of three is necessarily the award of a majority of them, who may happen to consist of the two arbitrators, in opposition to the umpire, and so no award of his; and at all events, it is not the award of the umpire alone." On this point, Mansfield, C. J. observes, "What the arbitrators do, in making the award, is nothing. The award is, in law, the award of the umpire alone. It is no more than if mere strangers had joined in the award, which could not vitiate." Heath, J. says, "It has been decided in very old cases, that the circumstance of another joining with the arbitrators in making an award, does not vitiate."

Thus, in the case before us, whether we consider this as the award of the arbitrators, joining Haskeu with them, either as umpire, or as a stranger; or, if we say that it is the umpirage of Haskeu, who has taken the arbitrators as his counsellors or assessors; quacunque via data, the award is good; and the judgment of the Court below must be affirmed.

282 *Garland v. Rives.

May, 1836.

Assignment for Benefit of Creditors—Provisions to Delay, etc.—Effect.—A creditor who takes a conveyance from his debtor, to secure his debt, but at the same time, inserts provisions in the deed, to delay, hinder, or defraud other creditors, comes within the Statute of Frauds, and the conveyance is void.

Same—Same—Same.—So, likewise, if the grantee be privy to a fraudulent intent on the part of the Assignment for Benefit of Creditors—Validity.—This subject has been discussed at length in this series of reports so that no attempt will be made here to go into the question. See foot-note to Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh 271; foot-note to Williamson v. Goodwyn, 9 Gratt. 508; foot-note to Gordon v. Townes, 10 Gratt. 518; monographic note on "Fraudulent and Voluntary Conveyances" appended to Cochran v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 348. On this subject the principal case is cited in Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh 294; Williamson v. Goodwyn, 9 Gratt. 506; Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Gratt. 156; Gordon v. Cannon, 18 Gratt. 424; Highland v. Highland, grantor, and takes a deed to secure his own debt, with provisions to delay, hinder, or defraud other creditors, the deed will be void, although his only motive was, to secure his own debt, and the other provisions were forced upon him by the grantor, as the only means of having his own debt secured. Such a grantee will not be considered as a bona fide purchaser.

Fraudulent Conveyances—Setting Aside—Notice to Grantee.—Under our Statute of Frauds, as well as the English Statute of 18th Eliz. a bona fide purchaser for value, having no notice of covin, fraud, collusion, &c. will be protected. To vitiate a conveyance, there must be a fraudulent design in the grantor, and notice of that design in the grantee.

Fraud—Concurrent Jurisdiction.—In cases of actual fraud, a Court of Equity has concurrent jurisdiction with a Court of Law, in remedying the fraud. In these cases, equity follows the law, and gives relief to the same extent as a Court of Law. And therefore, where a creditor comes into equity to set aside a conveyance tainted with actual fraud, and the grantee had notice of the fraud, the conveyance shall be set aside in toto.

Equity Maxims—"He Who Seeks Equity Must Do Equity"—Application.—The maxim of equity, that he who seeks equity must do it, only applies to an equity between the parties; but not to an equity which any third person may have against the plaintiff.

Chancery Practice—Enforcement of Judgment—Evidence.—Where a creditor, who claims under a judgment at law, comes into equity to enforce his judgment, that judgment is prima facie evidence against the debtor, or mere strangers; unless they can impeach it on the ground of fraud, or by shewing that a full defence was not made, and can produce new proof shewing that the debt is not due.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Staunton; where Rives filed his bill against Garland, Wingfield, Coleman and Lewis Nicholas, to set aside certain conveyances, on the ground of fraud. The whole history of these transactions is fully and minutely detailed in the first part of Judge Green's opinion, which follows. It will, therefore, only be necessary to give a statement of the points made in argument, and the authorities cited in support of them.

Randolph, Call, Leigh and Stanard, for the appellant.

Johnson, for the appellee.

283 *It was contended on the part of the appellant:

1. That Garland's debt was valid, and being assigned to Wingfield and Coleman, they occupied Garland's place, and paid valuable consideration for the mortgage on the land, by giving up Garland's note, to Lewis Nicholas. The subsequent sale

Fraudulent Conveyances—Setting Aside—Notice to Grantor.—In White v. Perry, 14 W. Va. 86, it is said: "In order to justify the setting aside of a conveyance, as fraudulent in part as to creditors, the fraud on the part of the grantor must not only be proven, but the grantee must be proven to be a party to such fraud, or cognizant of it; but when this is once satisfactorily established by evidence, whether direct or circumstantial, the deed must be declared void in toto, as to creditors, though some consideration may have been paid by the grantee. He must be not only a purchaser for valuable consideration, but he must be a bona fide purchaser, or his deed is invalid as to creditors of the grantor. See Garland v. Rives, 4 Rand. 282; STANARD, Judge, in Hunters v. Waite, 3 Gratt. 68." To vitiate a conveyance on the ground that it was made with intent to defraud the grantor's creditors, the grantee must have had notice of the grantor's intent. Hickman v. Trout, 83 Va. 491, 8 S. E. Rep. 181, citing the principal as its authority.

under the deed of trust was open and fair; and Wingfield and Coleman became the purchasers to the amount of their assigned claim.

2. The claim of Rives was usurious, and the judgment at law was no bar to an investigation of that claim in equity, because Garland was not a party to the suit at law. Besides, Rives is plaintiff in equity, and comes to enforce a judgment at law; in which case, the Court will not grant relief, unless ex æquo et bono, he ought to have it. 2 Madd. 408. Coop. Eq. Pl. 99. Morgan v. —, 1 Atk. 408. Johnson v. Northy, 2 Bern. 409. Baker v. Child. Ib. 226. Galbraith v. Nevil, 1 Doug. 5. Maze v. Hamilton, Call's MS. Rep. Wilson C. Nicholas's deposition ought to be received, because here there was an actual release, which distinguishes this case from that of Taylor v. Beck, 3 Rand. 316.

3. The conveyance to Wingfield and Coleman, and the subsequent purchase by them under the sale, were not only on valuable consideration, but they were bona fide. They were free from all the badges of fraud mentioned in Twyne's case.

4. But, admitting that the transaction was fraudulent as to Lewis Nicholas, and Wingfield and Coleman, still the deed to Garland cannot be impeached.

Upon general principles of equity, whoever goes into a Court of Equity for relief, must do equity before he can obtain it. A plaintiff in equity is always required to perform this condition; especially where the defendant is fortified with the legal estate. That Garland was a fair creditor, is unquestionable. He has obtained the legal estate; and Rives, another creditor, having no better claims, seeks to displace Garland. Will a Court of Equity 284 sanction such "an attempt? Certainly not. They will only exercise their accustomed jurisdiction, in giving satisfaction to Garland first, and to Rives afterwards, if any surplus should remain. It will not avail Rives to say, that the conveyance to Garland was fraudulent, and therefore ought not to be regarded in equity; for, the rule of equity is not founded on the soundness of the legal title, but simply on the fact that the defendant has obtained it. This is proved by Sir John Fagg's case, cited 1 Vern. 52, where the deed was obtained by robbery, and yet the Court of Equity allowed that title to protect the defendant. So, where a judgment is set aside as fraudulent, equity will not relieve, unless a bona fide debt due to the defendant, is first satisfied. The same point is decided in 2 Ch. Cas. 23, cited in Francis's Maxims, 66. Whatever may have been the demerits of Wingfield and Coleman, Garland cannot be accused of any fraudulent design. He could not derive any benefit from the provisions in the deed, which were calculated to secure the property to the other defendants. These were dictated by those who were to receive benefit from them, and Garland was rather the victim than the accomplice of their acts. His only object was to secure a just debt; all beyond this was extorted from him by Wingfield and Coleman.

Notice of the fraud of Wingfield and Coleman, will not render the deed from them to Garland, void. The proviso of the Statute of 13 Eliz. expressly speaks of persons, "not having notice," but our Statute has no such clause; and therefore, no such condition is necessary, to exempt a party from the operation of the Statute. The case of Wilson v. Wormal, Godb. 161, cited in Twyne's case, and in 13 Vin. Arb. 521, is no authority in this case, because the Court were divided, and it was a case where there was a trust for the grantor. But, Barwell v. Ward, 1 Atk. 260, is in favor of the appellant; for the property was permitted to stand as a security for what was justly due. A deed fraudulent at law in part, will not be totally set 285 aside in equity. Taylor v. Blantern, Gilm. 209. Murray v. Riggs, 15 Johns. 571. A Court of Chancery cannot be called on to enforce actively the penal sanctions of a Statute. The case of usury is an illustration of this principle. Smith v. —, 1 Prec. in Ch. 80. The cases where the opposite principle prevails, are such as have one or more of these features; 1. Where the conveyance is purely voluntary; 2. Where there is a trust for the debtor, as in Twyne's case; or, 3. Where the deed is covinous in its concoction, as in Sands v. Codwiae. There, the whole deed was made subservient to the fraudulent design; 4. Where value is given, but it controuls the superior right of the party complaining; as where there has been a sequestration in a Court of Equity, a purchase by a creditor would be void. The cases of Hill v. Claiborne, 1 Wash. 185. Wright v. Hancock, 3 Munf. 521; and Bullock v. Irvine, 4 Munf. 450, may be referred to this principle.

For the appellee, it was said, that the Court could not re-examine the question of usury, which had been fully tried at law, and must therefore be conclusive on all other Courts. All Lewis Nicholas's property was completely vested in the Sheriff, whether it was mentioned in the schedule or not: and Rives comes into a Court of equity, only to remove the obstructions to the legal title. He only wishes to assist the judgment at law. Under these circumstances, it would be a departure from the main object of the suit, to make enquiry into the foundation of the original judgment. The passage from Coop. Eq. Pl. 99, founded on the case of Morgan v. — 1 Atk. 408, which has been cited, does not afford any support to the position taken on the other side. That case depended on something peculiar in the Court of Wales; and in Walker v. Wilter, Doug. 5, and note 2, to the same case, it is said by Lord Mansfield, that the decisions of the Court of Wales were clearly examinable; resting the whole force of that

286 case, on some peculiarity in that Court. It was considered as a foreign Court. As to the case of Baker v. Child, 2 Vern. 226, it merely proves, that a Court will look into their own decrees, when interlocutory; but, they will not examine new evidence. The case of Johnson v. Northy, 2 Vern. 409, proves this distinction. The case of Maze v. Hamilton, Call's

MS. Rep. does not decide this point. The Court of Appeals did not correct the judgment of the General Court; but, they interpreted that judgment differently from the Chancellor. They, in fact, executed the judgment of the General Court, according to its legal import. The case in 1 Equ. Cas. Abr. M. p. 82, 83, and Scott v. Nisbett, 2 Bro. Ch. Rep. sustain the position. But, this is a case, where the very question has been fully tried, and decided at law. It is not the case of a fraudulent judgment, or one which is a security for an usurious contract. The cases in which a judgment is conclusive, or not, may be found in 1 Phill. Evid. 223, 226, and Moses v. M'Farlane, 2 Burr. 1009.

(Call, here interrupted Johnson, and said, that the judgment was not an estoppel, unless it was on the very point; and that Rives had let loose the estoppel, by relying upon other matter. A Court of Law will take no notice of a decree in equity; and e converso, a Court of Equity will not respect a judgment at law. Hooe v. Pierce, 1 Wash. 212, shews, that the decree of a domestic Court of Admiralty is not conclusive upon persons not parties to the suit.)

To these observations, it was replied, that it was true the estoppel must cover the very point, but that point need not be stated in the judgment. If this were not true, the action of indebitatus assumpsit would be of very little value. In that action, the issue includes many subjects, some of which may be found by the verdict, others not. The judgment does not shew which subjects are recovered and which omitted. The only way then to give the judgment any validity, as a bar to any future action, is to prove by the verdict, to what subjects the judgment applies. Section *v. Tutop, 6 Term Rep. 607. The estoppel is not let loose. Rives does not put usury in issue in the bill; but mentions it as a matter of history, to shew the fraudulent nature of the transaction.

But, if we are at liberty to question the judgment of the Court of Albemarle, what is the ground? That Wilson C. Nicholas's deposition was rejected. But this is a question, not for a Court of Equity, but a Court of Law. The point was excepted to, and there could be no reason for not deciding it at law. Taylor v. Beck, 3 Rand. 316, is conclusive on this point; because W. C. Nicholas, was a joint defendant with Lewis Nicholas.

But, if all the evidence was admitted, it would prove, that Rives's claim was not usurious; and, even if it were, Rives must receive his principal, with lawful interest.

These preliminary objections being removed, the main question comes on, whether the transaction was fraudulent and void. This question is a mixed question of fact and law.

As to the fact, there is express evidence of fraud intended by L. Nicholas, to defeat his creditors. Admit that Garland was a fair creditor, and that Lewis Nicholas was sincerely desirous to secure him; still the conveyance was not made directly to Garland, but to Wingfield and Coleman, who extorted great indulgence from Garland. This indirection is strong evidence of fraud. Wingfield and Coleman were closely connected with L. Nicholas. The deed of trust to them, was of all his property, real and personal, to be sold on ten days notice. The sale was for cash. Garland relinquished a large part of his debt, and granted ten years indulgence, without interest. The case, therefore, exhibits some of the strong features of fraud, mentioned in Twyne's case. It was both a sale pendente lite, and made to defeat a creditor.

The next question is, whether Garland's deed is void.

1. The deed would be void, even if taken by Garland, bona fide, and without notice of Wingfield and Coleman's 288 *fraud. If the deed of the latter was fraudulent, they could not convey a good title to Garland, upon common law principles. The question is between two innocent men, and the rule caveat emptor, applies.

How does the Statute affect the question? The 3d section of the Statute of Frauds, 1 Rev. Code, 373, exempts those persons, from the operation of the Act, to whom lands, &c. have been bona fide and lawfully conveyed, &c. This last expression applies as well to the party conveying, as to the party receiving the conveyance. It therefore requires bona fides in the grantor, as well as in the grantee, to save the conveyance from the operation of the Statute. The words "having no notice," which are found in the 13th Eliz. are, it is true, omitted in our Statute; but these words in the English Statute, apply only to a voluntary conveyance, where there is no other evidence of fraud. They are merely from abundant caution, and have no legal operation, as the same consequence would follow from common law principles. Sheph. Touchst. 66. Hildreth v. Sands, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 42, shew, that fraud in the grantor, will vitiate a deed in the hands of a purchaser, without notice. The case of Astor v. Wells, 4 Wheaton, 466, was decided under the peculiar law of the State of Ohio. The deed was unrecorded, and a different decision would have repealed the Registry Act. Estwick v. Callaud, 5 Term Rep. 426, supports the distinction between voluntary conveyances, and those made with fraudulent intent.

But, Garland's deed has no valuable consideration. His debt was not due for ten years. He purchased of Wingfield and Coleman, not of Lewis Nicholas. He was a purchaser with full notice of the fraud between L. Nicholas, and Wingfield, and Coleman; and his deed was made on the very day of sale. He does not even deny notice. He was a party to the whole fraud.

The next question is, how far is the deed of Garland to be vacated? The claim of Garland, is tainted with usury. 289 *as appears from his answers. But, if the conveyance from Wingfield and Coleman to Garland, is vicious in part, Garland, having notice of that vice, his whole interest will be forfeited. This would be the effect at law, as is proved by Twyne's case, Cadogan v. Kennet, and Eastwick v. Calland. If it is void in law, it cannot be good in part, and bad in part, in equity. 13 Vin. Abr. 521. "Fraud," F. pl. 12. Pob. on Fr. Conv. 547. The case of Barwell v. Ward, 1 Atk. 260, must be referred to the principle, that the fraud was doubtful, and therefore, the conveyance was not set aside in toto; but, Boyd v. Dunlap, 1 Johns. Ch. Cases, 478, proves, that where the fraud is apparent, a Court of Equity will set aside the conveyance entirely. To the same effect, are the cases of Sands v. Codwise, 4 Johns. Ch. Rep. 598. Claiborne v. Hill, 1 Wash. 185. Wright v. Hancock, 3 Munf. 521, and Bullock v. Irvine, 4 Munf. 450.

May 29. JUDGE GREEN delivered his opinion.

The original bill in this case was filed by the appellee, a creditor of Lewis Nicholas, for the purpose of setting aside a conveyance of land, made by the debtor to John H. Coleman; another made to Charles Wingfield, and the said Coleman; and also, a transfer of personal property, made by Nicholas to Wingfield and Coleman; and a conveyance of land, made by the latter to Edward Garland; as being fraudulent and void as to him. A chronological review of the transactions brought in question, will best explain their nature.

On the 12th of November, 1818, Wilson Cary Nicholas purchased of the appellee a sterling bill of exchange, for 3000l. in consideration of which, he gave him his note, endorsed by Lewis Nicholas, for $16,046, payable on the first of January, 1820, with interest from the first of December, 1818. A suit was instituted on this note, against Wilson C. Nicholas and Lewis Nicholas, in February, 290 *1820. The defendants, in June, 1820, pleaded severally, and rested their defence upon the ground, that the transaction between Wilson C. Nicholas and Rives, was usurious. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff against Lewis Nicholas, in August, 1821; Wilson C. Nicholas having departed this life during the pendency of the suit. Lewis Nicholas was taken upon a Ca. Sa. issued upon this judgment, took the oath of an insolvent debtor, on the 21st of August, 1821, and was discharged. In his schedule, he stated that he had "no property of any description whatsoever."

Pending this suit, and on the 16th of May, 1820, John H. Coleman intermarried with a daughter of Lewis Nicholas; and on the first day of June, the latter conveyed to the former 384½ acres of land, part of a larger tract, on which Lewis Nicholas resided, and six slaves, professedly in consideration of an agreement made between them, before and in consideration of the marriage. This deed was recorded in November, 1820, and is one of the deeds impeached.

Lewis Nicholas being bound as endorser for a debt of $6,991 84, due from Wilson C. Nicholas to the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, on the 9th of August, 1820, conveyed 22 negroes in trust, to secure the payment of this debt to the Bank, on the 1st of June, 1827, with interest thereon, payable annually from the 27th of July, 1820. This deed was duly recorded, and is not questioned.

Edward Garland also held a negotiable note of Wilson C. Nicholas, endorsed by Lewis Nicholas, dated July 23, 1819, payable 30 days after date, for $13,800. These three debts, together with one due to Saunders, upon a note of Wilson C. Nicholas indorsed by Lewis Nicholas, for about $7,000, and which was in suit against Lewis Nicholas, before the arrangements hereafter mentioned were entered into, were the only debts of any consequence, due by Lewis Nicholas. And he states, that he never voluntarily engaged for these debts, except that to the Bank: that 291 *Wilson C. Nicholas being entrusted by him with his endorsements in blank, for the purpose of continuing the note endorsed by him at Bank, had filled them up, and delivered them to Rives, Garland and Saunders; without his knowledge or consent.

Garland, having in vain endeavoured to get a security from Wilson C. Nicholas for his debt, forwarded the note which he held to an attorney, (Mr. Dyer,) with instructions to bring suit upon it, expressing, at the same time, a wish to have the debt secured without litigation, and authorising the attorney to make any arrangements to that effect. A writ was ordered on this note, on the 23d of December, 1820, but never issued, in consequence of the arrangement afterwards made. In pursuance of Garland's instructions, his attorney entered into negotiations with Lewis Nicholas, and the latter expressed a willingness to secure the debt; but before any thing was done, it was proposed by Wingfield and Coleman, the sons-in-law of Lewis Nicholas, that if Garland would make a considerable discount, (the amount of which was communicated to Garland by his attorney,) they would purchase his debt, and give their own bond for the amount to be paid to him. Garland's attorney communicated this proposition to him, and informed him, "that it was understood, that Lewis Nicholas intended to sell all his property at public auction, and was willing to secure Wingfield and Coleman, as the owners of Garland's debt; and it was also understood, that Wingfield and Coleman intended to bid at the sale, to the amount of the said debt; and it was further proposed by Wingfield and Coleman, more effectually to secure the amount to be paid to Garland, by incumbering, for that purpose, any property which they might purchase at the sale." The attorney was unwilling to accede to the terms proposed, without Garland's sanction in person, and wrote to him, requesting him to go to Albemarle, that he might be consulted on the subject. Garland went to Albemarle, and after much hesitation, on account of the heavy discount required, 292 *at length, fearing that Rives might get a priority over him, and that he might lose his debt entirely, "he determined to accede to the proposition made by Wingfield and Coleman, and accordingly passed his debt to them, and took their bond for $13,000," payable to him ten years after date, without interest; "and after the transfer was made, Lewis Nicholas executed a deed of trust conveying certain lands, slaves, and other personal property, to secure the debt so transferred to Wingfield and Coleman." These statements are taken from Garland's answer, and correspond with the answers of the other parties.

These arrangements were made on the 18th day of January, 1821. That is stated to be the date of the bond to Garland for $13,000, said to be given by Wingfield and Coleman, in their deed of trustees for Garland, of the 15th of February, 1821, hereafter to be noticed; and that is the date of the deed of trust, given by Lewis Nicholas to trustees for Wingfield and Coleman, spoken of in Garland's answer. Garland was privy to the terms of this last mentioned deed; as was Dyer, his attorney. Garland's answer admits the first, and Dyer, with Harris, the attorney of Lewis Nicholas, and Wingfield and Coleman, are subscribing witnesses to the deed. The original deed exhibited by Wingfield and Coleman, is here by subpoena duces tecum, and it appears to me, by inspection, that Dyer wrote about one half of the deed, from the beginning down to the description of the land conveyed, and Harris the remainder.

The particulars of this deed, (although it is not recorded and cannot be relied upon as giving any title,) are material. The original deed, as it was executed, is between Lewis Nicholas of the one part, Wingfield and Coleman of the second part, and T. J. Randolph and C. Cocke of the third part; and recites, that "the said Lewis Nicholas is justly indebted to Edward Garland as endorser of a note drawn by Wilson C. Nicholas, bearing date the 23d day of July, 1819, negotiable and payable thirty days after its date, at 293 *the Bank of Virginia, for the sum of $18,300, and which said note, the said C. Wingfield and J. H. Coleman have fully discharged and paid to the said Edward Garland, on the part of the said Lewis Nicholas, and for which, the said Lewis Nicholas is desirous to secure and save them harmless." Since the execution of the deed, the words "on the part of the said Lewis Nicholas," and the word "for," and the words "and save," and the word "harmless," have been dashed out with a pen, but so as to leave them perfectly legible; and the other words, "the payment of," are interlined after the words "to the said Edward Garland." The word "to," has been inserted before the word "them;" so as to make the deed read as it is copied into the record. "And which note, the said Wingfield and Coleman have fully discharged and paid to the said Edward Garland, and the payment of which the said Lewis Nicholas is desirous to secure to them, the said Coleman and Wingfield." No note is made at the foot of the deed, of these interlineations and erasures, as made before signing or otherwise; whilst other interlineations in the deed, are noted as made before signing, and the witnesses subscribe under this note; a clear proof, that the erasures and interlineations above specified, were made after the deed was executed.

Neither Nicholas's note, nor Wingfield and Coleman's bond, are exhibited. We have not the written evidence which exists, as to what passed between Garland and Wingfield and Coleman, on this occasion. If we had this evidence, we might see whether Garland endorsed the note to Wingfield and Coleman; and if he did, whether it was specially endorsed, without recourse to him; or, whether their bond is unconditional or otherwise. I doubt whether the note was really sold to Wingfield and Coleman. The deed, in its original form, declared that they had paid it to Garland, on the part of Lewis Nicholas; and, that it was intended only to secure and save them harmless; a stipulation perfectly proper, if *they gave their bond for $13,000, payable in ten years, without interest; not for the purchase of the debt for themselves, but in satisfaction of the debt on the part of Lewis Nicholas; in which case, they could only have claimed an indemnity against this responsibility. Such a stipulation would have been, in no manner, adapted to the case, if they had purchased the debt for themselves. However this may be, I shall consider the case as if the debt were really sold and transferred, as stated by the parties.

The deed proceeds, in consideration of one dollar paid by Wingfield and Coleman to Lewis Nicholas, to convey to them the lands on which he resided, containing 2100 acres, more or less, five negroes by name, (this was the residue of Lewis Nicholas's land and negroes, after taking out the land and negroes conveyed to Coleman, and the negroes conveyed in trust for securing the debt to the Bank,) and also, his equity of redemption in the slaves conveyed to secure the debt to the Bank, his stock of horses, cattle, hogs and sheep, all his plantation utensils, household and kitchen furniture, all the meat on hand, all his beds, bed clothes, and furniture of every description, a four wheel carriage, a wagon and two carts, and the crops of grain on hand, and what may be made hereafter: to have and to hold to Randolph and Cocke, in use and trust for Wingfield and Coleman and their heirs for ever; with authority to Randolph and Cocke to sell the whole of the land and other property for cash, after ten days notice of the time and place of sale, by advertising the same at the door of the court-house of Albemarle county, and out of the proceeds of sale, after paying expenses, to pay the said note, interest and costs, and the balance, if any, to Lewis Nicholas.

In the Enquirer of January 25th, 1821, an advertisement appeared under date of January 20th, and with the signature of Lewis Nicholas, notifying that on the 15th day of February, 1821, he would sell, on the premises, for cash or on a short credit, as he might choose on the day of 295 *sale, his tract of land of 2141 acres, his horses, cattle, household and kitchen furniture; also, all the other property which he owned. No slaves are mentioned in this advertisement; although

Lewis Nicholas owned, and professed to sell on the day of sale, the slaves mentioned in the deed of trust of January 18th, besides those conveyed in trust to secure the Bank debt, and those before conveyed to Coleman.

On the 15th of February, 1821, the sale was made professedly for cash, and Wingfield and Coleman were the purchasers of all the property sold that day, save one horse purchased by Omohundro; and the next day, they purchased the residue of the personal property, down to a set of razors, old case and brush, whether at public or private sale, does not appear; and Lewis Nicholas gave them a certificate under his hand and seal, at the foot of a schedule of the articles professed to be sold, that he claimed no right or title in any of the property, nor any control over it. This is dated February 26th, 1821. The amount of the sales to Wingfield and Coleman, was $12,946 30 cents. There was no competition in the biddings, except in the purchase of the horse by Omohundro, and Wingfield and Coleman bid against each other for the land. The general impression, amongst those who attended the sale, was, that it was a mere contrivance to protect Lewis Nicholas's property from Rives's claim; and Wingfield and Coleman, (who, as long as the amount of their purchases kept within the amount of their claim, had no motive to bid low, so that their claim covered the whole property,) might obviously have bid what they pleased; and, indeed, without frustrating their object, bid against each other. Accordingly, the property sold for little more than half its cash value, if indeed so much as that.

To see this sacrifice of the personal property, it is only necessary to inspect the list of sales, and compare it, as to some of the items, with the evidence. Oats in the straw sold at 5 cents a hundred, and 296 fodder at $6\frac{1}{4}$ cents a hundred. *This very property, for which Wingfield and Coleman gave \$2,946 30 cents, sold afterwards, under the decree of the Court, for \$5,576 69 cents, cash. This is the amount of the Marshal's sales, after deducting the sales of tobacco and wheat. The sale by the Marshal was on the 21st of August, when there was a much smaller quantity of corn on hand, than at the time of the sale by Lewis Nicholas on the 15th of February. The price of the land, \$10,000, was inadequate in the same ratio. The whole tract was sold together. I think that the evidence, consisting of the opinions of witnesses, shews satisfactorily, that the land was then worth, in cash, at least \$8 per acre; which would amount to upwards of \$17,000; and upon the usual credits of one, two, and three years, at least \$10 per acre; which would amount to upwards of \$21,000. But, there is more decisive evidence of its value, than the opinions of the witnesses. Jesse Jopling testifies, that pending Rives's suit, Lewis Nicholas applied to him to be his security, upon an appeal, if the suit went against him; and offered to give him a deed of trust upon his land, continuing, as he said, about 2000 acres, which Lewis Nicholas considered as a good indemnity against the debt, interest, damage and costs, which could not have amounted to less than \$20,000; in which opinion, Jopling concurred, and agreed to become his surety, if the appeal was taken; and on the day that Wingfield and Coleman purchased the land, they pledged it, and Garland accepted it as an ample security for \$13,000. These circumstances shew sufficiently the opinions of the parties concerned, as to the value of the land.

The negroes conveyed to Coleman in June, 1820, were exposed to sale in mass, on this occasion, as the property of Lewis Nicholas, with Coleman's consent, upon the advice of counsel that he had no title; and the land conveyed to him was conveyed with the residue of the tract to him and Wingfield, as if sold to them at this sale.

297 *On the 15th of February, 1821, the land was conveyed by Lewis Nicholas to Wingfield and Coleman; and on the same day, they conveyed the 2141 acres (the residue of the tract, excepting what had been conveyed in June, 1820, to Coleman) to Coles and Cocke, in trust to secure the payment of their bond to Garland, for $13,000, dated January 18th, 1821, and payable ten years after date, without interest. These deeds were acknowledged before magistrates, and the privy examination of the wives of Wingfield and Coleman, taken on the same day, and recorded on the next day. In anticipation of the results of this sale, and according to the previous arrangements between the parties, these deeds were prepared before the day of sale, and arrangements made with persons, who had agreed to act as trustees in the deed, to secure Garland's debt, and the attorney for Garland attended on the day of sale, to have the deed executed. This appears from the deed of trust, and the answer of Coles, one of the trustees. After the deed was written certain interlineations were noted, as made before signing; and at the foot of this note, the usual clause of attestation was written; and below this clause, these words are written: "The names of the trustees also changed before signing." The time and reason of this change appear from Coles's answer. He says, "that when the sale had nearly closed, he was applied to by one of the persons who seemed most active, and, he presumes, was one of the legal advisers present, to become trustee to secure the payment of the bond, due from Wingfield and Coleman to Garland, by a lien on the land that was late Nicholas's: that he declined acting, under the general impression that he wished to have no part in the transactions of the day. But, being strongly urged on the ground that one of the parties that had consented to act, had, by some means, been prevented attending; and that they would find some difficulty in getting a fit person as his substitute; losing sight of the original impression, and being solely actuated by a wish to serve neighbours, he be-298 came a party." The *other trustee, Cocke, states that the counsel on both sides attended the sale, and that his confidence in them, induced him to agree to act as trustee.

Wingfield and Coleman filed a cross bill, impeaching Rives's claim as usurious. The Court of Chancery decreed all the conveyances to be fraudulent and void as to Rives, and that his judgment was valid and unimpeachable; and Garland alone appealed. The only question, therefore, for this Court to decide, is, whether Garland's lien be valid or void as it respects Rives; whether Rives's judgment can be impeached in this way; and if it can, whether it is infected with usury, or not.

As to the conveyance in consideration of a pretended marriage contract, it may be observed, that there is not a shadow of doubt as to the propriety of the decree. There was no such contract; nor does Coleman, in his answer, allege that there was. The whole case in truth was, that Lewis Nicholas had frequently, in conversation with his neighbours, said that he should make his children equal, and that the law made the best will. Coleman had heard of these declarations, and Lewis Nicholas had advanced his daughter, Mrs. Wingfield, upon her marriage.

It is impossible to look at the particulars of these transactions, without a conviction, amounting to absolute certainty, that on the part of Wingfield, and Coleman, and Lewis Nicholas, the motive, under which it is attempted to cover and protect these transactions (the preferring a just creditor, and securing the payment of a just debt,) had not the weight of a feather with them: that their sole motive for dealing with that debt as they did, was to enable them by means of it, to prevent Rives, and perhaps Saunders, who were prosecuting their suits, from getting satisfaction to the amount of a cent, out of the property of Lewis Nicholas; and at the same time, to secure to Wingfield and Coleman, the sons-in-law of Nicholas, his whole property, except the slaves pledged to the Bank, at about half its value, upon a credit of 299 ten years, without interest; *and indeed, without, in all probability, paying ultimately one cent out of their own funds. For, having a right to the 22 valuable labouring slaves, pledged to the Bank, for upwards of six years, charged only with the payment of the interest on the Bank debt, of $420 per annum, they might reasonably expect to raise the $10,300, or very nearly the whole, from the profits of the property, in the course of the ten years. Wingfield and Coleman could not possibly have any motive for preferring the debt to Garland, independently of the views which I have attributed to them. They were under no legal or moral obligation to pay it, or to take any care about its payment. They were not bona fide purchasers nor creditors seeking to avoid a loss. The question was not with them, de damno evitando, but emphatically de lucro capiendo. Nicholas, although under a legal, was under no moral, obligation, to pay this debt. He was only a surety, and that, not voluntarily. The obligation was imposed on him by the fraudulent use of the note to another purpose, than that for which he endorsed it. Garland was willing to have given Nicholas the same terms which he gave to Wingfield and Coleman, and to have taken a direct and fair lien upon his property. To have acceded to those terms, would have looked like a preference of one creditor to another; and that, upon reasonable and intelligible motives. But, the rejection of the great advantages of these terms, and preferring to subject his property to a cash sale, for the whole amount of the debt and interest; giving to his sons-in-law the advantage of the discount and credit, instead of taking it himself; the struggling to reduce Garland to the lowest terms, not for the benefit of Nicholas, but of his sons-in-law; and the whole dealing of the parties in respect to this debt, and the use made of it; shew that the preferring of Garland's debt did not enter into the motives of these parties; and that the only motives which actuated them, were those before stated. As to these parties, it is a case of pure and unmixed fraud. If we were called upon, 300 in "any other character than that in which we are acting, to judge of their conduct, great allowances might very properly be made. A highly respectable man, advanced in years, in affluent circumstances, having a family brought up in ease, is suddenly involved in utter ruin, not by his own misconduct, but as the surety of a friend who had betrayed his confidence, and who, he believed, had been forced by his necessities into the hand of usurers, resorts to means advised as legal by respectable but mistaken counsel, to save a remnant of his property; and the members of his family unite with him in those measures. We cannot see such a case without great pain, nor condemn the actors with severity. But, such considerations cannot enter into any system of laws, nor be the foundation of any right, legal or equitable.

As to Garland, I have not a shadow of doubt, that, as he states in his answer, his only motive for taking the part which he did in these transactions, was to secure as much of his debt as, by any means, he could under existing circumstances; and that he would have preferred a direct security from Lewis Nicholas, to the course which was taken; and which he yielded to from necessity, as the only means of securing any thing; although he knew the purpose for which these arrangements were proposed by Lewis Nicholas and Wingfield and Coleman. When Lewis Nicholas declined to give a direct security, and Wingfield and Coleman made their propositions, a full outline of their scheme, and the use they intended to make of his debt, was communicated to him. If this did not, at the first blush, satisfy him that their design was to make a fraudulent use of it against Nicholas's creditors, he ought to have been convinced upon that point, when he and his counsel, on the 18th of January, 1821, were apprised of the terms of the deed of that date, which provided for the sale of Nicholas's entire property for cash, upon ten days notice, by advertisement at the court-house door only, to indemnify Wingfield and Coleman to the amount of 301 the whole "debt, for giving their bond for a part of the debt, payable ten years after without interest; and if that was not sufficient to apprise him of their real intentions, his agent and counsel had full notice of the true object of all these arrangements, when, on the 15th of February, the whole scheme was completely consummated. Garland, if not a participator in the fraud, had at least full notice of it; and if not in all its stages, yet certainly before the execution of the deed under which he claims.

It could hardly be contended in a Court of Law, that this conveyance to Wingfield and Coleman, was not fraudulent and void as to the creditors of Lewis Nicholas. The Statute of Frauds, avoids all conveyances contrived of covin, malice, fraud, collusion or guile, with intent or purpose to delay, hinder or defraud creditors; except in cases where, though the grantor has a fraudulent intent, the purchaser acts bona fide, and gives a valuable consideration. Without the bona fides on the part of the grantee, the valuable consideration has no effect in rescuing the transaction from the literal terms and spirit of the Statute. If Wingfield and Coleman could be considered as bona fide creditors for $13,000, and had aimed only at securing or getting payment of the debt, they would have been protected by the proviso of the Statute, no matter what had been the fraudulent intent of the grantor. But, the moment they passed this line, and mixed with this object, that of delaying, hindering, or defrauding creditors, any conveyance made in furtherance of this compound object, was absolutely void, and they were left (as they were before they attempted the fraud) creditors without a security. "Quod alias justum et bonum est, si per fraudem petatur, malum et injustum efficitur." One and the chief object with them, if not the sole motive for the part they acted in these transactions, was, by covin with Lewis Nicholas, to delay, hinder and defraud all his creditors, except Garland.

302 *But, it is insisted, that Garland being a bona fide creditor, and having taken a security from Wingfield and Coleman on the property conveyed to them by Lewis Nicholas, for the debt really due, he falls within the exception of the Statute of Frauds, being a bona fide purchaser for value; and that, although the conveyance to Wingfield and Coleman, was fraudulent and void. The construction of this proviso, has been much discussed, and many cases upon that point, have been cited. A careful attention to the terms of the Statute, and a comparison of it with the Statutes of 13th and 27th of Elizabeth, will, I think, without a particular examination of the authorities cited, satisfy us as to its true construction.

The Statute of 13 Eliz. against fraudulent conveyances as to creditors, has this proviso; "that this Act, nor any thing therein contained, shall not extend to make void any estate or conveyance, &c. had, made, &c. or hereafter to be had, made, &c. which estate or interest, is or shall be upon good consideration and bona fide lawfully conveyed or assured to any person or persons, &c. not having, at the time of such conveyance or assurance to them made, any manner of notice, or knowledge of such covin, fraud or collusion as aforesaid."

The Statute of 27 Eliz. for securing subsequent purchasers against conveyances intended to defraud them, had a proviso to the same effect as the above stated proviso of the 13th Eliz. except that the words in italics, at the close of the proviso of the 13th Eliz. as above quoted, were omitted in the proviso of the 27th Eliz. The reason of this difference in the terms of the provisos of these Statutes, is obvious. If a conveyance were intended to defraud subsequent purchasers, that intent could not possibly be known to have existed, until a sale was actually made by the vendor to a subsequent purchaser; and if a purchaser for valuable consideration, procured a conveyance from the fraudulent grantee before any other made a purchase from the fraudulent grantor, then, at the time 303 of the purchase from the *fraudulent grantee, the purchaser could not only not have notice of any fraudulent intent in the original grantor, but could not do an injury to any one; as no one had an interest in the subject, who could object to his purchase. Such a purchase for value would be bona fide; and the purchaser would be entitled against any subsequent grantee from the fraudulent grantor; although he had notice that the conveyance to his grantee was voluntary. This was a necessary provision; otherwise, all voluntary gifts would have been inalienable, at least during the life of the grantor; and such purchases from the fraudulent grantee have always been supported against subsequent purchasers from the fraudulent grantor. These are the expressions in the books; though it is clear, that until the grantor sold to a purchaser, neither he nor the grantee could be guilty of any fraud, as to subsequent purchasers; and it might happen, that there never would be such subsequent purchaser.

But, as to fraudulent conveyances, to the prejudice of creditors, they were immediately void as to such creditors; and but for the proviso, the enacting clause might have avoided the deed made with intent to defraud creditors, although that intent was confined to the grantor only, and was not known to the grantee. I do not, however, think that this would have been the effect, even of the enacting clause alone. The expression "collusive," can apply only to cases, in which both parties concurred in the fraudulent intent. However that might be, if the grantor and grantee had colluded to defraud creditors, the conveyance would be absolutely void as to creditors; and the fraudulent grantee could not, but for the proviso, have transferred any title to a bona fide purchaser from him. Nemo potest transferre plus juris in alium quam ipse habet; and to guard against this consequence, was, I think, the chief object of the proviso. It provides for the validity of a conveyance to a bona fide purchaser for value, having no notice of the covin, fraud, collusion or guile; such covin 304 or *collusion, of which the purchaser was to have no notice, must, if it existed, have been between the original grantor and grantee. In case of a voluntary grant, considered as fraudulent as to a subsequent purchaser, because voluntary, the purchaser from the donee, having notice that the deed was voluntary, would not, thereby, have notice of a fraud, as there could exist no fraud until there was a subsequent purchaser, which might never happen; and the Statute of the 27th Eliz. therefore dropped the expression in respect to purchasers without notice, found in the Statute of 13 Eliz.

Notice to the purchaser from the fraudulent grantee of property conveyed with intent to defraud creditors, was important. Such a purchase, with notice of the fraudulent intent, would be a fraud; because, it would tend to assist the consummation of the fraud, in prejudice of the known existing rights of creditors, who, but for such purchase, would be enabled to reach the property fraudulently conveyed. It was for this reason, that the proviso of the 13th Eliz. excluded from its benefit, purchasers with notice of the fraud, expressly; although the effect of the proviso would have been the same, if this special provision, as to purchasers without notice, had been omitted. The former member of the proviso had only preserved the interests of bona fide purchasers for value; and a purchaser, with notice of the fraud, would not have been a bona fide purchaser, and so not within the proviso. This, I think, is the reason why the Legislature of Virginia, in transferring the substance of the two English Statutes into our Statute of Frauds and Perjuries, had adopted the substance of the provisos of both the English Statutes, omitting that part of the proviso of the 13th Eliz. which speaks of purchasers without notice, as superfluous in the case of creditors, and improper in the case of subsequent purchasers. The proviso of our Statute is in these words: "This Act shall not extend to any estate or interest in any lands, &c. goods, &c.

305 which shall be, on good consideration and bona fide, lawfully conveyed or assured to any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate." The bona fides required by this proviso, to exempt the conveyance from the operation of the Statute, seems, in its literal import, to be required from both the grantor and grantee; and this was insisted on by the counsel for the appellee, as the true construction of the Statute. The same words were used in the Statute of the 13th Elizabeth; yet, their generality was controlled by the subsequent words, in respect to purchasers without notice; according to which, the purchaser was protected, if he had not notice of the fraud of his own grantor; so that the bona fides was required only of the purchaser. And this last, I think, is the just construction of our Statute, which dropped the explanatory words to be found in the English Statute; because, as was before said, they had really no effect, in case of a purchaser under a conveyance to defraud creditors; and were wholly inapplicable, if not improper, in respect to that provision of our Statute taken from the 27th Eliz. in relation to conveyances intended to defraud purchasers.

Considering Garland then, as he really was, from the moment he assigned Lewis Nicholas's debt to Wingfield and Coleman, and took their bond, as no longer a creditor of Lewis Nicholas, but of Wingfield and Coleman, and as being a purchaser from them, for the security of their debt to him; and, as having, as he really had, full notice of the fraud, and of the invalidity of their title; he could, upon general principles of equity, acquire no better right than they had; and upon the terms of the Statute, cannot be protected as a bona fide purchaser. He stands, to all intents and purposes, in their shoes.

Suppose, however, that to avoid the consequences of Garland's claiming, as he does, as a purchaser from Wingfield and Coleman, for securing a debt due from them to him, with full knowledge that they had no title as against Nicholas's creditors, we were, as it is contended we ought, to consider him as still virtually a creditor of Nicholas, *and virtually claiming as a purchaser from him, for the security of a just debt; what would be the effect? Certainly, no more favorable to Garland than if, on the 18th day of January, (when all those indirect arrangements were made with his knowledge, and, so far as he was concerned, with his assent and concurrence) a direct lien had been given by Nicholas to Garland instead of Wingfield and Coleman, with an agreement between the parties, intended to have the very same consequences, which the arrangements actually made were intended to produce, and did effect. That agreement would have been this: that Garland should release a part of his debt, and give a credit of ten years, without interest, for the payment of the balance: that, notwithstanding this abatement and credit, he should take a deed of trust, falsely representing the whole debt to be due and immediately payable, subjecting the whole of Nicholas's property, down to the last mouthful of meat and bread, to immediate sale for cash, upon ten days notice at the courthouse door only: that at this sale, Wingfield and Coleman should purchase to the nominal amount of the debt, and discharge the portion of the debt agreed to be paid at the end of ten years without interest: that this sale should be made immediately, to avoid the effect of the lien of Rives's judgment, expected to be rendered in the first week in the succeeding March; and suppose this agreement were carried into effect, the sale made, the whole property purchased by Wingfield and Coleman at about half its cash value, and that, in effect, upon a credit of ten years; and Garland to have retained the lien on the land given to him by Nicholas, claiming under it only the sum agreed to be paid at the end of the ten years. In that case, the parties would all have been substantially, in the condition in which they now are: Nicholas without property; Wingfield and Coleman claiming all that was his, subject to a lien on the land for $13,000, payable in ten years' without interest; and Garland claiming a lien for the same debt, and upon the same property, as he now claims; with this only difference, 307 *that he would, in that case, claim under a deed from Nicholas, who had a title to convey, instead of claiming under Wingfield and Coleman, who have no title, and could convey none to him. In such a case, the fraud of Nicholas and Wingfield and Coleman would have been just as palpable, and no more so, than it is in the case which has occurred; and Garland would not only have had the same notice of, but would have been a direct actor and participator in, the fraud, a party to the covin and collusion, and could not be held to be a bona fide purchaser under the proviso of the Statute. In any point of view in which I can consider this case, I see no ground upon which to hold that Garland has any legal title to the land in question.

It is however insisted, that although Garland's trustees have no legal title, which they could assert in a Court of Law against that vested in the Sheriff by operation of law, for the benefit of Rives, or the lien of Rives's judgment and Ca. Sa. executed; yet, when the latter applies to a Court of Equity to aid in enforcing his legal rights, that Court, upon its general principles, will not assist him, further than by subjecting the property to Rives's claim, after first satisfying Garland; and various classes of cases supposed to be analogous to this, are referred to, as illustrating the principles upon which a Court of Equity acts in such cases.

Before I examine the cases relied on as to this point, I premise, that a Court of Equity, in all cases of actual fraud, has a concurrent jurisdiction with a Court of Law, in remedying the fraud; and the remedy in equity is frequently more beneficial than at law, by means of its power to compel discovery, and to cause fraudulent deeds and securities to be cancelled, or conveyances to be made; thus effectually putting an end to future litigation. In these cases of actual fraud, equity follows the law, and gives relief to the full extent to which a Court of Law could give relief. Bennet v. Musgrove, 2 Ves. sen. 51; a case which will be more particularly adverted to hereafter. The case under consideration is a case of actual fraud, and a strong case; in which, if Garland was not a party, he is a purchaser with full notice, from Wingfield and Coleman, who were the chief actors in the fraud; and I believe there is no exception to the rule of equity, that a purchaser with notice, stands, in all respects, in the shoes of his vendor. Rives, therefore, comes into a Court of Equity, ex debito justitiæ, not appealing either to the favor or discretion of the Court.

The invariable maxim of equity is, that he who asks equity must do it. But, this maxim is confined exclusively to the cases, in which there is an equity between the parties; where, although the plaintiff is entitled to relief, he yet owes, in conscience, (though possibly not at law) a debt or duty to the defendant. Francis's Max. 1. In such cases relief is given, on the condition, that the plaintiff does, what in conscience he is bound to do, to the defendant. An equity which any third person may have against the plaintiff, can never be available, under this maxim, to the defendant.

In this case, neither Garland, nor any other, has any equity against Rives. Between two creditors engaged in a race of diligence, in seeking a prior right to satisfaction out of the debtor's property, there can be no equity. It is the tabula in naufragio; and he who obtains the prior legal right to satisfaction, must prevail, both at law and in equity. Where the equity is equal, the law shall prevail.

To this maxim, that he who asks equity, must do equity, to the person from whom he asks it, are to be referred very many of the cases cited in the argument; as, the cases of conveyances, bonds or judgments, or any other securities obtained by fraud; the cases of usury and annuities, in which the securities are void by Statute. In such cases, the plaintiff, who asks the aid of a Court of Equity to relieve him against the vitious security, is bound, in equity and conscience, to refund to the defendant against whom he seeks relief, the real consideration which he has received from him; and it is upon that condition, that relief is given.

Another class of cases relied upon, is that which shews the extent of favor shewn by a Court of Equity to creditors, and bona fide purchasers without notice. These cases cannot apply here. Garland is not a bona fide purchaser without notice; and although a creditor, so is Rives, both equally entitled to favor. There is no instance, in which, as between creditors, he who has obtained the legal advantage, has not prevailed.

The next class of cases insisted on, is that in which it has been held, that a conveyance to several grantees may be void as to one, and good as to another; as in case of a marriage settlement, in which interests are given to those who are strangers to the consideration. The deed would be good as to the wife, and all coming within the considerations of the deed, but void as to all the rest, so far as creditors are concerned. The wife would be a bona fide purchaser for value; the strangers, mere volunteers. So, if a deed be made to secure a just debt, and the equity of redemption is reserved to a stranger, or to the family of the debtor; such a deed would be good as to the creditor, and void as to the reservation of the equity of redemption. In such cases, the limitations to volunteers are void, not because there is any actual fraud, but because of the want of valuable consideration. The wife or creditor, in such cases, might not know that the grantee had any fraudulent intent; as he might not in fact, and they would have no concern in the disposition of the surplus interest of the grantor. But, if the creditor, in such case, were to concur in any actual fraud, with intent to frustrate the rights of other creditors, as in lending his aid, in any way, to give colour to any consideration, falsely alleged, as the inducement to such a reservation of the equity of redemption, such his concurrence in the actual fraud of the grantor, would avoid his deed, as to the creditors intended to be injured thereby.

310 *To this class of cases, may be referred those cases, in which a husband stipulating to settle on his wife, a just equivalent for her right of dower relinquished, with a view to defraud his creditors, settles property grossly exceeding in value the dower, in which case it has been held, that the deed was valid, so far as to secure the just equivalent, and void as to the surplus. In these cases, the wife is held to be an innocent and bona fide purchaser, to the extent of the value of the dower-right relinquished, and the fraud of the husband is not imputed to her. But, if she were sui juris, and concurred in the fraud, the deed would be wholly void, under the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries.

It is lastly asserted, that there is another class of cases, in which, when it is doubtful, whether the conveyance impeached, was or was not founded in an actual fraud and collusion, to defeat or delay creditors, a Court of Equity will take a middle course, and allow the deed to stand as a security for the money really due, and give to the creditor the surplus; and a decision of Chancellor Kent of New York, to this purpose, is cited. Boyd v. Dunlop, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 478.

With great and habitual respect for the opinions of this distinguished Judge, after examining the authorities which he cited, and those cited in the argument of this cause, I cannot think that the principles asserted in that case, are supported by precedents, or sanctioned by any just reasoning.

If the conveyance is impeached upon the ground of actual fraud, intended to defeat or delay creditors, and the allegation of fraud is supported by proofs, the deed ought to be set aside in toto, and cannot stand as a security for any purpose of reimbursement or indemnity. Sands v. Codwise, 4 Johns. Rep. 536, 598, 599. If it be not supported by proof, I can see no ground, why the Court should deprive the defendant of the benefit of an advantageous purchase, fairly made, so far as respects the creditors, upon the mere suspicion, that a fraud upon creditors was intended.

311 *There seems, however, to be another ground of equitable jurisdiction in favor of creditors, independent of the Statute of Frauds. When a purchaser takes advantage of the circumstances of a necessitous debtor, to purchase his property at a great sacrifice, without any intention to frustrate the claims of his creditors, for the benefit of the debtor or his family, but for the sole purpose of benefiting the purchaser; and the circumstances are such as would induce a Court of Equity to relieve the vendor; in such a case, a judgment creditor, standing in the shoes of the debtor, independent of the Statute of Frauds, would be entitled to the same relief that the debtor would be entitled to, and could only be relieved upon the terms of paying out of the property or otherwise, what the debtor justly owed, upon the principles before discussed. The relief is founded in these cases, not on a suspicion of fraud practised with the intent to injure creditors; but on the fraud practiced on the debtor himself to his own prejudice; and that satisfactorily proved.

The only cases cited in Boyd v. Dunlop, bearing upon this point, are Herne v. Meeres, 1 Vern. 465. 2 Bro. Ch. Cas. 177, note S. C. and Bennett v. Musgrove, 2 Ves. 51. All the other cases, (How v. Weldon, 2 Ves. 516, Proof v. Hines, Cas. Temp. Talb. 111. Grove v. Watt, 2 Sch. & Lefr. 492, &c.) are cases in which the grantor sought relief against his own contract, and was subjected to equitable terms. The case of Barwell v. Ward, 1 Atk. 260, was cited in the argument as bearing on the same point. These cases are all (as far as I am informed,) that are to be found in the English books, affecting this question.

The case of Herne v. Meeres, was decided in 1687; that of Barwell v. Ward, in 1744; and that of Bennett v. Musgrove, in 1750; and in the last case, I have no doubt Lord Hardwicke, who decided Barwell v. Ward, intended to state distinctly the grounds upon which those cases were decided.

312 *The case of Bennett v. Musgrove, was this: A bill by a judgment creditor, who had an elegit executed, to set aside a fraudulent conveyance made by the debtor to the defendant. Two objections were taken; that a Court of Equity had no jurisdiction, as the plaintiff had a remedy at law; and that there was not sufficient evidence of fraud. Lord Hardwicke said, "A plain case to give the plaintiff relief, which is, to be let in to the benefit of that, to which such a creditor is entitled, though a creditor at large is not. But, when a judgment is obtained affecting it from the time, and execution, he is entitled, because that affects the reality of the land, and this, whether it be one kind of fraudulent conveyance, or another. For, if it is by collusion, he clearly may; but, if it was obtained from his debtor himself, by fraud on the debtor, on or about the time he obtained his judgment and elegit, he might, as standing in the place of the debtor, come into this Court to be relieved against that conveyance, and to have the same benefit of relief," as the debtor, I presume, might have had. The Lord Chancellor proceeded to declare, that the Court had jurisdiction in a case of actual fraud, whether the plaintiff could recover, or not, at law. And notwithstanding the consideration, specified in the deed, of 50l. a debt due to Musgrove, he set aside the deed, so far as it interfered with the plaintiff's right, under his elegit, the utmost extent to which a Court, either of law or equity, can give relief under the Statute of Frauds. The deed is void, only as to the creditors. After they are satisfied, the surplus belongs to the grantee.

Herne v. Meeres, as reported in Vernon, is to this effect: The bill was by creditors of Cox against Meeres. Cox was outlawed and absconded. Meeres purchased from Cox, with notice of all the facts, a life-estate at three or four years purchase. The creditors, afterwards, obtained a judgment, and filed their bill to be relieved against this purchase as a trust, or else as a fraud, it being at a great under value.

The Court is reported to have said, 313 "The *purchase is at a great undervalue, and huddled up in haste, at a time when young Cox concealed himself from his creditors, and carries another ill circumstance with it, that the defendant is a trustee in the marriage settlement; and for him to buy the life-estate of the husband, was to take away the maintenance and support thereby intended and provided for the wife and children, on whose behalf he was entrusted, and all this, with notice of the plaintiff's debts, and proceedings at law, which ought to have some weight in the case; and although the plaintiff's securities were not such as did immediately affect the land, yet the notice was such, and Cox's absconding, had he been a trader, would have made him a bankrupt, and then the defendant must have lost all his money; and so, at law, when a conveyance is found to be fraudulent, the creditor comes in and avoids all, without the re-payment of any consideration money; and in equity, therefore, when the Court can decree back the principal and interest, there is no hurt done, and a lesser matter in such a case will serve to set a conveyance aside."

It is difficult to extract from this reasoning, the principle on which relief was given. There is no intimation of any suspicion of a collusion to defraud the creditors. The reference to the trust, the inadequacy of price, and the distressed circumstances of Cox, would tend to shew, that the transaction was a fraud upon Cox, against which he might be relieved; and the terms of the decree, as stated from the register in 2 Bro. Ch. Cas. 177, (n.) seem to place the relief on that ground. It states, that "the bargain made by Sir T. Meeres with Cox, was not fairly obtained, in respect of the circumstances Cox was in; but ought, in conscience, to be made void, the premises purchased by him, being more than double the value of the money paid by him, and therefore he should be considered as a mortgagee." I think this case proceeded upon the principle stated by Lord Hardwicke, in Bennett v. Musgrove; the substitution, in equity, of a judgment creditor, to the right 314 of his debtor to impeach a conveyance, for a fraud practised upon him. The circumstances under which the conveyance was procured, were such, as that in equity, Meeres was a trustee for Cox; and this equitable right of Cox might be pursued in equity by a judgment creditor; as such a creditor might, in the case of a mortgage, claim, in equity, the benefit of the debtor's equity of redemption.

The case of Barwell v. Ward, decided by Lord Hardwicke, in 1744, was this: The defendant's brother conveyed to her the moiety of a reversionary estate, for less than half its value; and in a month after, was committed to jail, and became bankrupt by failing to give bail, for two months. By the Chancellor: "The present is a plain case, and appears to be a fraudulent conveyance to cover the estate, for the deeds were executed when Ward was in declining circumstances." "No more than 60*l.* paid for the moiety of an estate in reversion, of the value of 39*l.* a year, which is pretended to be redeemable upon the payment of 60*l.* but no clause of this kind is in the deed itself; for, it is an absolute bargain and sale. The Court in this case, ought to do no more, than to let the deed stand as a security for the money really and bona fide advanced;" and accordingly ordered an enquiry as to the amount. It is difficult to ascertain, from the report of this case, upon what principle the Court proceeded, if not upon this: that the assignees were entitled to assert the rights of the bankrupt, and asserted their claims in that character; and that the conveyance was admitted by the defendant to be redeemable.

If, however, the rule laid down in Boyd v. Dunlop, as deduced from those cases, be the true rule, then this case does not fall within the rule; since it is a clear case of actual and gross fraud in Wingfield and Coleman; and Garland is a purchaser from them, with full notice of the fraud and invalidity of their title. If the rule I have gathered from those cases is the true rule, then there was, in this case, no fraud or imposition on Lewis Nicholas, of 315 which *he could complain; and, consequently, the rule is not applicable to this case.

Upon those scanty and equivocal materials, we are urged to sanction the doctrine, that a Court of Equity will allow a party to advance his money, with a view to enable a debtor to secure to himself or his family, fraudulently, all his property against his creditors, except what may be necessary to re-pay the money advanced; or, a creditor to permit his debt to be used in like manner; and when the fraud is detected and exposed, to suffer the deed, declared by the Statute to be utterly void as to creditors, to stand as a security to their prejudice, for the money advanced or the debt due. So, that the experiment would be made, without hazard to any party concerned. This, I think, would be to repeal the Statute. It would offer the greatest temptation to such fraudulent experiments; and the delay, at least, which is commonly one of the principal objects of such transactions, would be effected without loss to the parties concerned in the fraud.

The only enquiry which remains to be made, is, whether it be competent for the appellant to impeach the judgment, on which the appellee's claim is founded, on the ground that the original transaction was usurious; and if he can, and should succeed in impeaching it, whether Rives's claim would be thereby wholly avoided, or relief given for the usurious excess only.

It seems, from the case of Scott v. Nisbett, 2 Bro. Ch. Cas. 640, that a plaintiff, coming into a Court of Equity, and claiming by force of a judgment at law, any third person, affected by the judgment, may resist the plaintiff's claim, upon the ground that it is usurious, if that question had not been tried and decided at law; and in such case, the Court of Equity will adopt the same rule, that prevails when the usurer is a defendant in equity; relieving only as to the usurious excess. It is, however, unnecessary to examine these doctrines.

316 *In this case, Rives's suit was depending, and eagerly prosecuted, at the time that the conveyances were executed for the purpose of defeating the fruits of his action. The suit was defended on the plea of usury; and every fact, upon which it is now sought to establish the charge of usury, was submitted to the Court of Law and the jury, except only the negotiations between Rives and Nicholas, respecting a purchase of lands, which appears in Rives's answer to the cross bill; but in such a form as not to affect the question of usury. The deposition of Wilson C. Nicholas was properly excluded in the trial at law, and is not evidence in this cause. Upon the question, whether one is or is not a debtor, an adversary judgment against him is evidence prima facie, that he is a debtor, even as against strangers, who claim, under him, property affected by the judgment. If they attempt to impeach the judgment, it must be done on the ground of fraud, or by shewing that a full defence was not made, and producing new proof, shewing that the debt is not due. But, in a case like this, of a purchase pending the suit, and for the purpose of fraudulently defeating the objects of the suit, it seems to me, that the purchaser ought to be bound by the judgment, as the debtor was bound.

If a Court of Equity could, in this case, pronounce this transaction usurious, upon the very same facts, on which the Court of Law and jury have pronounced it not to be usurious, then it would virtually be an appeal from the Court of Law to the Court of Equity; and the Court of Equity would re-examine the judgment of the Court of Law, and virtually reverse it. This is not within the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity; which relieves against judgments at law, not because they were wrong, but because of some new matter, which the Court of Law did not, or could not, pronounce a judgment on, or which, for some just cause, the party could not bring to the consideration of the Court of Law. Whether the transaction in question, was a loan or a sale, was emphatically proper for the 317 *decision of a jury; and a jury having decided that question, upon the very same evidence now submitted to a Court of Equity, that decision is conclusive, although we might differ in opinion from the jury, as to the effect of the evidence.

Upon the whole, the decree is right, and should be affirmed.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Henrico county.

John M'Dowell, surviving partner of John M'Dowell & Co. brought an action of debt, in the name of the Governor, on the official bond of Peter B. Whiting, 318 Sheriff of Gloucester county, against

John H. Blair, administrator of Nathaniel Burwell, deceased, which said Nathaniel was a surety of the said Whiting, in the bond aforesaid. The following opinion will give a full view of all the proceedings in the cause, and the principles involved in it.

W. F. Wickham, for the appellant.
Williams, for the appellee.

June 1. JUDGE GREEN delivered his opinion.

This is an action in the name of the Governor, at the relation of the appellant, upon the official bond of P. B. Whiting, Sheriff of Gloucester, against the appellee, the administrator of one of the sureties. The bond bears date January 2d, 1797; and one of its conditions is, that if P. B. Whiting should "well and truly execute and due return make of all process and precepts to him directed, and in all things shall truly and faithfully perform and execute the said office of Sheriff during the term of his continuance therein, then the aforesaid obligation to be void, or else to remain in full force and virtue." The declaration, after setting forth the bond and condition, assigns for breaches of the condition, that sundry executions were delivered to P. B. Whiting, which he failed to return, and that for such failure, the relator recovered against him sundry fines upon motion, the judgments for which fines remain in full force and unsatisfied. The defendant demurred to the declaration, and pleaded, in bar to the action, the judgments for fines against the Sheriff, which were set out in satisfaction for the damage sustained by the creditor in being unjustly kept out of his money by the default of the sheriff or his deputy. When the fine is paid by the sureties of the sheriff, in any subsequent proceeding against them to enforce the judgment or decree upon which the execution issued, they will be entitled to a credit upon the judgment or decree for the amount of the fine, or fines, so paid. Code of 1873, ch. 49, § 28, p. 475. See also, M'Dowell v. Burwell, 4 Rand. 317; Pardee v. Robertson, 6 Hill's R. 550." See principal case also cited with approval in *Fletcher v. the declaration; to which the plaintiff demurred. The defendant also pleaded conditions performed, upon which issue was taken. Upon the trial of the issue, the plaintiff offered in evidence copies of the records of the judgments for fines set out in the declaration, and the copy of a record of a suit in Chancery, in which the 319 Sheriff was plaintiff, and the relator in this action was defendant. The plaintiff in Chancery, in his bill (which was sworn to) admitted that he had received the executions, for the failing to return which, the judgments for fines had been given, and that he had failed to return them in due time; and, after stating an excuse for not returning them, alleged that he had returned them before the filing of his bill. The object was, to enjoin the judgments for fines. The injunction was awarded and dissolved in 1817. The defendant objected to this evidence as inadmissible, and the Court rejected it. The jury found for the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted to the opinion of the Court rejecting the evidence.

The first question which presents itself on this record is, whether the sureties of the Sheriff are responsible for fines imposed upon their principal, upon motion for failing to return executions, and whether those fines can be recovered in an action on the Sheriff's bond. This, it seems to me, was the only question intended to be presented by the plaintiff. The delivery of the executions, and the failure to return them, seems to be stated only as matter of inducement, to shew the grounds upon which the fines were imposed, and not as the gist of the complaint. Neither the time when the executions were issued and delivered to the Sheriff, is stated, nor is any venue laid as to those facts, nor is it alleged how long the Sheriff failed to return them, nor that they were never returned.

At the common law, the failure of an officer to return process when ruled to do so, was a contempt for which he was punished, as the discretion of the Court, by fine or imprisonment, or by both. This was, in its nature, a criminal proceeding, and in the name of the King, to punish an offence to the public. It was no bar to the remedy of the party injured, by action against the Sheriff for the damages arising from his default. The fine belonged to the King; 2 Vin. Abr. 434, pl. 11; but, in practice, one-third of it was in England, given to the party aggrieved. Rex v. Cudmore, Cumb. 250. Nor could any Court impose a fine to the party grieved. 2 Vin. Abr. 452.

320 *In 1748, 5 Stat. at Large, 517, an Act passed imposing a fine upon the Sheriff, for failing to execute and return process, of 1000 pounds of tobacco, one moiety to the King, the other to the party grieved, to be recovered by action of debt or information in any County Court in the Colony, and providing that he should be further liable to the action of the party grieved, at the common law, for his or her damages.

In 1753, 6 Stat. at Large, 344, it was enacted, that for failing to return an execution, the Sheriff might be fined upon ten days notice, (without prescribing how notice was to be given,) by the Court from which the execution issued, at its discretion, in a sum not exceeding 10l. which fine should be for the use of the plaintiff in the execution, with a proviso, that he should, notwithstanding the fine, be liable to the action given, and the penalty inflicted by the Act of 1748.

In 1792, 13 Stat. at Large, 378, an Act passed reciting that it was doubtful how judgment should be rendered against an officer failing to return an execution, and providing, that upon motion by the party injured, the Court might fine him in any sum not exceeding 5 per cent. per month, for the time of his failure to make the return.

In 1794, it was enacted, that the executors and administrators of a Sheriff or other officer, and his sureties, and their executors or administrators, should be liable to the like fine and penalty, recoverable in the same manner as was by law directed against a Sheriff himself failing to return an execution.

The proviso in the Act of 1748, reserving his common law remedy for damages to the party injured by the failure of a Sheriff to execute and return process, proceeded from an excess of caution, and was unnecessary. That right would have remained without any such reservation. A debt might have been wholly lost by such failure, and the specific penalty to be recovered by a qui tam action, could not have 321 been construed to deprive the party of his original *right to full satisfaction for all damages suffered by the default of the officer. This new penalty would have been justly considered as cumulative; and the same principle of construction applies to all the subsequent Statutes upon the subject.

The fine imposed upon an officer for a failure to return process, either at the common law, or by the Statute, was in its nature, a punishment for a personal offence, and not a satisfaction to the party injured for the damage thereby sustained by him, and ought to be graduated by the degree of delinquency, and not by the damage done to the party; for, as to that, he had another and appropriate remedy. The nature of the fine, was not changed by giving it to the party grieved, under the Statute, any more than by giving one third of it to the party, at common law. "When a Statute imposes a penalty for a contempt, as the contempt is personal, so is the penalty." Lane, 107. Accordingly, whilst the executors of the Sheriff and his sureties were responsible, under his official bond, for the actual damage to the party by the Sheriff's failure to execute and return process, they were not responsible for the penalty imposed by the Act of 1748, or the fines imposed by the Acts of 1753 and 1792. And so the Legislature considered it; for, in 1794, they extended the fines and the remedy, upon motion to assess and recover them, to the executors of the Sheriff and to his sureties and their executors; and it is by virtue of this Statute only, that they can be responsible for fines. Indeed, it was only by virtue of the Act of 1755,

6 Stat. at Large, 483, that a party injured, could sue on the official bond of the Sheriff; and this remedy was confined to the recovery of "all damages which he may have sustained by reason of the breach of the condition of the bond."

Does the Act of 1794, make the fine and penalty recoverable by suit upon the bond? I think not. The Act of 1755, only authorises the recovery of the damages actually suffered by the default of the 322 officer. Suppose a *debt to be wholly lost by such default. Could the creditor recover in an action on the bond, not only the whole debt and interest, (which is the utmost extent of his damages,) but a fine at the discretion of the jury, and not of the Court, or fines previously assessed by the Court? The sureties are only bound by, and to the extent of, the terms of their obligation, and that, as well as the Statute authorising the suit on the bond, only binds them to the extent of the actual damage. They are under no legal or moral obligation to answer further. Upon what principle the Legislature considered them liable beyond this, it is hard to perceive; and the law subjecting them to a responsibility beyond their engagement, for fines upon motion, and a penalty recoverable in a qui tam action, and not upon their bond, is so harsh, that it ought to be construed strictly, and the remedy confined rigorously to the terms prescribed by the Statute. The surety, therefore, is not responsible in this action, for the fines imposed upon the Sheriff.

Here the case should have ended; and the demurrer to the declaration should have been sustained, unless the declaration were susceptible of the construction, that the general averment, that the executions were delivered to the Sheriff, who failed to return them in due time, was the gist of the complaint, and the allegation of the judgments against the Sheriff for fines, mere surplusage: that the suit was to recover damages actually sustained by the Sheriff's failure to return the executions, and not the amount of the fines. This seems to have been the construction given to the declaration by the Court below; and it is perhaps susceptible of that construction. The generality of the averment of the delivery of the executions to the Sheriff, and of his failure to return them, would have been fatally objectionable upon a special demurrer, but not on a general demurrer. An averment of a breach of the condition of the bond, although it may not entitle the plaintiff to all he demands, will entitle him to recover what he is legally 323 entitled to in consequence of the breach. This question, *however, is not intended to be decided, as it is not necessary to the decision of the cause.

It remains, therefore, to enquire, whether the evidence offered to prove the breach of the condition, by shewing that the Sheriff had received the executions and failed to return them, was properly rejected.

The judgments were not evidence of these facts, as against the sureties, in any degree. They did not per se bind them. It was res inter alios acta, and emphatically so, for the sureties had no more interest in the subject of these judgments than any other strangers. But, if they could have been proper evidence in any possible state of things, they were properly excluded, upon the ground upon which the admissions made by the Sheriff, in his bill, were excluded; that they were not the best evidence which the nature of the case admitted. This is an inflexible rule. Inferior evidence can never be received, when it appears that better evidence is in the power of the party. Thus, no admissions of a party can be received to prove a matter of record; and the admissions of the party, that he had executed a bond, is not competent to prove its execution, if there be a subscribing witness. If he can be procured, he must be produced; if not, his hand-writing must be proved as the next best evidence to his testimony on oath. In the same bill in which the Sheriff admits the receipt of the executions, and his failure to return them in due time, he states that they were returned. The plaintiff giving in evidence this bill as the confession of the Sheriff, was bound, in a Court of Law, to take it altogether, unless he could disprove it in any particular. The moment, therefore, that it appeared that record evidence existed of the issuing of the executions and of their delivery to the Sheriff, the inferior evidence of his confessions became incompetent. If the executions had not been returned, and thus become a part of the records of the Court, or if the returns did not shew the failure of the Sheriff to return them in due time, then his confessions would have been 324 admissible, to *shew, in the one case, that they were issued, and that he had received them and failed to return them in time, and in the other, to shew that he had not returned them in time. In such a state of things, those facts could only have been proved by parol evidence; and when parol evidence is admissible, the confessions of one of several persons jointly bound, are competent and prima facie evidence against the others. It was argued, that although the evidence of the records was necessary, yet the confessions were competent evidence, and should have been admitted; and that non constat but that the plaintiff gave, or was ready to give, the records in evidence. If he gave, or was ready to give, this evidence, it should have been stated in the bill of exceptions; and if it appeared that parol proofs were necessary to supply any fact not appearing by the record, the confessions would have been admissible for that purpose. Otherwise, such a course would utterly frustrate the rule of law requiring the best evidence which the nature of the case admits.

The judgment should be affirmed.

Same-Same-When Evidence of Party's Handwriting Admissible.†-But, if the subscribing witness merely makes his mark, if he is dead, proof of the hand-writing of the party executing the instrument, will be proper.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Prince George county.

Perkinson brought an action against Gilliam, to recover compensation for his services as an overseer. A written agreement was entered into by the parties, containing the terms of the contract, signed by the parties, and attested by Charles A. Gilliam and Cannon Perkinson. The latter only made his mark. The defendant pleaded, and issue was joined.

At the trial, the plaintiff introduced the said agreement; but the defendant objected to it, on the ground that Charles A. Gilliam, one of the subscribing witnesses, was a mulatto man; and that Cannon Perkinson, being dead, the mark attached to his name was not proved to be his. But the Court over-ruled the objection, and decided that proof of the hand-writing of the defendant Gilliam, would be sufficient; which was accordingly proved. To this opinion, the defendant filed a bill of exceptions.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the Court gave judgment accordingly. The defendant appealed.

June 3. JUDGE CARR.

Gilliam and Perkinson, entered into written articles of agreement, by which Gilliam employed Perkinson as 326 *his overseer. This agreement was witnessed by Charles A. Gilliam and Cannon Perkinson, the first writing his name, the last making his mark. The overseer and his employer disagreed, and the overseer sued on the agreement. At the trial, it was admitted that Charles A. Gilliam, the witness who wrote his name, was a mulatto, and incapable of giving evidence; and that the other witness, who made his mark, was dead. The question was, whether the plaintiff should be permitted to prove the hand-writing of the defendant to the agreement, without having first proved the mark of the deceased witness, or used due exertions to obtain such proof. The Court permitted proof of the hand-writing of the defendant, without laying any other ground for it than the death of the witness; and we are to decide whether this was error.

The general rule on this subject is, that if there be a subscribing witness to an instrument, his evidence is the best and must be adduced, if in the power of the party. But if the witness be dead, or blind, or insane, or infamous, or interested since the execution of the deed, or beyond the process of the Court, or not to be found after diligent enquiry; in all these cases (and others perhaps might be stated) the course is, to prove the hand-writing of the attesting witness. This is evidence of every thing on the face of the instrument. The sealing and delivery will be presumed; and it is laid down in many cases, that it will not be necessary to prove the hand-writing of the party to the deed. Other cases, however, have required such proof to connect the party with the instrument.

The latest case I have examined on the subject, is that of Nelson v. Wittal, 1 Barnew. & Ald. 19, decided in 1817; and there the question seems to be considered as not settled. Lord Ellenborough says, "It has been the constant practice, in cases where the subscribing witness is dead, never to look at any thing beyond proof of the hand-writing of the witness, and I should think, that in all cases, it was prima facie evidence of the in-327 strument having been *executed by the person whose name it bears.

The question, however, may perhaps admit of some doubt." Bayly J. says, "It is laid down in Mr. Phillips's Treatise on the Law of Evidence, that proof of the hand-writing of the attesting witness, is in all cases, sufficient. I always felt this difficulty, that, that proof alone, does not connect the defendant with the note. If the attesting witness himself gave evidence, he would prove, not merely that the instrument was executed, but the identity of the person so executing it; but the proof of the hand-writing of the attesting witness, establishes merely that some person assuming the name which the instrument purports to bear, executed it; and it does not go to establish the identity of that person; and in that respect, the proof seems to me, defective." Abbott, J. seemed to think proof of the hand-writing of an attesting witness sufficient, and as one reason for his opinion, states, that if it had been necessary in ancient deeds, to prove, besides the hand-writing of an attesting witness, that of the party also, a great difficulty would have arisen; for, in those times, the parties seldom wrote, but merely fixed their marks, "which would scarcely be distinguishable from one another." If there be no subscribing witness, or he denies having any knowledge of the execution, or the name of a fictitious person is inserted, or if, after diligent enquiry, nothing can be heard of the witness, so that he can neither be produced, or his hand-writing proved, the execution of the instrument may be established by proving the hand-writing of the party, or his admission, that he executed it. While I acknowledge it to be the rule, that proof of the hand-writing of the attesting witness, is considered better evidence of the execution, than proof of the hand-writing of the party executing, I am free to confess, that I think it a rule founded rather in technical strictness, and artificial reasoning, than in sound good sense. When I see the name of a person, with whose hand-writing I am well acquainted, signed to an instrument as a party, it gives much stronger assurance *to my mind, that he executed it, than I should feel from the mere knowledge of the hand-writing of an attesting witness. This last, seems to be one removed further from certainty. The witness may have honestly attested what he believed to be the fact, and yet be deceived by the obligor's assuming a name which he did not bear; or the witness may have knavishly signed his name, knowing that the person, whose name the instrument bears, never executed it. But, when we see the name of the obligor affixed to the bond, and know that it was written by himself, it is so difficult to account for its being there, except by his executing the writing, that the mind can feel little doubt of the execution. This has always been my opinion of this rule, and I am pleased to find it corroborated by such good authority as the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, consisting of Tilghman, Yates and Brackenridge, in Clark v. Sanderson, 3 Binn. 192; Chief Justice Spencer, in Hall v. Phelps, 2 Johns. Rep. 451; and Chief Justice Parker, in Homer v. Wallace, 11 Mass. Rep. 309. I do not mean that they all concur on the exact point of hand-writing. The first three do; and the other two are equally in favor of relaxing the rigor of the old rule.

In the case before us, however, I consider no relaxation of the rule required, to support the judgment of the Court below. The attesting witness being dead, the first call would be for proof of his hand-writing; and wherever that could not be had, the hand-writing of the party might be proved. Whether this inability proceeded from fortuitous circumstances, or the very nature of the transaction, would be immaterial. In the case before us, the witness has made his mark. Now I ask, how could this be proved? There is a distinct, individual character, in the hand-writing of every man who can write; and with those who have written much, that character is so fixed and striking, that persons acquainted with it, will feel no more difficulty in recognizing it, than in knowing the face of the writer. *Where the name of a witness is written by himself, therefore, it may generally be proved with something like certainty. But here, there was no writing. The name of the witness is written by another; and he makes a cross mark; perhaps, the first, and the last, he ever made in his life. To attempt to prove such a signature as this, would be a mockery of justice; and the Court, seeing this, did right in allowing the hand-writing of the party to be proved. I am for affirming the judgment.

The other Judges concurred, and the judgment was affirmed.*

Plea of Nul Tiel Record.—In what cases the plea of nul tiel record is proper.

*The PRESIDENT and JUDGE CABELL absent.

†Plea of Nul Tiel Record.—See principal case cited

Recognizance—Scire Facias—Fatal Variance.—When a recognizance is entered into before two Justices, and it omits to state that it was taken in the county to which the Justices belong, while the Scire Facias, in reciting the recognizance, sets forth the county in which it was taken, the variance will be fatal.

Record—Defect—Averment.—No defect in a record can be supplied by averment.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Albemarle county.

A Scire Facias issued from the County Court of Albemarle against Isaac Wood and John Wood, praying execution on behalf of the Commonwealth, on a recognizance entered into by the defendants, conditioned for the personal appearance of Isaac Wood at a Court of Albemarle county, ordered to be holden for his examination on a charge of having stabbed a certain Charles Pemberton. The Scire Facias recites, "that Isaac Wood and John Wood, on the second day of November, 1816, at the parish of and county aforesaid, personally appeared before Charles Yancey and Jeconias Yancey, two of the Justices of the Peace for the county of Albemarle, &c." It then recites the recognizance, and concludes, "as by the said recognizance in our County Court of Albemarle sent and now remaining in the said County Court, manifestly appears. And whereas, the said Isaac Wood has failed to make his personal appearance before our said County Court of Albemarle, directed by the said Justices to be holden as aforesaid, at the time and place aforesaid, according to the condition of the said recognizance, as appears to us of record."

The defendant John Wood, cravedoyer of the recognizance, and demurred, assigning several causes of demurrer; one of which was, that it does not appear from the said recognizance that it was executed in Albemarle.

The recognizance does not state, as set forth in the Scire Facias, that it was entered into in the county of Albemarle.

The County Court gave judgment for the defendant, and the Commonwealth appealed to the Superior Court of Law, who reversed the decision of the County Court. The defendant John Wood, appealed to this Court.

which oyer is given him is the true record, and relies that it does not support the pleadings or Scire Facias, it seems to me that he should not deny that there is such a record, by plea; but, that he ought to demur, upon the ground that it varies from the pleadings or Scire Facias. If he denies the verity of the record of which oyer is given, he should plead nul tiel record after oyer. 18 Vin. 183, pl. 18.

In this case, the Scire Facias recites, that the defendant, on the 2d day of November, 1816, at the parish of at the county of Albemarle, personally appeared before two of the Justices of that county, and entered into a recognizance, which was returned to, and remains in, the said County Court, and was forfeited, as appears to us of record. This last expression refers to all the preceding recitals. Upon the recognizance, of which oyer was given, nothing appears of its being entered into in Albemarle; and therefore, that fact, (and an important one,) does not appear of record, and I think cannot be averred. No defect in a record can be supplied by averment. This is a fatal variance, and the judgment of the Superior Court should be reversed, and that of the County Court affirmed.

332 *Davis v. Payne's Administrator.

June, 1826.

Distress—What Liable—Property of Third Person.†

The property of a third person never was liable to distress, unless it were found upon the premises; and even where it is found there, the distress is taken away by the Act of 1818, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, sec. 15.

Voluntary Conveyance—Personalty—When Valid.‡

A voluntary conveyance of personal property, by a party not indebted at the time, is good against subsequent creditors, if the deed be duly recorded, or the possession remain solely and bona fide with the donee. Otherwise, it is void by the Statute of Frauds.

Same—Same—Recordation.—Such a deed cannot be recorded in a Corporation Court.

Distress—Redress for—Equity Jurisdiction.—Even if the landlord should distrain property as being fraudulently removed from the premises, and should not shew that it was so fraudulently removed, nor that the distress was levied within the time allowed by law, nor that the property ever was on the demised premises, the tenant ought not to seek his redress in a Court of Equity, but by damages at law.

This was an appeal from the Richmond Chancery Court, where Robert C. Davis, and James M. Davis, infant children of Isaac Davis, by Joseph Butler, their next friend, filed their bill, setting forth the following case: that their father Isaac Davis, became the tenant of a house and lot in the City of Richmond, which was held by Samuel Payne, in right of his wife, who had been the widow of Adam Craig, deceased, and who held the said property in right of dower: that the said Isaac Davis finding the said lot to be extremely unhealthy removed from it; and the said Payne claimed of him rent to the amount of $225, and levied a distress on a slave called Jenny Pin, the property of the complainants, to satisfy the said rent: that the officer has advertised the said slave to be sold in a few days, and the said Isaac Davis, from his embarrassed circumstances, is unable to give security in order to contest the claim of the said Payne, although he conceives that nothing is due on account of the rent; while the complainants, by reason of their non-age, cannot avail themselves of the benefit of the Act of Assembly, which would authorise others to interplead, because they would be unable to give the bond required by law in such cases: that the said slave is the property of the complainants, and not of 333 their father: *that she did not reside on the said lot, and of course not a proper subject of distress for rent due for it, &c. They therefore call upon Payne to answer the premises, and pray the Court to injoin the sale aforesaid, &c.

The injunction was awarded until the further order of the Court.

The plaintiffs exhibited with their bill, the copy of a deed, dated the 22d day of June, 1816, between Isaac Davis and Robert C. and James M. Davis, his infant children, by which Isaac Davis, in consideration of the natural love and affection he bears for his said sons, and of five dollars to him in hand paid, gives and grants to them seven slaves, among whom is the girl in question, Jenny Pin. This deed was recorded in the office of the Court of Hustings of the City of Richmond, on the 25th day of June, 1816.

Samuel Payne demurred to the bill, on the ground that the remedy at law was complete, by action of replevin. He also answered, affirming that the rent for which the distress was made, was actually due: that the slave in question had been covertly removed from the premises, and he authorised her seizure wherever found, under the Act of Assembly: that she had been generally on the leased tenement, and was part of the household of the said Isaac, and seldom if ever hired out: that he denies that the said slave is the property of the complainants, and if any conveyance exists, it is fraudulent and void, made for the purpose of covering the property of the said Isaac Davis, and defeating his just creditors, &c.

Depositions were filed by both parties, touching the fraudulent nature of the conveyance, and the residence of the slave in question on the rented lot; but there is no proof that Isaac Davis was indebted at the time of his conveyance to his sons.

The suit abated by the death of the defendant, and was revived in the name of his administrator.

On the hearing, the Chancellor dissolved the injunction, and dismissed the bill.

The plaintiffs appealed.

the Act of 1818, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, § 15, exempting the property of strangers found upon the premises, from distress, provided the party asserted his title by replevin, has no application to this case. If the property in question belonged to the tenant, it was liable to distress; if not, it was not liable even before the Act of 1816.

A voluntary conveyance by a party not indebted at the time, is good against subsequent creditors, if the deed be duly recorded, or the possession remain really and bona fide with the donee; otherwise, it is void under our Statute of Frauds. In this case, it is neither alleged nor proved that Isaac Davis was at all indebted, when he made the deed in question to his children; and the only enquiry, in order to determine whether it is valid or void as against Payne, is whether it was duly recorded or not.

The Act to prevent frauds and perjuries, passed in 1785, 12 Stat. at Large, 160, declared all conveyances, not on consideration deemed valuable in law, to be fraudulent within that Act, unless the same be by will duly proved and recorded, or by deed in writing, acknowledged or proved, if the same deed include lands also, in such manner as conveyances of lands are directed by law to be acknowledged or proved; or if it be of goods and chattels only, then acknowledged or proved by two witnesses in the General Court, or the Court of the county wherein one of the parties lives, within eight months after the execution thereof, or unless possession shall really and bona fide remain with the donee.

The Act of 1792, regulating conveyances, authorised the conveyances therein mentioned to be recorded in the General Court, District Courts, or County or Corporation Courts. That Act does not embrace the case of absolute deeds of personal property, nor any description of conveyances of personal property, except marriage settlements and deeds of trust and mortgages.

The Act of 1813-14, directed that all deeds relating to personal property, should be recorded only in the Court of the county where the property was. This Act, whilst it took away the jurisdiction of the General and Superior Courts, to admit to record deeds of personal property, and even that of the Corporation Courts, in respect to the description of conveyances allowed to be recorded in them by the Act of 1792, cannot, by any possible construction, be considered as enlarging the provisions of the Statute of Frauds, so as to authorise an absolute deed of personal property to be recorded in a Corporation Court. There never was a time until the last Revisal, when such a deed could be recorded in a Corporation Court. The deed, therefore, under which the appellants claim, being upon its face voluntary, and not recorded as the law required, and possession not having accompanied it, is void as to creditors under the Statute of Frauds.

It is insisted, that although it appears that Payne was a creditor, and had a right to distrain the property of the tenant fraudulently removed from the premises, within the time limited by law, yet it does not appear, that the property was so fraudulently removed, or that it had been on the premises, or that the distress was levied within the time allowed by law; and that the appellants are entitled to the protection of the Court, unless it appears, that Payne was a creditor legally entitled to distrain the property as he did.

336 "I do not think that these considerations, ought to have any weight in a Court of Equity. Payne was a creditor, and had a just right to satisfaction out of the property in question, and could have subjected it at law, if not by distress, by judgment and execution. If he has proceeded illegally, he is responsible for damages at law, at the discretion of a jury, according to the circumstances as they may appear before them. As against Payne, the appellants have no equity.

The objection, that Mrs. Payne was dead before the distress was levied, need not be examined, as the fact does not appear in the record.

JUDGES CARR and COALTER concurred, and the decree was affirmed.*

*The PRESIDENT and JUDGE CABELL absent.

Executions—Payment to Sheriff after Return Day—Effect.—A sheriff or other officer has no authority to receive payment under an execution after the return day thereof, unless the execution has been previously levied. Such payment would not bind the creditor, nor would it impose any liability upon the sureties of the sheriff on his official bond. Although the sheriff may be responsible in his private capacity for money so received, no responsibility would attach to him in his official character on that account. Grandstaff v. Ridgely, Hampton & Co., 30 Gratt. 15, citing principal case as authority. And in Cockerell v. Nichols, 8 W. Va. 163, it is said: "It is well settled that the officer cannot levy a writ of heri facias on the property of the debtor after the return day thereof. But if the officer levies the execution upon the property of the debtor before the return day he may, generally, sell the property by virtue of the levy after that day, and may also, generally, receive, in such case, payment of the debt, in whole or in part, after such return day and before the sale of the property levied on in relief of the property levied on. And where the execution is not levied before it expires, which is on the return day thereof, a payment to the officer, on the execution, in whole or in part, after the return day thereof is passed, is not binding on the creditor." Chapman v. Harrison, 4 Rand. 336. On the same subject, the principal case is cited in O'Bannon v. Saunders, 24 Gratt. 141. See further, monographic note on "Executions" appended to *Paine v. Harrison, and issued his execution. It went into the hands of Wallace, a Deputy Sheriff, in September, 1814, (as we see by his endorsement,) and was returnable to the 4th Monday in November. He returned it to the clerk's office, (at what time, we do not know,) without any other endorsement than that marking the time when it came to hand. The plaintiff died. R. Goodrich, his administratrix, sued out a Scire Facias, obtained judgment, and issued execution. Harrison then filed his bill to injoin. He states, that the original judgment was obtained in 1815; the execution put into the hands of Wallace, the deputy; and that he paid the full amount thereof, to him, as will appear by a receipt filed. On this receipt, the bill rests the whole equity of the case. As a reason why he did not avail himself of this receipt on the trial of the Scire Facias, the plaintiff states, that he told Chapman, the agent of the administratrix, of the receipt, and referred him to his attorney who had it; and that Chapman said, it was Wallace's hand-writing, and he was satisfied; which prevented his attending to his defence, as he expected to hear nothing more of the affair; and his attorney, who had the receipts, supposing that the proceeding, in which they were to be used, was a motion, did not attend to the Scire Facias. The administratrix and Chapman as her agent, are made defendants; and he is called on specially to state, whether he did not say he was satisfied, on examining the receipt, and that it did cover the execution. In his answer, Chapman, directly responding to the interrogatory, avers, that he said no such thing: that on the contrary, he was dissatisfied after examining the receipt: that the plaintiff ought *to have used this defence at law, or shewn some good excuse for not doing so; and that having failed in this, equity has no jurisdiction, on which he insists, as if formally pleaded. This may be considered as the plea and answer of the defendant, and raises the question of jurisdiction expressly.

The rule on this subject, as settled by many cases in this Court, I understand to be this: That a party having a good legal defence, shall not, after judgment at law, bring the case into equity upon the legal matter, without alleging and proving a good excuse for not using it at law. The bill in this case did allege a sufficient excuse. If Chapman had told the plaintiff, that the receipt was Wallace's hand-writing; that it did cover the execution, and that he was satisfied; and having thus lulled him into security, had gone on, and taken a judgment against him, without defence, equity would have considered it a fraud, and would so far have relieved against it, as to give him the benefit of that defence, whatever it might be. But Chapman denies that he ever told him any such thing; denies that he had any excuse for not making his defence at law. It devolved on the plaintiff, then, to prove the excuse he had alleged. He should have examined evidence to establish the conversation, and also to prove the mistake of his counsel. Having failed to do this, we are bound by the settled rules of evidence to say, that he stands without excuse for not making defence at law; and of consequence, that equity has no jurisdiction of the case. Upon this ground, I think the Court below erred in not dismissing the bill.

Another palpable error was, perpetuating the injunction against the administratrix, without having her before the Court. The record states her to be a non-resident. Publication is ordered, but no evidence that it was ever made.

If it were proper to examine the case upon its merits, after deciding against the jurisdiction, I would say that in my opinion, the defence set up ought not to avail the party before any tribunal. The receipt is long after the return *day of the execution, and speaks as of a payment made at its date, when the deputy had no power to bind the creditor by his act; and the affidavits introduced to prove a payment, while the execution was in force, do not, to my mind, prove any such thing. They are so loose, vague, and unsatisfactory, that it would be unsafe to rely on them as proof of any thing. But, give them full weight; they do not shew that the Sheriff received a cent of money. He has made no return of satisfied in whole or in part, on the execution; and though he should have made a promise that he would enter a credit for some execution against somebody, of which we have an imperfect rumour, as he did not choose to comply with this promise, I do not think the creditor bound by it. I think both judgments should be reversed and the bill dismissed.

JUDGE GREEN.

An injunction was awarded to judgments upon Scire Facias to revive other judgments, upon the allegation that the debtor had paid the full amount of the executions upon the original judgments, to the Deputy Sheriff, in whose hands those executions were. To prove this allegation, the receipts of the Sheriff, dated April 25th, 1815, are produced. One of the executions was returnable to the fourth Monday in November, 1814; the other, to the fourth Monday in January, 1815. The defendant relies that the payment to the Sheriff was after the executions were returnable, and they not having been levied, the payment does not bind him, and was no satisfaction of the judgments; especially as the Sheriff has returned the executions, without any endorsement of what was done under them. The plaintiff has offered proof by parol, for the purpose of shewing, that notwithstanding the date of the receipts, the payments were made before their dates, and whilst the Sheriff was authorised to receive the money. It is not suggested that the executions were ever levied. This proof is extremely loose *and vague, both as to the fact, and date of the payments. The receipts are prima facie evidence, that the payments were made at the date of the receipts, and there is internal evidence in the transaction, that this was the truth of the case. The principal and interest, up to the date of the receipt, with costs and Sheriff's commissions, amount to $208 67. The receipt is for $208 58, a difference of nine cents; whereas, the principal and interest to the return day, with costs and Sheriff's commission, amount only to $202 94; a difference of $5 64, a few cents more than the interest from the return day to the date of the receipt, with the Sheriff's commission thereupon; a clear proof that the payment, however made, was made when the Sheriff had no authority to receive the money; so that the debtor could have made no defence at law.

Both decrees should be reversed, the injunction dissolved, and the bill dismissed.

JUDGE COALTER.

On the first view of this case, I would have been satisfied to have reversed the decree for the error assigned in relation to Rhoda Goodrich, a judgment in whose favour has been enjoined when she was not before the Court. It is often proper to dissolve an injunction, and even dismiss a bill, before all the parties interested are before the Court; as in cases where it is apparent that the plaintiff has made out no case as to any one, and has sought no discovery, and could have no decree, except for an injunction against those not before the Court. There is nothing to prevent the dismissal of a bill in such a case. But, it does not follow that the party, whose bill may be dismissed because he has failed to shew his equity, shall have a decision in his favour upon that equity, against one who is not before the Court.

The question then is, whether the appellee has shewn sufficient grounds why his bill ought not at present to be dismissed?

341 *It is said he has not; first, because he has made out no case which could have availed him as a defence at law, had every thing that now appears been made known to that Court; and between these parties, the equity being equal, the law must prevail. Secondly, it is said, that if this defence would have prevailed at law, there is no sufficient excuse why it was not made there; and therefore equity will not relieve.

As to the first. I am fully satisfied that whilst the executions were in the hands of the Deputy Sheriff, an arrangement was made with him, by which he was to receive the benefit of other executions then in force, in favor of the appellee, and who, in consequence thereof, had agreed not to proceed to levy the executions on the property of the appellee; and I am also satisfied, that he did receive the avails of those executions, either to the full amount of the executions against the appellee, or that the appellee, in some other way, paid up the balance, as he believed, in full discharge of those executions; and that the Deputy Sheriff is the party who really ought to pay the amount of the judgments sought to be enjoined. From the delay in suing out the Scire Facias in this case, I have also little doubt, but that the creditor or his representative had reason to believe, that the appellee was discharged, and that their recourse was against the Deputy Sheriff. No return has ever yet been made on the executions, although they are in the clerk's office, the Deputy Sheriff having merely endorsed when they came to hand, but not what he did with them. It may be, that the creditor, having for several years endeavoured in vain to get the money from him, was better satisfied with no return, although he could have forced one, than with a return of the truth of the case; or it may be that Wallace is dead, and that the executions have been found among his papers, and returned by his executor or administrator to the clerk's office. It may be too, that funds enough were placed in his hands by the appellee, when the execution was in full force, to discharge 342 *the whole debt, and that he agreed to apply them and return the execution satisfied. All these things, I think, are highly probable; much more so, than to suppose that this receipt in 1815, was given when in reality the Deputy Sheriff had not received the full amount of the executions.

I think it highly probable too, that those funds may not have been instantly available to the Deputy Sheriff, though agreed to be received by him in discharge of the executions, or so far as they would go; and if not enough, that the balance was finally to be made up on a settlement: that such settlement took place in a short time after the return day, and most probably when the executions were yet in the hands of the Deputy Sheriff, and the receipts given; and that the Deputy Sheriff ought, in justice, to have returned the executions satisfied. All this might probably have appeared more fully, had the Deputy Sheriff been made a party to the suit, and had the appellee taken the trouble to develop more fully the nature of these transactions.

I was therefore, at first, disposed simply to reverse the decree, and send the cause back; for, had the executions been thus fully and legally discharged, though the Sheriff failed to return them satisfied, and did not give receipts for the money until after the return day, such payment before the return day, was a complete defence at law, and under the circumstances of this case, ought to be equally available in equity. On more full examination, however, the fact that the executions were calculated up to the date of the receipts, throws more doubt upon the subject, as to the time when these transactions took place, and as to the real nature of them when they did take place; and as the appellee has been indulged with a hearing in equity, after a failure to defend himself at law, he ought, and that promptly, to have made out a clear case there. He ought to have shewn clearly, that he could have availed himself of this defence at law, had it been made there; but, not having shewn this, with sufficient certainty, it is perhaps most proper no longer to delay the case for further explanations on his part, but to dismiss the bill.

343 *Had he shewn such a case as would have been a clear defence at law, I am satisfied this Court ought to have relieved. My opinion on this subject, as supported I think by the great current of decisions in this Court, growing out of the peculiar situation of our country, and of our Judicial systems, which renders it necessary for Courts of Equity to extend relief here where it might properly be refused in England, I have lately had occasion to express in the case of Oswald, Deniston & Co. v. Tyler, ante, p. 20. I still entertain the same opinions as there expressed. Here the party had fully and fairly paid off the executions whilst they were in full force, and in the hands of the Sheriff, (which is the postulatium in this view of the case) and had obtained receipts a few months thereafter, the efficacy of which to protect him he had no doubt of; or, if we hold him bound to know the law, that these receipts, without further proof that the payment was made when the executions were in force, would not do, he would know also that he had such proof. The fact was, that he had paid the debts, and thought the receipts all sufficient. Some five or six years after, he is served with a Scire Facias, to shew cause why executions shall not again issue; no arrest; a simple notice to shew cause. This, as he alleges in his bill, he takes to be a notice of a motion about to be made against him at the next term. He employs counsel to defend him against such notice, and gives him the receipts. He also communes with his neighbour, the agent or manager of this business, on the way. He tells him that he has such receipts; refers him to his attorney for an examination of them; is told by the agent that he had seen them, that they were in the hand-writing of Wallace, the Deputy Sheriff, and that he was satisfied. This conversation, he avers, threw him off his guard; and his mistake of the nature of the process also, threw the attorney off his guard; and so judgments were obtained at law.

The plaintiff, in the bill, avers on oath, that he did understand that the defendant was satisfied. How does the 344 *answer deny or disprove this? It does not deny the conversation, and that he did admit that he had seen the receipt, and that he was satisfied they were in the hand-writing of Wallace. But, he denies that he told the complainant, after seeing the receipts, that he was satisfied; but, on the contrary, he was dissatisfied then, and is now, and will be so, until he receives the money; but, that he told the plaintiff so is not averred. As, however, he told him he was satisfied that the receipts were in the hand-writing of Wallace, he might well have supposed that was all that was necessary to satisfy him about. But, the defendant may well have been dissatisfied at not having received the money, and remain so until he does receive it; and this in fact is all he substantially says, and that in answer to a bill which calls upon him to answer "unevasively and particularly." The truth is, that he did then believe it was a good defence. He says, "although from the first appearance of the papers, it would seem that if the proper defence had been made, the complainant ought to have been allowed the said receipts as offsets against the executions, yet upon a proper examination it will be found that he ought not; for, that they bear date after the return day, &c." Had he given them this proper examination, and come to the conclusion above, at the time of this conversation? In charity, I think not; for it would have been a direct fraud to have answered in such a way in relation to them, as might have been construed into an admission that they were a defence. He ought to have said, "I have given these papers a proper examination, and, though I admit they are the hand-writing of Wallace, they will not avail you. They are after the return day." He would then have been told, "But, I will prove that these payments were before the return day." There is a great immorality in any man who has once enforced the payment of his debt, to compel a second payment, merely because, from mistake or surprise, he has gotten a judgment at law for it. Such injustice is only tolerated by the Courts, 345 not as justice between *man and man, but on the ground of policy in putting an end to controversies by one suit, when that can be done; as a punishment to the negligent, not as a premium to injustice; for injustice, abstractly speaking, it certainly is. The punishment is often greatly inadequate to the offence, and will not be imposed, when from fraud, accident or surprise, the defence has not been made at law. I think sufficient accident or surprise, if not fraud, exists in this case; and had the party now shewn, as I think, in all probability, with proper diligence he might have shewn, that he had a defence at law, I would grant him relief. He has hitherto failed to do this; and I think I go far enough in saying, that this controversy ought not further to be protracted; but that the bill, on this ground, ought to be dismissed.

Both decrees must be reversed, and the bill dismissed.*

chase money, the conveyance is not a condition precedent to the right to demand the money.

Undertaking to Pay Money—When to Be Performed.—A general undertaking to pay money, without appointing a day of payment, obliges the party to pay immediately; but an undertaking to do a collateral act, as to convey lands, entitles the party to perform it at any time during his life, unless hastened by the request of the other party.

Contract—Non-Performance—Measure of Damages.—The stipulated price of property sold, is the proper measure of damages, for the non-performance of the contract, if no evidence is offered to shew that some other standard is more proper.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Halifax county, where Romulus M. Saunders and Henry M. Clay brought an action on the case, against William Bailey. The action was founded on an agreement, by which the said Saunders and Clay should sell and convey to the said Bailey, forty-five feet of a lot in the town of North-Milton, at the rate of forty dollars for each front foot; one half at the following Christmas, and the other half twelve months thereafter, and that the said property was to be improved by the said Bailey in some convenient time. The plaintiffs, in their first declaration, say, that they always have been, and still are, ready and willing to execute a good and sufficient conveyance of the said lot, &c. Yet, the said Bailey did not, and would not, pay the said sum of money, or any part thereon, nor did improve the said lot, but hath hitherto neglected and refused to do "the same, to the damage of the plaintiffs $5000, &c. But this count does not allege any assumpsit by the defendant. There are also two general counts.

The defendant pleaded non-assumpsit.

Afterwards, the plaintiff obtained leave to amend their declaration, and filed a new one setting forth the agreement, laying an assumpsit, and alleging a breach. To this declaration, the defendant likewise pleaded non-assumpsit. Issue was joined; and at the trial, the defendant demurred to the plaintiff's evidence; in which the plaintiff joined.

The defendant excepted to the opinion of the Court, who had instructed the jury that the price agreed on by the parties, must be the measure of the said damages.

The jury gave damages for the breach of contract, taking the price fixed by the agreement as their guide, and dependent on the judgment of the Court on the demurrer to evidence. This verdict was set aside by consent, and upon a new trial, the defendant filed four bills of exceptions, one of which was like that above mentioned. The other three are not important, as they are not noticed by this Court. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, and assessed their damages to eighteen hundred dollars, with interest, &c. that sum being founded on the agreement.

The Court gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendant appealed.

Stanard, for the appellee.

June 8. JUDGE GREEN.

The plaintiffs in the Court below, originally filed two several declarations, with distinct conclusions, "to their damage of $5000, and therefore, they bring suit, &c." The first of these declarations, set out the written contract between the parties, and alleged that they had always been 348 "ready, and were still ready, to perform the contract on their part; but, that the defendant had failed and refused to pay the purchase money of the lot; but alleged no promise or assumpsit by the defendant. The second declaration follows the first, and is connected by these words; "and afterwards, to wit," &c. and alleges an assumpsit by the defendant, in consideration of a lot sold to him by the plaintiffs; and then follows a count upon a general indebitatus assumpsit, for money had and received. Then follows the assignment of breaches upon the two last counts, and the conclusion "to their damage," &c. To this declaration, or these declarations, the defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and issue was joined. At a subsequent Term, the plaintiffs had leave to amend their declaration, and the record proceeds, "which was accordingly awarded, and which declaration so amended, is in these words and figures, following, to wit." This declaration is perfect in all its parts, having the regular commencement, statement of the cause of action, and conclusion. It contains a single count upon an assumpsit, in consideration of the agreement set out in the declaration. The defendant had liberty to plead de novo, and pleaded non assumpsit, upon which, issue was joined.

If it were material to the decision of this cause, I should think, that the amended declaration, plea, and issue thereupon, were substitutes for the former pleadings, which were no longer a part of the record, although one of the exceptions speaks of the first count of the declaration, as one that was in issue before the jury. It is, however, unnecessary to decide this question; since, if the first set of pleadings are considered as a part of the record, any errors in them, which might have been fatal upon demurrer, are cured by the Statute of Jeofails.

The great objection insisted on by the appellant, is, that upon the true construction of the contract, a conveyance of a good title to the lot sold by the appellees to him, was a condition precedent to their right, to demand the purchase 349 "money; and, that such a conveyance, or offer to convey, was neither alleged in the pleadings, nor proved upon the trial. If such were the true construction of the contract, the failure to allege a conveyance, or a tender of a conveyance, in the declaration, would, after verdict, have been cured by the Statute of Jeofails. Yet the plaintiff would have been bound to prove such conveyance or tender upon the trial. It is a general rule, that no party can be called upon to prove, upon the trial, any matter not alleged by him in his pleadings; unless the fact not alleged, is necessarily implied from the facts stated in the declaration or other pleading. As, if a feoffment is pleaded without alleging livery, livery must be proved; because there can be no feoffment without livery. Spieres v. Parker, 1 Term Rep. 145. 1 Saund. 228, note 1. In such cases, after verdict, even at the common law, all matters so necessarily implied from what was alleged, were presumed to have been proved on the trial, since the party might be called on to prove them; and the omission to aver such matters in the pleadings, was cured by the verdict. But, if some matter collateral to the fact in issue, and necessary to the right of the party, was omitted in the pleadings, the party could not be called upon to prove such collateral fact, upon the trial; and therefore, it was not after verdict presumed to have been proved, and consequently, such omission was not cured by verdict at the common law. Of this, several examples are cited in the note to Saunders, before referred to. In Collins v. Gibbs, 2 Burr. 899, it was held, that when a promise depends upon the performance of something to be first done, by him to whom the promise is made, and in an action upon such promise, the declaration does not aver performance by the plaintiff, after verdict for the plaintiff, the omission is cured by the common law; because the plaintiff might be called upon to prove his performance at the trial, and from the finding of the jury, it is presumed, that he did prove his performance. This is the explanation given by the note in Saunders, of that case.

350 *The question is, whether the conveyance of a good title, or tender of such conveyance, was a condition precedent in this case, to the demand of the purchase money. If it was not, then there was no necessity to allege in the pleadings, or prove at the trial, any such conveyance or tender. If it was, then, although after verdict, the omission to make such an allegation in the pleadings, is cured by the Statute of Jeofails, and indeed would have been cured at the common law. The plaintiffs were bound to prove such conveyance or tender upon the trial: They failed to do so; for the tender, such as it was, was made long after the time appointed for the payment of the purchase money.

The case of Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund. 319, appears to be a case in point. There the contract was, that the defendant should give the plaintiff 775l. for all his lands, the money to be paid at mid-summer 1668; and the Court held, that the conveyance of the land was not a condition precedent to the demand for the money. In the case at bar, the contract is, that the plaintiffs agree to sell and convey to the defendant, a lot at the rate of $40, for each front foot, one half at next Christmas, and the other half in twelve months thereafter. In both these cases, no time is limited for the conveyance of the property, and a time is limited for the payment of the purchase money; and according to the rule laid down, in Thorp v. Thorp, 1 Salk. 171, when the money is to be paid at an appointed time, and the day of payment is to happen, or may happen, before the thing which is the consideration of the payment of the money is to be performed, the performance of the thing is not a condition precedent to the right to demand the money. A general undertaking to pay money, without specifying the time of payment, obliges the party to pay immediately; but an undertaking to do any collateral act, as to convey lands, entitles the party to perform it at any time during his life, unless hastened by the request of the other party. Here the purchaser had a right to demand a conveyance immediately, 351 and so the parties understood *it; as is proved by the stipulation to make improvements; and upon a demand made, and a failure to convey, they might have maintained an action upon the covenant, before payment of the purchase money. But, the defendant never called upon the plaintiffs to convey the lot according to their contract; and until such a demand is made, and they fail, upon such demand, to make the conveyance of a good title, they are in no default, and have not violated their agreement. The defendant may now call upon them for a conveyance, and if they fail to convey a good title, recover damages for the breach of their agreement. In this case, the conveyance of the land, not only might, upon the terms of the agreement, be properly made after the time appointed for the payment of the money; but in the events which have happened, it may now be made in pursuance of the contract, long after that time. Upon this point, I think there is no error in the judgment.

As to the exception to the instruction of the Court, in respect to the measure of damages, I do not remember that this was relied upon in the argument of the cause. That instruction was right. The stipulated price of property sold is certainly the proper measure of damages for the non-performance of the contract, if no evidence is offered to shew that under the circumstances, some other measure is more proper.

The judgment should be affirmed.

The other Judges concurred, and the judgment was affirmed.*

An appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Essex county.

The administrator of Joshua Ward brought an action of assumpsit for money had and received, against Austin Brockenbrough. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit; and issue joined. At the trial, the defendant tendered a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, and moved the Court to compel the plaintiff to join therein; but the Court overruled the motion, and the defendant excepted. The evidence set forth in the demurrer is fully stated in the following opinion.

Stanard, for the appellant.

No Counsel, for the appellee.

June 9. JUDGE CABELL delivered the opinion of the Court. ||

This was an action on the case, for money had and received by Brockenbrough, the defendant, for the use of Ward's intestate, the plaintiff in the Court below. On the trial, the defendant, Brockenbrough, tendered a demurrer to the testimony, and moved the Court to compel the plaintiff to join therein, which motion was over-353 ruled *by the Court; to which opinion, the defendant excepted. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $2,698, from which Brockenbrough appealed to this Court.

It was very fairly and properly admitted by the counsel for the appellant, that if the evidence set forth in the demurrer shews that the plaintiff was entitled to recover in this action, the judgment of the Superior Court must be affirmed.

The case made in the demurrer is substantially this: On the 16th of January, 1810, Austin Brockenbrough, the appellant, and Joshua Ward, the intestate of the appellee, entered into articles of agreement, under their hands and seals, by which Brockenbrough agreed to sell to Ward a tract of land to which he was entitled in right of his wife, for the price of 1,236l. which price, Ward agreed to pay, with interest from the date of the agreement, at two instalments, the first of which was to become due on the 1st of January, 1811. It was stipulated that Ward should assign to Brockenbrough, on demand, a good bond for 60l. and also three other bonds executed by one Cotterell, due in 1816, 1817 and 1818; which bonds were the intention and meaning of the parties, and the good sense of the case. Hotham v. East India Company, 1 T. R. 638; Porter v. Sheppard, 6 T. R. 665; Campbell v. Jones, 6 T. R. 570; Morton v. Lamb, 7 T. R. 125. And where an act is to be done by one party by way of condition precedent to his right to claim performance on the part of the other, he cannot claim such performance without averring the doing of such act or his readiness and offer to do it. Thorpe v. Thorpe, Lord Raym. 662; Collins v. Gibbs, 2 Burr. 899; Brockenbrough v. Ward, 4 Rand. 352."

To the point that covenants are dependent or independent according to the intention and meaning of the parties and the good sense of the case, and that technical words should give way to such intention, the principal case is cited in Snodgrass v. Wolf, 11 W. Va. 165; Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 780, 8 S. E. Rep. 766. See the principal case also cited in Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Rutherford, 95 Va. 779, 30 S. E. Rep. 383.

[The PRESIDENT and JUDGE COALTER absent.]

to be assigned to Brockenbrough as a security for the purchase money of the land: that Brockenbrough and wife were to make Ward a deed for the land, in a convenient time, and Ward was to make Brockenbrough a mortgage on the land, to secure the payment of the purchase money, with the interest thereon. Brockenbrough, moreover, agreed to take slaves at valuation, in payment of the purchase money, as it should become due. Ward was to take immediate possession of the land, and hold it under the agreement. He took possession accordingly; but he left the country in 1811, and has not since been heard of. Brockenbrough re-possessed himself of the land, (at what particular time is not stated,) and sold and conveyed in fee simple to one Healey, at the price of five dollars per acre, being the best price which could then be had for the same; and the 354 wife of Brockenbrough, (who *was the owner of the fee,) joined in the conveyance, and has since died. Brockenbrough received the money due on Cotterell's bonds, and on being applied to by Ward's representative some time in 1818, to pay the same, said he would pay it after deducting the loss he had sustained in the second sale, which was three dollars per acre.

The question is, whether Ward's representative is entitled to recover, under the circumstances above stated, the money received by Brockenbrough on account of Cotterell's bonds.

Cotterell's bonds were assigned to Brockenbrough, not in payment for the land, but merely as a security for the payment of the purchase money. So long, therefore, as Brockenbrough had a right to demand the purchase money of the land, he had a right to retain in his hands Cotterell's bonds, or so much of the money received therefor, as should not exceed the purchase money and interest. But, so soon as the purchase money, with the interest, should be paid, or the purchaser should be forever discharged from the liability to pay it, it would be manifestly unjust for the vendor to retain what he had received merely as a pledge or security for the purchase money. He became bound, ex oequo et bono, to restore it; and the action of assumpsit for money had and received, is the proper action to compel him to do so.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to enquire into the character of the covenants between the parties in this case. If they were independent, it would be no objection to an action brought by Brockenbrough for the purchase money, that he had not complied with the covenant on his part. But, if the covenants were dependent; if the covenant, on the part of Brockenbrough to convey the land, was a condition precedent to the obligation on the part of the purchaser to pay the purchase money, without alleging a conveyance, or a tender to convey; he could maintain no action for the purchase money, without alleging a conveyance or a tender to convey.

355 *Covenants are to be considered to be either dependent or independent of each other, according to the intention and meaning of the parties, and the good sense of the case, and technical words should give way to such intention." Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund. 319, note 4. Hotham v. East India Company, 6 Term Rep. 571. Porter v. Sheppard, Ib. 668. Campbell v. Jones, Ib. 571. Moreton v. Lamb, 7 Term Rep. 130. Here Brockenbrough was to convey in convenient time; but that stipulation is limited and explained by the subsequent stipulation that Ward was to give a mortgage to secure the purchase money, the first instalment of which was to fall due on the 1st of January, 1811. This clearly and incontestably proves, that the parties intended that Brockenbrough should convey the land, before the purchase money was payable. Now, it is settled law, that when a day is appointed for the payment of money, and the day is to happen after the thing, which is the consideration of the money is to be performed, no action can be maintained for the money, before performance. Thorpe v. Thorpe, 1 Salk. 171, 2d resolution. Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund. 319, note 4. Brockenbrough's covenant was, therefore, a condition precedent to his right to demand the purchase money; and as his conveyance of the land to another, has forever put it out of his power to comply with that condition precedent, it follows, that Ward's representatives can never be under any obligation to pay the purchase money, and consequently, that Brockenbrough is bound, ex æquo et bono, to restore what he had received merely as a pledge to secure its payment.

The judgment is affirmed.

June, 1826.

Execution—Service of.—An execution issued upon a judgment by a justice of the peace, from the Court of a county or corporation, cannot be served by a constable, except in the city of Richmond.

Perkins brought a suit in the name of the Governor, in the Superior Court of Petersburg, against Stokes, as surety for Hawks, a constable of the said town, in his official bond. The breach assigned is, that judgments were obtained from a magistrate of the said town, in favor of the said Perkins: that executions of Ca. Sa. issued from the Hustings Court of Petersburg, and the defendant arrested; but the said Hawks negligently and voluntarily permitted the prisoner to escape and go at large, whereby an action accrued to demand and have of the said Hawks the amount of the said execution, &c. and of Stokes as his surety, &c.

The defendant pleaded conditions performed.

The jury found for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court, on the following facts: that two writs of Ca. Sa. in favor of Perkins against a certain T. Richardson, were put into the hands of Hawks, as constable, and by him returned: [These writs issued from the office of the Court of Hustings, with a return upon them by Hawks, "Executed and in custody, and was rescued from my custody by violence, &c."] that the said Hawks did not make fresh pursuit on the escape of the said Richardson, &c.

The Court gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

Spooner, for the appellant.

Leigh, for the appellee.

357 *June 7. JUDGE GREEN.

This is an action upon the official bond of a constable, against one of his sureties, to recover the amount of two executions of Ca. Sa. issued from the Hustings Court of Petersburg, in favor of the relator, and directed to the constable, and by him executed. The defendant was rescued from the custody of the constable, who failed to make fresh pursuit. Several questions are raised. The first and principal, and indeed the only one, in which the parties seem to feel any interest, is, whether a Ca. Sa. or other execution issued upon a judgment by a magistrate, from the Court of the county or corporation, can be directed to, and executed by, a constable. If not, the serving of such an execution is no part of his duty as constable, and does not come within the terms of his official bond.

A careful attention to the history of our laws upon the subject of warrants for small debts, will, I think, solve this question without difficulty.

From the year 1748, to the present time, a provision has existed in our Statutes, prohibiting any magistrate from issuing a Ca. Sa. upon any judgment upon a warrant. The Act of 1806, directs that any justice of the peace shall have power to issue executions to be directed to the constable, or other officer, of any county or corporation, where the party resides, and that the constable, or other officer, to whom an execution shall be directed by a justice of the peace, shall, if he can find no property, make return thereof to the clerk of the county or corporation, who shall docket the same; and the party shall be entitled to such execution thereon, as if the judgment had been rendered in Court; and upon such executions the same proceedings shall be had as upon executions founded on judgments rendered in Court. Under this law, executions issuing from the clerk's office, on the judgment of a justice, could only be directed to the sheriff; for, executions upon judgments rendered in Court could only be directed to him.

358 *The Act of 1809, ch. 12, in the 1st section, directed that no sheriff or deputy sheriff should serve any warrant for small debts; but that such warrants should be directed to, and served by, some constable. The 3d section directed, that all executions awarded on any judgment rendered by any justice of the peace, should be directed to some constable of the county, who should levy and return the same, agreeably to the provisions of the Act of 1806.

The question is, whether the 3d section of the Act of 1809, extends to executions issued from the clerk's office, upon judgments given by a justice of the peace. I think not. The 3d section expressly directs, that the executions, which it provides shall be directed to a constable, shall be returned by him, as directed by the Act of 1806. That Act gives no direction for the return of an execution, except that the constable, or other officer, if he can find no property, shall return executions issued by a justice of the peace, to the clerk. It is to this return that the Act of 1809 refers; which is wholly inapplicable to executions issuing from the clerk's office, after such a return is made. Under the Act of 1806, warrants and executions might be directed to a sheriff, as well as to a constable. This encroached upon the profits of the constable's office; and I think the Act of 1809, was intended only to transfer to the constables exclusively, the profits of serving warrants and executions issued by justices of the peace, and that the first and third section were intended solely to effect that object.

This conclusion is fortified by other considerations. There is no fee allowed to the constable for serving a Ca. Sa. nor is any direction given as to the disposition of a prisoner arrested by a constable under a Ca. Sa. or in any other, except criminal cases. Nor is there any summary remedy given for money made by a constable by any execution, but upon such as are directed to him by a justice of the peace; nor any fine for failing to return an execution, except fines to be imposed by a justice of the peace. *Provisions on these subjects would probably have been thought indispensable, if the Act had contemplated that executions from the clerk's office, on a justice's judgment, could be directed to, and served by, a constable. I observe too, that there is a legislative exposition of the Statutes. They are incorporated in the Revision of 1819; and in 1820, a special Act passed, authorising executions of that description to be directed to, and served by, a constable, in the city of Richmond.

The judgment should be reversed, and final judgment given for the appellant.

The other Judges concurred, and the judgment was reversed.*

Porter v. Nekervis.

June, 1826.

Pleading and Practice—Action by Cashier of Bank.—An action brought in the name of A. B. Cashier of a certain Bank, is an action brought by A. B. individually, and the phrase Cashier, &c. is mere surplusage.

Same—How Corporation Can Sue.—A corporation can only sue in the name and style given to it by law.

*THE PRESIDENT and JUDGE COALTER absent.
Nonnegotiable Paper—Who May Maintain Suit on.—In Sangston v. Gordon, 22 Gratt. 755, the suit had relation to bonds made payable to "L. Sangston, secretary of the Baltimore Agricultural Aid Society." At page 764, the court said: "This form of security was no doubt adopted to enable him to sue for and collect the debts due the society, without the expense and inconvenience of his bringing before the courts the numerous parties interested in the proceeds of sale. It is clear that the legal interest in these bonds is vested in Sangston alone. Upon well-settled principles the descriptive words used in the instruments may be rejected, and suits at law or in equity may be maintained thereon in his name, without the addition of other parties. Porter v. Nekervis, 4 Rand. 359; Clarkson v. Doddridge, 14 Gratt. 42; Coffman v. Sangston, 21 Gratt. 263."
Corporations—Suits by and against.—It is true that corporations are mere legal creatures, and must sue and be sued in their true names. First Nat. Bank v. Distilling Co., 41 W. Va. 534, 23 S. E. Rep. 794, citing principal case as authority. To the same point the principal case is cited in Stewart v. Thornton, 75 Va. 217.

Set-Off—Joint and Separate Demands—Partnership and Separate Demands.—Joint and separate demands cannot be set-off against each other; nor can partnership and separate demands be set-off against each other.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Henrico county. It was an action of debt brought on a promissory note made by Edwin Porter to John Adams, endorsed by the latter to Samuel G. Adams, and by him endorsed to "William Nekervis, Cashier of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia." Nekervis declared, by the style above-mentioned, against Porter, the maker 360 of the note. The declaration alleges that "the said plaintiff, on behalf of the president, directors and company of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, caused notice thereof (i. e. of the time of payment having elapsed) to be given, and payment to be demanded of said note from said defendant," &c.

The defendant pleaded nil debet, and demurred generally.

The Court gave judgment for the plaintiff on the demurrer; and the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff on the plea. Judgment for the plaintiff.

At the trial, the defendant filed a bill of exceptions to an opinion of the Court, stating, that he offered in evidence certain paper writings, as set-offs against the plaintiff's demand, which were excluded by the Court. These papers consisted of negotiable notes, executed by James Jenkins and John Adams (one of the endorsers of the note on which this suit was brought) to J. & S. Cosby, and endorsed by the latter in blank. The defendant offered evidence to prove, that the said notes were assigned to him, before notice of the assignment of the note in the declaration mentioned, was given to the defendant. But the court excluded this evidence, on the ground that they were evidences of joint, and not of separate, or joint and separate debts, and therefore were not mutual in relation to the plaintiff's demand.

The defendant appealed.

Daniel, for the appellant.

Scott and Nicholas, for the appellee.

June 10. JUDGE CARR.

Two points were made by the appellants in this cause: 1st, On the demurrer to the declaration: 2d, On the question of set-off. The writ is to answer W. Nekervis, cashier, endorsee of S. G. Adams, 361 who was endorsee of John *Adams.

The declaration counts thus: "William Nekervis, cashier of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, endorsee of Sam'l. G. Adams, who was endorsee of John Adams."

Set-Off—Joint and Separate Demands.—In Christian v. Miller, 3 Leigh 82, it is said: "The action was a joint action against two, and the set-off attempted was the individual demand of one of the defendants against the obligee. It is vain and useless to speculate now upon the reasonableness of permitting or refusing such a set-off: it has been too frequently settled by the practice of the courts, that such a set-off is not allowable, for the court now to act upon a different principle. Ritchie v. Moore, 5 Munf. 388; Porter v. Nekervis, 4 Rand. 450." To the point that joint and separate demands cannot be set off against each other, the principal case is also cited in Gilliat v. Lynch, 2 Leigh 506; Green v. Buckner, 6 Leigh 84; Choen v. Guthrie, 15 W. Va. 102; Elliott v. Bell, 37 W. Va. 835, 17 S. E. Rep. 899.

Partnership.—See monographic note on "Partnership" appended to Scott v. Trent, 1 Wash. 77.

The plaintiff complains of E. Porter, &c. The declaration then describes the note and its different endorsements, the last of which is thus described: "And the said S. G. Adams, afterwards, to wit, at the said county, by endorsement on said note, transferred the same for value received, to the said plaintiff." It then states, that the note becoming due, "the plaintiff, on behalf of the president, directors and company, of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, caused notice to be given, payment demanded," &c. and concludes thus; "by reason whereof, an action hath accrued to the plaintiff, cashier as aforesaid," &c. The note is a simple promissory note, not negotiable and payable at any Bank; and must, therefore, stand on the general ground of such paper. The demurrer is general, that the declaration and matters therein contained, are not sufficient in law for the said W. Nekervis, as cashier of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, to have and maintain his action thereof against the defendant. The sole question is, can W. Nekervis, cashier, &c. maintain the action on the note?

By our Act of Assembly, assignments of all bonds, bills, promissory notes, &c. shall be valid, and the assignee may maintain any action in his own name, which the obligee or payee might have brought. Who is the assignee of this note? W. Nekervis, cashier. If the endorsement had been to W. Nekervis, without the addition of cashier, there could be no doubt, I presume, that he would have had the legal right to sue in his own name. Can the addition of cashier, or cashier of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, prevent that right from vesting? If so, it must be because it transfers the right to some other person or body; and that other, can only be the Bank. Is this an assignment to the Farmers' Bank of Virginia? In the argument, it was said, and truly, that corporations were mere legal creations, and could have no name, no existence,

362 no attributes, *but those imparted to them by the law. The law creating this Bank, enacts, that it shall be a corporation and body politic, in law and in fact, by the name and style of the president, directors and company, of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia; and by the name and style aforesaid, are hereby made able and capable in law, to have, purchase, receive, possess and enjoy, goods, chattels, &c. to sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, &c. Suppose the president, directors and company of the Farmers' Bank, had sued on this note, and described it as assigned to them; and in support of their action, had produced the note as it is. Would it not have been objected at once, that the note was not properly described, and could not go to the jury: that the Bank could only take by their corporate style: that an endorsement to W. Nekervis, cashier, was not an endorsement to the president, directors and company of the Farmers' Bank? Yes; and it seems to me, that this objection, would have been fatal: that the endorsement to W. Nekervis, cashier, transferred to the Bank, no legal right to sue in its corporate character. It follows,

I think, that the assignment vested in Nekervis himself, the legal right to sue; for that would seem a strange construction, which would allow neither to Nekervis nor the Bank, the right to sue.

It was contended, that the declaration bears on the face of it, that it was brought in right of the Bank, and for their benefit; and that this is a sort of paper, in which, by its charter, the Bank is forbidden to deal; and in which, it can therefore hold neither a legal nor equitable interest. It would be necessary to decide, whether the Bank could, under any circumstances, deal in such paper, if the declaration did really aver that the suit was prosecuted in right of the Bank and for its use; but I cannot understand it to make such averment. The plaintiff styles himself cashier, and says, the action hath accrued, "to the plaintiff, cashier aforesaid;" but surely, this is not stating, that the right, either legal or equitable, is in the Bank. It was 363 *urged, that the declaration stated, that the notice was given, and the protest made, in behalf of the Bank. This is true; but I consider this as no part of the claim, or description of the claim, of the plaintiff. It is in truth, mere surplusage; there being no need whatever, to state in the declaration, the protest of the note. Nor indeed, was there any use or necessity to protect the note at all, it being a common note, and not negotiable paper. The statement then, that it was protested in behalf of the Bank, (a thing in pais) does not make it a declaration in right of the Bank, or for its benefit. The true mode in which to have put this matter in issue, would have been to have pleaded it. But, upon a demurrer to this declaration, the question cannot arise. Upon the whole, I think the demurrer was properly over-ruled.

The second point is, did the Judge err in refusing to permit the joint notes of Jenkins and Adams, to be set-off against the note executed to Adams singly?

I had considered this question settled. Numerous cases might be cited from the English books, from the decisions of our sister States, and from the Federal Court, concurring una voce, in declaring that joint and separate demands, cannot be set-off against each other; and the decisions in our own Court, have been uniform and strong to the same point. Scott v. Trent; Armistead v. Butler; Ritchie and Wales v. Moor. Surely, these cases ought to be considered as leaving this point no longer open to question. The last case cited, was very elaborately argued, and, I have no doubt, carefully examined by the Court. The opening counsel, though contending very ably against the general doctrine, admitted, that "if one plaintiff sue for a debt due to him individually, the defendant cannot set-off a debt due him from the plaintiff, and another jointly." This is the very case before the Court; and Judge Roane, delivering the opinion of the Court, says in the close of his remarks, "This view of the case is decisive of the question, unless in this action against a com-

364 pany, we are *authorised to allow a set-off of a debt due to an individual partner. The law is too strongly settled in the negative, and has been too often recognised by this Court, to authorise us to do it, admitting that as an original question, it ought to have been settled otherwise, which the Court is by no means prepared to admit."

A distinction was attempted in the argument, between joint debts, and partnership debts. But, as none of the cases acknowledge such distinction; as no authority, or dictum even, was cited in support of it; and as I can see no difference in reason between the two cases; I am for abiding by the decisions; being always unwilling quieta movere.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

The other Judges concurred, and the judgment was affirmed.*

365 *Nichols and Others v. Covey, &c.

June, 1828.

Patent—Prior Claim Included in Its Courses—What Passes.—Where a patent is issued in pursuance of the Act of 1788, (2 Rev. Code, 434,) which includes in its general courses, a prior claim it does not pass to the patentee the title of the Commonwealth in and to the lands covered by such prior claim, subject only to the title, whatever it may be, in the prior claimant; but, if that title is only a prior entry, and becomes vacated by neglect to survey and return the plat, any one may lay a warrant on the same, as in other cases of vacant and unappropriated lands.

Commonwealth's Warrant—Purchase of.—The purchase of a warrant from the Commonwealth, and an entry in consequence thereof, is not a purchase of the land itself, until the entry is carried into grant.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Montgomery county, where Nichols and others brought ejectment against Covey and others, for a message and five hundred acres of land. Issue being joined, the jury found a special verdict to the following effect: that a grant issued to Nichols on the 28th day of March, 1796, for 45,000 acres, by a survey dated 12th of June, 1795, with this exception, that "the survey, upon which this grant is founded, includes 6,800 acres of prior claims (exclusive of 45,000 acres) which, having a preference by law to the warrant and right upon which this grant is founded, liberty is reserved that the same shall be firm and valid, and may be carried into grant or grants, and this grant shall be no bar in either law or equity to the confirmation of the title or titles to the same, as before mentioned and reserved, with the appurtenances;" that on the 18th of April, 1789, Hall and Graison made an entry in the surveyor's office of Montgomery county, for 100 acres of land, and the grant issued to Nichols above mentioned includes within its boundaries the land contained in the aforesaid entry: that Hall, one of the persons mentioned in the entry aforesaid, withdrew the said entry, and made an entry to include the said land, in his own name: that there was no survey made on the first entry aforesaid in the name of Hall and Graison: that on the 10th of February, 1809, a survey was made on the entry made in the name of Hall: 366 *that on the 10th of April, 1815, a grant issued to Godby, to whom Hall had assigned his entry: that the land contained in the last mentioned grant lies within the boundary of the grant issued to Nichols, the lessor of the plaintiff, and is the land in controversy: that Godby and Covey were in possession of the land contained in the grant issued to the said Godby, on the 19th day of November, 1819: that the surveyor of Montgomery county, in platting out the 6,800 acres of prior claims mentioned in the first mentioned grant, took into estimation the claim of the said Hall and Graison to the land in their entry as aforesaid contained: that the 500 acres of land, in the declaration mentioned, is part of the land contained in the grant aforesaid to Nichols, and includes the land in controversy, &c.

The Court gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Leigh, for the appellant.

No Counsel, for the appellee.

June 13. JUDGE COALTER delivered his opinion.

The question in this case is, whether a patent, issued in pursuance of the Act of 1788, (2 Rev. Code, 434,) which includes in its general courses a prior claim, is to be considered as passing to the patentee, the title of the Commonwealth in and to the lands covered by such prior claim, subject only to the title, whatever it may be in the prior claimant; so that if that title, as in the case before us, is only a prior entry, subject to be vacated by neglect to survey, and return the plat, as is also this case, no one can enter therefor, as in other cases of lands so becoming vacant and subject to future entry and patent; but, that the patentee of the inclusive survey, is to hold the same against all the world, save the prior claimant, and the particular right under which he held.

367 *In the case before us, the prior claimant forfeited the right he then claimed by, and again re-entered, surveyed, and obtained a patent for the same land, for which the inclusive patentee has brought his ejectment, claiming to recover the land under his patent issued as aforesaid. If any other person had a right to enter for this land, after the original claim became vacated as aforesaid, it was equally competent for the original claimant, as it was for the patentee of the inclusive grant, to do so.

The Commonwealth, although she has sold and received payment for the warrant, by which an entry is made, has never sold the land which is covered by it, until the entry is carried into grant. The warrant may, at any time, be withdrawn, either before or after the entry becomes vacant as aforesaid, and may be again applied, either in the purchase of that, or any other vacant and unappropriated land. No taxes can be charged for such land, until it is granted to some one by patent. Why is it then, that the Commonwealth shall not be at liberty to sell, and receive payment for, and collect taxes on, lands included within the bounds of such patent, but reserved out of the grant, remaining unpaid for by the inclusive patentee, and for which he is in no wise chargeable for taxes? It cannot arise from any equity in the Statute in his favor. He says he will not pay for it, or subject himself to pay taxes for it, because the Commonwealth cannot grant it to him; and therefore he desires that it may be reserved out of his grant, and that he may pay only for the residue, and be taxed accordingly. The law in relation to surplus lands applies to cases where the patent has issued for the whole tract, and can only be extended to this case, on the postulate that the whole passed; but, that is the question first to be decided. There may be no mistake or fraud in the surveyor in this case; no surplus land, if this prior claim is excluded; and that remedy on behalf of the Commonwealth, can only be applied within a given time, and under particular circumstances. The law, too, under which this patent issued, 368 *was soon found to be productive of frauds and mischiefs, and was consequently repealed; so that I think a very liberal, or what might be called an equitable construction, ought not to be given to it. The party gets all the land he paid for, or for which he is chargeable for taxes, and ought to be satisfied.

I think, therefore, that the judgment should be affirmed.

The other Judges concurred, and the judgment was affirmed.*

Starke's Executors v. Littlepage.

June, 1826.

Evidence under Seal—Impeachment by Parol Evidence.

Parol evidence is admissible to impeach evidence under seal, on the ground of fraud.

In Pari Delicto—Application of Rule.—The rule in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis, does not apply, where the policy of the law requires that a fraudulent or vicious conveyance should be enforced, and therefore—

Fraudulent Conveyance—Enforcement by Grantee.

Where a debtor makes a fraudulent conveyance of his property, for the purpose of protecting it from his creditors, the fraudulent grantee may enforce such conveyance in a Court of Law, and the debtor will not be allowed to defeat the claim, by proving the fraud. Decided by two Judges out of three.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Hanover, where the executors of Starke brought an action of detinue against Littlepage, to recover certain slaves. Issue was joined, on the plea of non detinet; and the jury found a verdict for the defendant. At the trial, the plaintiffs filed a bill of exceptions to the introduction of evidence on the part of the defendant, to prove that the alleged sale, from the latter to the former, was a fraudulent transaction; but the Court suffered the evidence to go to the jury. The 369 whole *case is so fully stated in the opinions which follow, that a reference to them will be sufficient.

June 13. JUDGE GREEN.

This was an action by the appellants against the appellee, for sundry slaves. Upon the trial of the issue of non detinet, the plaintiffs gave in evidence an execution of Fi. Fa. in the name of Mary Norvell against John C. Littlepage, (the defendant in this cause,) Thomas Starke, (the testator of the plaintiffs in this cause,) and John Starke, on which the sheriff returned on the 15th of December, 1798, "made on this execution by the sale of negro Judy and her two children, Nancy and Maria, purchased by Thomas Starke, forty-five pounds." They also produced several papers in the hand-writing of the defendant, and signed by him, one dated April 2, 1804, in these words: "I do hereby certify, that Judy and her family, that are now in my possession, (and were some years ago purchased by Major Thomas Starke, at a sheriff's sale,) are held by me on the same terms that they have been for some years past; and I consider myself bound to Major Starke for the hire agreed upon between us for them." Another, dated the 20th of March, 1809, in these words: "I do hereby certify, that Judy and her family are now in my possession, and were purchased some years ago at a sheriff's sale, by Major Thomas Starke; are held by me on the same terms that they have been for some years past; that is to say, I am to pay hire for them;" and on the back of the last one, in these words: "I do hereby acknowledge and renew the within writing or agreement, between Major Thomas ‡Fraudulent Conveyance—Effect between Parties.—In Owen v. Sharp, 12 Leigh 429, it is said: "A fraudulent conveyance, though void as to creditors, is good between the parties. Being valid between the parties, it follows, that the fraudulent grantor cannot be permitted to allege his fraud to avoid his deed. Accordingly, this principle was settled as early as the case of Hawes v. Leader, Cro. Jac. 270, and authority cited and relied upon in Starke v. Littlepage, 4 Rand. 368, as being founded on sound principles of law and policy. The case of Starke v. Littlepage furnishes a striking illustration of the rule. The suit was brought by the representatives of the fraudulent grantee, to enforce the fraudulent conveyance; the debtor had continued in possession of the property, and he was not permitted to protect that possession, by showing that his deed was fraudulent. JUDGE CALVERT, who dissented from the majority of the court, did not controvert the general principle; he only differed as to the mode of its application; in his opinion, the parties were in pari delicto; he thought, that and another at the foot of the last mentioned writing, in "these words: 370 "I do hereby renew and re-acknowledge the above and within writing. Given under my hand and seal, this 4th day of November, 1818." These two last were signed and sealed by the defendant. The suit was instituted, March 24th, 1819.

To repel this evidence of title offered by the plaintiffs, the defendant offered to introduce the parol acknowledgment of Thomas Starke, made contemporaneously and subsequently to the sale, and other parol evidence, for the purpose of proving, that the purchase by the plaintiff's testator of the slaves in the sheriff's return mentioned, at the said sheriff's sale, was not a real and bona fide purchase of the same, but was made with the defendant's money, and was intended by the said plaintiff's testator and the defendant, as a cover to protect the said defendant's property from execution by the other creditors of the said defendant. This evidence was objected to as incompetent by the plaintiffs; but the Court over-ruled the objection, the evidence was given to the jury, and they found for the defendant.

The evidence offered by the defendant, is objected to on two grounds; first, that it was not competent to the party to give parol evidence to impeach his acknowledgment of the plaintiff's title, under his hand and seal; and secondly, that he could not give in evidence his and Starke's fraud upon his creditors, to impeach Starke's title, under the acknowledged sale to him by the sheriff under the execution.

The first objection is well founded as a general rule; but has no effect in this case. If the defence, grounded upon the alleged fraud, was admissible, then the evidence to prove the fraud was also admissible; so that the last objection to the admission of the evidence, is the only real question in the cause.

This objection, I think, should prevail. The proof of the sale offered by the plaintiffs is complete, and acknowledged by the defendant. The Statute of Frauds 371 avoids "fraudulent transfers of property only against creditors or subsequent purchasers, leaving them to operate as between the parties, as they operated at the common law; and it has been determined both at law and in equity, that a combination between the plaintiff and defendant to defraud creditors, does not invalidate the legal effect which the transaction would have, as between the parties, if there had been no fraud. The maxim, nemo allegans suam turpitudinem est audiendus, once applied to a different purpose, seems to be justly applicable to a case like this.

In the case of Hawes v. Leader, Cro. James, 270, (reported also in Yelv. 196, and Brownlow, 112,) this point has been decided at law, and has never since been questioned, but uniformly recognised as good law, as in Orlbar v. Harrison, Cumb. 348, by Holt, Chief Justice. In that case, the intestate of the defendant granted by deed to the plaintiff, all his goods contained in a schedule, and covenanted to deliver them quietly to the plaintiff. After the death of the grantor, the grantee brought an action of debt against his administrator, for the goods mentioned in the schedule. The defendant pleaded, that his intestate was largely indebted, specifying the debts, and that the deed was made by fraud and covin between his intestate and the plaintiff, to deceive those creditors, and that his intestate, notwithstanding the deed, used and occupied the goods during his life-time. To this plea, the plaintiff demurred, and had judgment upon the merits.

There is no case in equity, where relief has been given to the fraudulent grantor in such a case, except in that of Austin v. Winston, 1 Hen. & Munf. 33, decided by a divided Court. The relief given in that case, was founded upon the fact, that the grantee, a creditor, the debtor being in distressed circumstances, had availed himself of his power over him, to induce the debtor to unite in the fraud; the creditor having proposed and urged the execution of the scheme, which was adopted for that purpose. No circumstance of that sort is suggested in this case. The general 372 "rule, that a Court of Equity will give no relief to the fraudulent grantor in such case, is affirmed in Cary's Rep. 18, in which it is said to be a maxim, that, Frans non est fullere fallentem, and by the decision of this Court in Bishop v. Estes, (not reported.)

It is a general rule that "in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis;" and this was the principle of the civil law. "Porro autem, si et dantis et excipientis turpia causa sit, possessorem potiorum esse, et ideo repetitionem cessare." Dig. Lib. 12, tit. 5, (b) 8. But, this rule operates only in cases, where the refusal of the Courts to aid either party, frustrates the object of the transaction, and takes away the temptation to engage in contracts contra bonos mores, or violating the policy of the laws. If it be necessary, in order to discountenance such transactions, to enforce such a contract at law, or to relieve against it in equity, it will be done, though both the parties are in pari delicto. The party is not allowed to allege his own turpitude in such cases, when defendant at law, or prevented from alleging it when plaintiff in equity, whenever the refusal to execute the contract at law, or the refusal to relieve against it in equity, would give effect to the original purpose, and encourage the parties engaging in such transactions. Thus, if a man be bound upon condition to commit a crime, the contract may be avoided by the defendant. But, if a feoffment be made on the same condition, it is good and unavoidable. Co. Litt. 206. (b.) One of two joint wrong-doers cannot claim contribution against the other, at law or in equity; and a bond given for past cohabitation will not be relieved against in equity. But, a bond given for future cohabitation is void at law, (Wallace v. Perkins, 3 Burr. 1508,) and would in general be relieved against in equity. A bond or contract, in consideration of the sale of an office, even when not avoided by Statute, will be relieved against in equity. In these, and many other cases, collected in the notes to Fonblanque's Equity, ch. 4, sec. 4, the contract is enforced or avoided, both at law and in equity, as may best answer the purpose of discouraging the fraud, or contract against the policy of the law; and it is for this purpose, and not because the defendant is, in such cases, strictly entitled on his own account to be discharged from his contract, that the rule is established, that in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis; a rule which, in general, discourages vicious contracts, but which is not enforced, when it would counteract this policy of the law.

The cases of Montefiori v. Montefiori, 1 Black. 363, and Gay v. Wendon, 2 Freem. Rep. 101, afford a good illustration of these propositions. In the first case, a note was given by A. to this brother, who was absent to be married, to give him the appearance of being in better circumstances than he was. After the marriage, A. reclaimed this note, and arbitrators awarded it to be given up. The award was set aside as palpably against law; the Court holding that when upon proposals of marriage, third persons represent any thing material in a light different from the truth, even though by collusion with the husband, they shall make it good in the manner in which they represented it.

In the other case, a brother gave to his sister, upon her marriage, 150l. and she gave her bond to him privately, before the marriage, to return it. The husband died without issue; and the brother sued upon the bond at law. She filed a bill to be relieved, on the ground of the fraud. It was argued for the brother, that although the husband or his issue might, with good reason, claim relief in equity, yet there was no reason why she, who was particeps fraudis, should be relieved. But, the plaintiff was relieved, notwithstanding it was her own fraud.

The particeps fraudis, in the first case, recovered at law, and, in the second, was relieved in equity, because otherwise, the fraudulent arrangement would, in both cases, have had its intended effect, and served as an encouragement to the practice of similar frauds. To prevent this effect, it was necessary in both cases to reverse the general rule, that in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis. The circumstance that third persons were interested had no influence upon these decisions; certainly not on the last; for, no person was or could be interested, but she who was a participator in the fraud.

The case of Law v. Law, 3 P. Wms. 391, proceeds upon the same principle. In that case, the transaction was not intended to injure or defraud any third person, nor was it against the provisions of any Statute, but was contrary to the policy of the common law. Nor was there any advantage taken of the circumstances of the one party by the other; nor was it a case in which the policy of the violated law was to protect one party against the other; nor was there the slightest inequality in the demerits of the parties; so that the relief given in Chancery to the complainant, could have been founded on no other reason, than that to vacate such contracts by the active interference of the Court, was the only effectual means of discouraging such contracts. If the maxim that "in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis," had been considered as inflexible, or only yielding when the law violated was intended to protect one of the parties against the other, or where a fraud was practised on third persons; no relief could have been given to the plaintiff in that case, which was this: A. by his interest with the commissioners of the excise, procured for his brother B. a supervisor's place in that office, and in consideration thereof, B. gave a bond for the payment to 10l. per annum to A. as long as B. should continue in office. B. died, having for some years omitted the payment of the 10l. A. sued on the bond against the executrix of B. who filed her bill to be relieved against the bond; and it was decreed to be delivered up as a fraud upon the public; not because it took any thing from the public, but because it was against the policy of the law.

To this principle too, must be referred the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity, to compel the surrender of securities given for money won at unlawful gaming.

In such cases, the turpitude of the parties is precisely equal, and there is no other foundation for the jurisdiction of the Court interfering actively in favor of the plaintiff, but that such interference promotes effectually the policy of the law.

To allow a fraudulent debtor conveying his property to another, with intent to defraud his creditors, to allege that fraud for the purpose of avoiding the transfer, would be using the maxim of the law to frustrate the policy of that very maxim, by giving full effect to the fraudulent contrivance of the parties, according to their intent; and indeed, rather to enforce, than to frustrate, the fraudulent contract; and debtors might, with perfect impunity, practise frauds upon their creditors. I think, that the case of Hawes v. Leader, Cro. James, 270, is founded on sound principles of law and policy; that the judgment in this case ought to be reversed; and a new trial had, in which the evidence of the fraud, allowed to be given at the former trial, should not be admitted.

JUDGE COALTER.

The testator of the appellants, purchased the slaves in question, or their progenitors, at a sheriff's sale, under an execution against the appellee, about twenty years before the institution of this suit, with the money of the appellee, and under a fraudulent agreement between them, that the appellee should continue to hold the possession, acknowledging every five years that he so held under an agreement of some kind or other, and that he was to pay hires, in order to cover the property from the creditors of the appellee; when in reality, the property never was to be claimed by the testator, nor any hires to be paid.

In this situation, the property has remained as aforesaid for 20 years, and until the death of the testator. His executors, however, finding the written acknowledgments aforesaid, amongst his papers, have thought it their duty to 376 *sue for and recover the slaves, now amounting, men, women and children, to ten or twelve.

The fact of this combination, was strongly inferrible from the long possession of the appellee, as exhibited in the proof adduced by the appellants, under mere written acknowledgments of possession, under some undefined contract, and some agreement for hires, without specifying to what amount; but full proof of the whole was offered by the appellee, and admitted by the Court; and the question is, whether it was correctly admitted.

Let us suppose, that this claim was set up by the testator himself: that in addition to the fraud he had been aiding in as to creditors, he was seeking to violate his faith with the appellee, and recover the slaves; and that all this had appeared from his own shewing. Would it be a case a Court of Justice ought to lend him their aid? On the other hand, suppose he had gotten possession, and the appellee had come in upon the same evidence to regain it. Would he be heard? It seems to me, that this is one of those cases, in which the Courts ought to leave the parties where they leave themselves. They ought not to countenance or aid in such a scandalous transaction, and although there may not be strictly par delictum, (for I am not prepared to say, that a man who, under the guise of friendship, will take another's money and purchase in property for him, under circumstances of concealment, &c. by which a falling man seeks to postpone his creditors, and who shall violate that confidence and take the property to himself, is not guilty of a blacker crime than his necessitous and confiding neighbour,) yet it must be admitted, that in point of law, they are to be considered in pari delicto.

But, it is said, that we must aid even in a case as scandalous as this, by way of punishment on the fraudulent debtor, and as a salutary means of enforcing the law, and preventing such combinations. As to punishment, if that could be inflicted with some regard to the degree of the offence, and without benefiting him without 377 whose co-operation *it could not have been committed, and whose acquiescence and countenance may have been a strong temptation to carry it into effect, I would have no objection to see an adequate punishment imposed. But, the particeps criminis, who ought also to share in the punishment, is not a proper party to ask, or for whose benefit to inflict it. As it regards the good of society, I much doubt whether the example of a Court, sustaining and enforcing such a flagitious claim, thereby shielding it as it were, by the cloak of the law, is not calculated to do more harm than good. No man could, for a moment, sustain the claim of the testator to these slaves, on the score of morality or common honesty. But, let the Courts say, that he ought to punish the party in this way, for his attempt to defraud his creditors, and would not this at once hold out a temptation to the wicked and guileful, to tamper with necessitous and falling men; gain their confidence, and by entering into their schemes of this kind, get a fraudulent claim on their property, and recover it for themselves? They would be assured, if not entitled to praise and credit for thus punishing him by taking his property, that they would at least have the countenance of a Court in doing so.

Two cases that have been before this Court, Austin v. Winston, 1 Hen. & Munf. 33, and Bishop v. Estes, (not reported,) are sufficient proofs to me, that no temptation of this kind ought to be held out to designing men to entrap the necessitous and unwary.

On the other hand it may be said, that unless he can do so, the debtor may enter into combinations of this kind, with impunity, &c. But, this will not be so in general, because, as most frequently happens, his confederate must be put in possession; for, except where the property has been changed, as in this case, by a seizure and sale of a sheriff, or something of that kind, a pretended sale, the seller still remaining in possession, will not do. The fraudulent debtor frequently, and most generally, has to trust entirely to the good faith of his confederate; and I think 378 *it comports most with the dignity of the law, and of the Courts of Justice, to say to these parties, "You have no business here. You shall not call on a Court of Law, to enforce a contract that is contrary to law."

This was said in Collins v. Blanton, 2 Wils. 307, and it seems to me, is the better course, as well for public example, as to preserve that purity which belongs to the ermine of a Court of Justice, and which no polluted hand shall be permitted to soil. In the case of Austin v. Winston, 1 Hen. & Munf. 33, the fraudulent debtor came in to be relieved against the fraudulent purchaser, who had, partly by force and violence, and partly otherwise, gotten possession.

The maxim, "in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis," was admitted and applied by Judge Tucker to that case, who says, that without undertaking to balance the guilt of the parties, both appear so culpable, that had Austin been the plaintiff and Winston the defendant, he should have held him as little entitled to the aid of the Court as Winston. The other Judges, and particularly Judge Roane, did no consider it a case of par delictum, but that Winston had been seduced into the measure by Austin. But for this circumstance, I take it, they would have concurred throughout with Mr. Tucker.

The maxims, "volenti non fit injuria," and "in pari delicto, &c." have been sometimes applied to cases to which they do not belong; as in Tomkins v. Bernet, 1 Saik. 22, and so it was attempted to be applied in Clarke v. Shee, Cowp. 200; in Browning v. Morris, Ib. 790, and in Smith v. Bromley, Doug. 670, in a note. But, in these cases, there was not par delictum, and so the maxim was held not to apply.

There is another class of cases, too, in which it does not apply; as where third parties will be defrauded, or public policy evaded, in case the party who comes in shall not be sustained. Thus, it is of great consequence to the public, that marriages should be fairly and freely contracted; and so *marriage brokerage bonds, and cases where a bond is given, or money advanced, to induce one contracting party to believe that the other is in better circumstances, though there is a secret contract to cancel the bond, or return the money. All these cases are properly held not to be within the influence of the maxim; and it is remarked by Judge Roane, in Austin v. Winston, "that these agreements in fraud of marriage, must bind, on the ground that you cannot put the wife in statu quo, or unmarried the parties; and marriage is so much favoured in equity, that we are told, 3 P. Wms. 66, that it is a case, and perhaps the only case, in equity, in which a particeps criminis is permitted to avoid his own acts; so highly favoured is the consideration of marriage."

The doctrine he subscribes to, he says, is this: "That in cases of equal frauds committed against third persons, (when the parties thereto are equally guilty, although such frauds operate no injury to the rights of such third persons, and create no rights in favor of the parties thereto, yet in that case possession stands for the right, and one volunteer in such fraud may, as against his equally guilty companion, retain any advantage he has gained. But, right is out of the question; and if the turpitude of his adversary is done away, his possession, or his advantage cannot avail him. He does not stand on any merit of his own, but merely on the ground of the incompetency of his adversary to be received or countenanced in a Court of Justice, to set up a scandalous pretension, in which he is equally particeps criminis." Again, he says: "It is on all hands admitted, as a general, perhaps universal proposition, that in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis; but, in the application of this rule, some important distinctions have been solemnly and ably settled. It is said in them, that the prohibitions enacted by positive law, in respect to contracts, are of two kinds; 1st, to prevent weak and necessitous men from being over-reached, defrauded or oppressed; 2d, those prohibitions which are founded in reasons *of public expedience;" and he refers to Clarke v. Shee, Browning v. Morris, and Smith v. Bromley. Thus it would seem, that but for the circumstances in that case, which were deemed by him, and a majority of the Court, sufficient to take it out of the influence of the maxim, they would have permitted possession, however acquired, to stand for right, and would not have heard the party. But here, the possession never was disturbed, never was intended to be disturbed, and never can be disturbed, except by the aid of a Court of Justice.

The case of Law v. Law, 3 P. Wms. 391, where a bond was given to one for his influence in obtaining a place in the excise, was not within the influence of the maxim, because of the great interest of the public in such appointments, and that they should not be influenced, and those having the appointments deceived, by recommendations arising from interested motives. So too, in cases where relief is given against gaming debts. It greatly interests the public to suppress gaming. The parties coming for relief in such cases, though parties in guilt with those they come against, nevertheless represent, as it were, the interest of the Commonwealth; and such cases fall within the reason of the cases, where a fraud has been attempted on a third person, and which must be consummated but for the aid which will be extended to the particeps criminis. In such cases, if the maxim were to apply, the fraud would take effect on the innocent, or the public policy would be defeated. But in this case whoever holds or recovers the property, the rights of the creditors are equally unaffected. Indeed, the continued possession of Littlepage, covered with the veil of guaze, used in this case, was much less calculated to deceive creditors, than if the possession had remained all this time with Starke, he secretly paying over a reasonable hire, and finally lifting the veil by devising the property to him, as he probably would have done under these circumstances. But, he has departed this life, without taking the precaution to destroy the papers, and a *possession which he never was to take, and never intended to take, is to be obtained in behalf of his estate, by the aid of a Court of Justice.

I have placed this case on the ground of a suit by him, and in which the whole case is made out by the evidence on the part of the plaintiff; for, if the recovery can be had in the case before us, I take it that the agreement equally proves that it could be had in that case.

The case of Hawes v. Leader, Cro. James, 270, is the only case I can find, which seems in conflict with the view I have taken. There the fraudulent grantee paid 20l. for goods worth 80l. with intent between the seller and purchaser, to defraud the creditors of the vendor. The vendor gave his obligation safely to keep and quietly to deliver them to the vendee, and bound himself in 40l. to do so. He died, and suit was brought for them against his executor. The plea set out the fraud &c. and that there were debts to pay, &c. and to this the plaintiff demurred, and it was adjudged for him. That case differs somewhat from this. In that, a consideration, though an inadequate one, was given, and there was a covenant to deliver. Now it has frequently happened, that a sale, though for value, is nevertheless fraudulent and void as to creditors, in construction and operation of law. Several causes of demurrer were assigned; but on which of them it was decided, is not stated; though I admit there can be little doubt, that it was decided on the fifth, viz: that the defendant is not such a person as is enabled to plead that plea. For, the Statute makes the deed void as to creditors, but not against the party himself, &c.

There seemed to be doubts, whether the executor, in favor of creditors, was not entitled to set aside the deed; a doubt which was settled in the case of Orlabar v. —, Cumb. 348, and which seems to have been a suit in Chancery brought by an executor to set aside a sale of that kind, in which an issue was directed to try whether two bills of sale were fraudulent. Holt said, there was no doubt that 382 "an executor or administrator as such, shall not avoid a fraudulent bill of sale; but, when he is a principal creditor, as seemed to be that case, then it may be doubtful. But, however, that will be considered in equity, not here. By this, I understand that an executor, as such, cannot bring a suit to set aside a fraudulent bill of sale; and so it has been uniformly held. The creditor has a right to go against the goods directly, not through the executor or administrator. But, if the goods came to the possession of the executor or administrator, they are subject to the executor of the creditor; and this case in Cro. James, above cited, is the only one I can find, which justifies the recovery of them from the executor or administrator. The question, whether either a Court of Law or Equity ought to aid in that recovery, or leave the parties where they find them, is one which was not made, and seems not to have been considered, in that case; and it seems to me, that the principles of the late decisions are better calculated to preserve the purity of justice, and that there are few cases in which it would be more proper to apply the maxim than in this.

In this, I feel confirmed by the opinions of the Judges of this Court in the case above cited, and which I do not understand is at all opposed by the late case of Bishop v. Estes, (not reported) in which the fraudulent vendor came in on the ground taken in Austin v. Winston, but failed in making out his case. Indeed, I do not well see when it can be applied, if not in such a case as this. A bond is given for the purpose of procuring witnesses not to attend on a criminal prosecution. This consideration was held, in Collins v. Blanton, to be a good plea in bar to a suit on the bond, on the ground that the party coming into Court on such a contract, will not be aided. Had the money been paid, the other party could not have come in. Would not the recovery in such case more effectually punish and prevent the offence than the refusal? The refusal of the recovery deprives the plaintiff of nothing, takes no money from him, for which he has given any value, and so punishment 383 "falls on no one; not even on him, who, by a promised bribe, caused the offence to be committed. But, a recovery would have punished him, who was the tempter to the wicked act. It is then laid down, that whether the contract is void by the Statute, or by common law, makes no difference. Courts of Justice go on the principle of enforcing contracts not injurious to society; and would be absurd to say they shall enforce those that are. It is on these great and leading principles that I rely. I wish to protect the Courts from hearing, much less from adjudging, in favor of, or enforcing, such contracts; to scout all such parties from our presence, as without the pale of the law, and not entitled to the least consideration. Such a course, it seems to me, is best calculated to reprobate the offence, and prevent its commission.

For these reasons, though I confess not without some doubts, I am for affirming the judgment.

JUDGE CABELL concurred with JUDGE GREEN, and the judgment was reversed.*

*Eppes v. Thurman.

June, 1826.

Injunction—Dissolution—Appeal—Bond—Amount.—When a party has obtained an injunction from the Court of Chancery to a judgment at law, which is afterwards dissolved, and he appeals to the Court of Appeals, he cannot be required to give security for the amount of the judgment enjoined, but only for such costs as may be awarded against him by the Court of Appeals.

Appeal from the Lynchburg Chancery Court. Eppes obtained an injunction to a judgment on a forthcoming bond, obtained by Thurman, which injunction was afterwards dissolved; and Eppes was allowed by the Court of Chancery to appeal, upon giving security in the amount of 200 dollars.

Jonhson, for the appellee, obtained a rule on Eppes, to shew cause why he should not give other security for the payment of the judgment enjoined; and Leigh, on behalf of the appellant, having shewn cause, the question was argued, and the following opinion of the Court was given.

June 15. JUDGE CABELL delivered the opinion of the Court.

Thurman having obtained a judgment on a forfeited forthcoming bond against Hartwell Eppes and Samuel Jordan, Eppes obtained an injunction thereto from the Chancellor of the Lynchburg District. The injunction was dissolved and the bill dismissed. Eppes was allowed by the Court of Chancery an appeal to this Court, on his executing an appeal bond in the penalty of 200 dollars, with Samuel Jordan as his surety. The condition of the appeal bond, after reciting the decree, the appeal, &c. is as follows: "Now, if the said Hartwell Eppes shall prosecute the said appeal with effect, or shall perform the same, and well and truly pay all such damages and costs as shall be awarded against him by the Court of Appeals, in case the said decree shall be affirmed, then the above obligation to be void, or else to remain in full force and virtue."

385 "A rule has been given by Thurman to Eppes to shew cause why he should not give other security for prosecuting the appeal; and it is contended that such security ought to be given on two grounds; 1st, that in a case like this, (an appeal from the dissolution of an injunction, and dismission of the bill,) security should be given for payment of the judgment enjoined; and 2d, that the surety to the appeal bond in this case is insufficient.

construction of the 50th and 51st sections of the 66th chapter of the 1st vol. of the Revised Code, page 206. The 51st section directs, that appeals from the Courts of Chancery to the Court of Appeals, shall be granted in like manner, and under like regulations, as appeals are granted from the County Courts to the Court of Chancery, by the 50th section. That 50th section prescribes, that in case of appeals from the County Courts, bonds shall be given "in a reasonable penalty, with condition to satisfy and pay the amount recovered in the County Court aforesaid, and all costs, and to perform in all things the said decree, or final order, in case the same shall be affirmed." The bond thus to be given, is to have respect to what the appellant was bound to do, or what was recovered from him, by the decree of the Court appealed from.

In the case before us, there was nothing in the decree of the Chancellor which bound the appellant to pay the judgment at law. There was nothing recovered from him but costs. The appellant had a right to appeal, on the terms which are prescribed by law. The Court of Chancery could not add to those terms; and much less can this Court, after an appeal has been regularly allowed, destroy the right thus perfected by exacting terms unknown to the law. We cannot, therefore, require the appellant to give security to pay the judgment at law that was enjoined in this case.

But, the Court is of opinion that Samuel Jordan is not a sufficient surety, and that the appeal should be dismissed, unless some other sufficient security be given.

Appellate Practice—Judgment Twice Reversed.*—

Where a judgment of a County Court is appealed from, and reversed and sent back for a new trial, by the Superior Court, from which judgment of reversal, there is an appeal to the Court of Appeals; and before bond and security are given on this appeal, the cause goes back to the County Court, is again reversed by the Superior Court, and a second appeal taken to the Court of Appeals: on this last appeal, it is competent for this Court to enquire into the propriety of the first judgment.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Cumberland county. The case is fully stated in the following opinion.

Call, for the appellant.

S. Taylor, for the appellee.

July 19. JUDGE COALTER delivered his opinion, in which the other Judges concurred. §

Jones moved in the County Court against Blake B. Woodson and John Raine, for an award of execution on a delivery bond. Notice to both was proved; but Woodson did not appear. Raine appeared, and pleaded non est factum, and a jury were instantan sworn. Henry A. Ligon was the deputy sheriff who took the bond, and was examined by the plaintiff as a witness. After he was examined, he was objected to on the score of interest; and thereupon both he and the sheriff were released 387 by the "plaintiff, as the record says, and then the witness was again examined. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, if the witness was legally received by the Court, if not, for the defendant. The judgment is then entered, either against both defendants, or against the defendant Raine alone. Both defendants apply for a supersedeas to the Superior Court of Law, alleging that a judgment was obtained against both, which was awarded; and the cause coming on to be heard, the Superior Court was of opinion, that the verdict of the jury, and proceedings set out in the bill of exceptions, did not contain sufficient certainty to enable the Court to ascertain whether judgment ought to be given for the plaintiff, or the defendant John Raine. The judgment as to Raine was therefore reversed, and the cause remanded to the County Court for a new trial as to him; and being of opinion that there was no error in the judgment as to Woodson, affirmed it as to him, with damages and costs, and gave judgment for Raine for his costs in prosecuting the supersedeas.

To this judgment Jones obtained a supersedeas from this Court, but not until the 22d of December, 1822. He gave bond on the 6th of January, 1823. The first judgment in the County Court was on the 25th of December, 1820; that of the Superior Court, on the 4th of October, 1821. There is an appeal also depending, the record in which copies the same proceedings, with some slight, and others important variations, down to the judgment of the Superior Court above mentioned; and then it proceeds to state, that at a quarterly return of 'forfeited' upon forthcoming bonds, as illustrated in a number of cases in the Virginia reports, without even a suggestion being made in any of those cases, that the sheriff's return was conclusive of the forfeiture. McKinster v. Garrott, 3 Rand. 554; Bernard v. Scott, 3 Rand. 582; Pleasants v. Lewis, 1 Wash. 273; Nicolas v. Fletcher, 1 Wash. 380; Burke v. Levy's Ex'r, 1 Rand. 1; Jones v. Raine, 4 Rand. 386; Cole v. Fenwick, Gilm. 134. I am of opinion therefore, that a sheriff's return upon a forthcoming bond is not conclusive but only prima facie."

See further, monographic note on "Sheriffs and Constables" appended to Goode v. Galt, Gilm. 152. §The PRESIDENT and JUDGE CABELL absent.

Court continued and held for Cumberland county, on the 22d day of October, 1821, this cause came back from the Superior Court, with the instructions of the Judge, &c. and the defendant moved the Court for a continuance, which was over-ruled, and a bill of exceptions taken.

The exceptions state, that the defendant Raine moved for a continuance, on an affidavit, that Blake B. Woodson was a material witness for him, had been duly summoned, &c. but was absent, &c.

388 but it appearing to the Court that *he was the same Blake B. Woodson, who was a co-obligor with the defendant in the bond, the motion was over-ruled. There was a jury sworn to try the issue; and thereupon the plaintiff released Ligon and the high sheriff, and then introduced Ligon as a witness to prove the acknowledgment of Raine to the bond, which was objected to, but the objection was over-ruled, and an exception taken. The objection was, that he had been examined on the first trial, before he was released, &c.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and judgment thereupon was entered against the defendant Raine; a motion for a new trial being over-ruled, as well as several objections taken to the form of the bond, the execution and sheriff's return.

To this judgment, another supersedeas was obtained from the Superior Court; which coming on to be heard, on the 1st of October, 1822, that Court over-ruled the objections taken to the bond, return, &c. But, being of opinion, that Ligon was an incompetent witness, and that Woodson, though a co-obligor, yet, there being a judgment against him, as he could not therefore be made better or worse by the proceeding as to Raine, was a competent witness for him; and so the Court erred in not granting a continuance. The judgment of the County Court, on these grounds, was reversed, &c. and sent back for a new trial, with directions, that the testimony of Ligon was not to be heard, but that of Blake B. Woodson may, unless objected to for some legal cause not now appearing. From this judgment an appeal was prayed to this Court by Jones, and allowed.

The record in this appeal, as sent to this Court, shews that the first judgment was against Raine only. This is probably a mistake on the record; not only because other trivial variances appear, but because both parties admit in their first petition, that the first judgment was against both, (though from the record in the supersedeas, that seems doubtful,) but, because in 389 both records, the judgments of *the Superior Court, speak of the first judgment being against both. At present, I will take it to be so.

Thus it seems, as far as the first judgment of reversal goes, that case is before the Court, as well on the appeal taken as last mentioned, as by a writ of supersedeas to the first judgment of reversal, obtained since the appeal. This is surely irregular. Had this supersedeas been obtained before the second trial in the County Court, it would have stopped the proceedings there, until the decision here upon that supersedeas. But, that is obtained after the appeal from the second judgment of the Superior Court, reversing the second judgment of the County Court, is taken, and which brought up the whole case. The first judgment of reversal was acquiesced in, until after the second trial in the County Court; and a novel case would have been presented, had the second verdict been for the defendant.

But, can a party, after so far submitting to a judgment of reversal, which does not finally end the controversy, but orders a new trial, bring up the first judgment of reversal, so as to have it reversed, and judgment for the plaintiff, without connecting with it the after-proceedings? It would seem to me, that he could not, unless it was brought here before the trial, and verdict had in pursuance of the reversing judgment, and which would supersede and stop those proceedings. After that, it must stand in the whole proceedings, to be brought up by appeal or supersedeas.

It results, then, that the supersedeas must be quashed, as improvidently issued, and at the costs of the plaintiff.

The case then rests on the record in the appeal. But, that record presents another singular case. The first judgment of the County Court, (as is now supposed,) was against Woodson, the principal in the delivery bond, by default, and against Raine his surety, after defence on a plea of non est factum. This judgment was brought before the Superior Court on a supersedeas, at the instance of both the defendants. It was affirmed as to Woodson, with damages and costs, but reversed as to Raine, 390 and costs *given to him. This was clearly erroneous. The judgment was joint and an entire thing, and could not be reversed as to one, and affirmed as to the other. But, can we look to this error now, it not being brought before us until after the second trial in the County Court? It seems to me that we must do so, otherwise, there may be two distinct judgments, and for different amounts, against two parties to a joint suit. But, it seems fully settled by this Court in various cases, that we can and must enquire into the propriety of the first judgment of reversal. Knox v. Garland, 2 Call, 242. Robinson v. Gaines, 3 Call, 243. Biggers v. Alderson, 1 Hen. & Munf. 54. Fisher v. Duncan, 1 Hen. & Munf. 563. Lyons v. Gregory, 3 Hen. & Munf. 237. There the point was expressly made, "that it was too late to affirm the first judgment of the County Court," &c. This objection was over-ruled, and the first judgment of the County Court was affirmed, with damages from the date of the first writ of supersedeas. This was the first case in which the question as to the damages, seems to have been expressly decided. The case of Horrel v. M'Alexander, 3 Rand. 94, was also decided on the same ground. Had the judgment been reversed as to both, then Woodson would have been a party to the suit which went back and was tried, at the second trial, and on no account could have been a witness. But, this must be taken to have been his situation in point of law. The only doubt as to his competency, arises from the severance of the parties by the reversing judgment, leaving Woodson indifferent, and not interested, as is supposed, even as to the costs accruing in the suit subsequent to the affirmation against him. But, even if this improper severance must remain uncorrected, because that judgment was not brought here until after the second trial in the County Court, is it true, that Raine, if he should be finally cast, would not have recourse against his principal for the whole recovery against him, including as well all subsequent costs recovered against, as all expended by, him? I think he would; *and therefore, in this view, Woodson would be interested to the extent of those costs, which is a sufficient interest to exclude him as a witness.

I am also of opinion, as well on the authority of the case of Callow v. Mime, 2 Vern. 1472, as other cases, that although the circumstance, that Ligon was interested, and an incompetent witness when he was first examined, ought to go very strongly to his credit, on his second examination after the release in the proceedings mentioned, that yet that release restored him to his competency, and he was then properly examined.

As to the first judgment of the County Court, if that was a joint judgment against Woodson and Raine, I think there was no error in it, and that the verdict and proceedings justified such judgment; and that, consequently, according to the cases above cited, both judgments of the Superior Court, and all the proceedings subsequent to the first judgment of the County Court, ought to be reversed and set aside, and that the first judgment of the County Court ought to be affirmed, with damage from the date of the first supersedeas, and costs; in which, it seems to me, all the costs of the appellant in the County Court, subsequent to the first judgment, ought to be taxed.

But if, as the record now before us purports, the first judgment was against Raine only, and not against Woodson also, then I think that judgment was erroneous for that cause; and therefore, as was done in the case of Fisher v. Duncan, 1 Hen. & Munf. 563, above cited, that judgment ought also to be reversed, with costs to the appellee Raine, and judgment entered for the appellant on the bond, as it ought to have been, against both Woodson and Raine.

The parties must, by consent or otherwise, ascertain the fact, whether the first judgment was joint against both, or only against Raine, in order to enable us to enter either the one or the other of the judgments above, as that fact shall turn out.

Statute—Assessment for Paving Streets—Effect.—The Act authorising an assessment for paving the streets of Norfolk, does not impose a lien upon the lots in the borough, for the payment of the assessment, but gives a personal remedy only, against the freeholders in possession, and not against reversioners and remaindermen.

Payment of Money for Another.—Where one man pays money for another at his request, the latter cannot resist the repayment of it on the ground that the original debt was not legally due.

Chose in Action—Assignment—Equity Jurisdiction.—

The assignee of a chose in action, has not a right, in all cases, to come into a Court of Equity, upon the mere ground that he cannot sue in his own name, at law; but it must appear that he is prevented from suing at law in the name of the assignor, or that the assignor himself would have had a right, if he had not assigned, to go into a Court of Equity. Per GREEN, Judge.

Appeal from the Chancery Court of Williamsburg. The following opinion is a sufficient report of the case.

Leigh, for the appellant.

Scott, for the appellee.

July 21. JUDGE GREEN.

The appellant filed his bill and amended bill, in the Williamsburg Chancery, stating that he was the sergeant of the borough of Norfolk, and as such authorized and bound to collect the sums assessed upon the land-holders of Norfolk, for the paving of the streets, under an Act of Assembly: that Wilson Boush, the holder of 72 feet of land on Church street, had been duly assessed under that Act, to the payment of $187 92: that this sum, with others assessed upon other persons, was directed by the proper authority to be collected and paid to Elzey Burroughs, who had paved the street: that at the request of Boush, and upon his promise to re-pay him, he had paid the said sum of money to Burroughs, who thereupon assigned his claim to the complainant: that he instituted a suit at law against Boush, and upon the trial, offered evidence tending to prove Boush's request to him to pay the money; whereupon, the Court decided, *that Boush was not liable to pay the assessment, because it appeared that he had but a life-estate in the lot, in respect of which the assessment was made; the reversion in fee being in his daughter Frances Maria: that he has no means, at law, to assert his claim, either against Boush or his daughter, who are, in equity, either separately or jointly, in proportion to their respective interests in the lot, benefited by the paving of the street, liable to pay the amount of the demand. He makes Boush, his daughter, Burroughs, and the borough of Norfolk, defendants, and prays general relief. The case came on as to Boush and his daughter, upon the bill taken pro confesso for want of appearance. The Act of Assembly, the assessment, and order of Court authorising it, and the petition of sundry persons, of whom Boush was one, to the Mayor, Recorder and Aldermen of the borough of Norfolk, praying for an order to pave the street in question, in pursuance of the Act of Assembly, are exhibits in the cause.

The first section of the Act empowers the Court of Norfolk borough to cause any street, or part of a street, in Norfolk, to be paved, whenever they may deem it proper, or whenever the owners of lots, or a majority of them, on such street, or part of a street, shall petition them to do so. The 4th section provides for apportioning the expense of paving, between the individual proprietors of the lots on the street so paved. The 5th section directs the collector of the taxes of the corporation, so soon as the paving is begun, to levy by distress and sale, as in case of public taxes, on each owner of a lot on the street to be paved, one dollar per foot front of the lot which he or she may hold; and if the sum so levied be not sufficient to complete the paving, the Court may, upon the application of a majority of the landholders, make such addition to the expense, as may appear just and reasonable; and so soon as the pavement is completed, and the committee have apportioned the expense, the collector is directed to proceed, in like manner, to collect from each lot-holder the balance due from him.

394 *The 6th section provides, that if the owner of any lot shall reside out of the corporation, or the lot be not in the occupation of the proprietor, the tenant in possession shall be answerable for the expense aforesaid, to be deduced from the next rent, if he be tenant from year to year; or if he be tenant for a term of years, from the rent to become due for the last year of the term. The 7th section provides, that if the lot be vacant, and the proprietor has no property within the corporation subject to distress, the collector may, upon motion in the name of the corporation, recover the amount assessed against him.

One of the grounds upon which the appellant insists that a Court of Equity has jurisdiction in this case, is, that the Act imposes a lien upon the lot itself, for the payment of the assessment; and that this creates an equity between the tenant for life and remainder-man, to contribute rateably to the discharge of this lien. If this were true, the Court would have an unquestionable jurisdiction to enforce the lien, and to compel contribution. There is not, however, a single provision of the Act, which countenances the idea that it was intended to subject the lot itself to a lien for the payment of the assessment. On the contrary, all the provisions of the Act shew that it was intended to impose nothing but a personal liability upon the person, whoever it might be, liable to the payment of the sum assessed. It subjects his property to distress and sale, as for public taxes. This extends only to personal property; and if he has no property liable to distress, then it subjects him to a personal judgment on motion; and these are the only remedies provided by the Act. There was, therefore, no lien on the lot; nor could any moral or equitable obligation, upon any party, arise out of this Act. It is a matter of strict law. The party liable, whether the tenant for life, or the reversioner, or both, was liable only by virtue of the Act, and as the Act prescribed; that is, personally.

There is some difficulty in ascertaining what description of persons was intended to be responsible for the expenses

395 *of paving. The Act describes the persons intended to be made so liable, by various terms, "owners of lots," "individual proprietors of lots," "landholders," "lot-holders," "the proprietors." These terms are used as synonymous through the Act; and upon the whole, I think there is enough in the Act to shew, that freeholders in possession, whether seised in fee simple, or of a lesser estate, were intended to be subjected to the payment of the expense of paving. The Act distinguishes between the proprietor and the tenant in possession, from year to year or for a term of years; making the former personally liable in all cases, unless there be such a tenant in possession; in which case, the latter is made personally liable in the first instance, with a right to retain against the landlord out of the rents. The Act, by various synonymous terms used to describe the person intended to be liable to assessment, meant any one seised of the land, or having any title thereto, other than as a tenant for years. Boush was, therefore, liable on this ground; his property might have been distrained; and it is not alleged that he had none liable to distress; or a judgment might have been had against him, upon motion, in the name of the corporation; or if not, then Moseley had a clear remedy against him at law, upon the ground that he had paid money at his request, and upon his promise to re-pay it. This promise was obligatory, whether Boush was bound or not bound, originally, to pay the assessment.

The plaintiff, therefore, having various perfect and unembarrassed remedies at law, having failed in one of them, by the error of the Court of Law, applies to a Court of Equity to correct that error, without alleging any one circumstance upon which to found the jurisdiction of that Court; no fraud, no accident, no mistake, no trust.

If my construction of the Act of Assembly is wrong, and the Act is supposed in this case to have imposed no obligation upon either the tenant for life or reversioner, then a Court of Equity can 396 raise no obligation not imposed *by the Statute; or if both the tenant for life and reversioner were bound, or the reversioner only was bound, the legal remedies prescribed by the Act, by distress and motion, were open to the complainant, and there was no occasion for the assistance of a Court of Equity.

It is said, that Boush, or Boush and his daughter were debtors to Burroughs, who had assigned this debt to the plaintiff; and that a Court of Equity has jurisdiction to entertain the suit of an assignee of a chose in action against the debtor, in all cases, upon the mere ground that the plaintiff cannot sue in his own name, at law. I cannot, for myself, accede to this proposition. If it were so, a very large portion of the proper business of the Courts of Law might be transferred to the Courts of Equity, and the debtor deprived of his right to his trial at law, and by a jury, without his consent or default. To give such a jurisdiction, it ought to appear that the plaintiff is prevented from recovering at law, in the name of the assignor, by collusion between the debtor and assignee; or that, from the nature of the claim, or the circumstances of the case, the assignor himself would have had a right, if he had not assigned, to claim the aid of a Court of Equity.

This question, however, does not arise in this case. Burroughs had no claim upon the owner of the lot. His claim was against the corporation, who had contracted with him; and the owner of the lot was a debtor to the corporation, who might, by their officer, have distrained or obtained a judgment on motion against him.

The decree should be affirmed.

The other Judges concurred, and the decree was affirmed.*

This was an appeal from the Richmond Chancery Court. The case was submitted without argument in this Court; and the following opinion gives a complete history of it.

July 27. JUDGE GREEN delivered the opinion of the Court.†

John Dandridge died early in 1799, intestate, leaving a widow Rebecca, and two infant children John and Lucy. His widow administered on his estate in May, 1799; John Minge her brother being her surety. In 1802, she intermarried with George Cocke. In 1804 or 1805, her letters of administration were revoked, and administration de bonis non of the estate of Dandridge was committed to Minge. In March, 1806, Cocke and wife instituted a suit in Prince George County Court against Minge the administrator de bonis non, and John and Lucy, the infant children of J. Dandridge, for a settlement of Mrs. Cocke's administration account, the assignment of her dower in the land, and her portion of the personal estate. This being a friendly bill, the object of it was immediately effected by a division, assignment of dower, and settlement of accounts, the report of which was not signed by the 398 commissioners *until January, 1807, nor returned to the Court until January, 1810, when it was confirmed. Late in 1812, Lucy, then an infant, intermarried with J. W. Murdaugh, and shortly afterwards, Mrs. Cocke died.

In October, 1813, John Minge served a declaration in ejectment on George Cocke, for the recovery of the land on which John Dandridge had resided, and in which dower had been assigned to his deceased wife, the widow of Dandridge, and in September, 1814, he recovered a judgment in that suit.

The bill in this case was filed by John Dandridge and Murdaugh and wife, as heirs and distributees of J. Dandridge deceased, against Minge, for an injunction to the execution of that judgment. The bill charges, that in 1795 or thereabouts, J. Dandridge purchased about 800 acres of land from Minge, who delivered to him the deeds, and put him in possession of the land, and took his bonds for the purchase money: that in part payment of the purchase, Dandridge assigned to Minge, on the back of one of the bonds, his wife's interest in her father's estate, of which Minge was the executor; and that a large part of the purchase money has been paid in cash, and one of the bonds taken in: that Dandridge died in 1798, leaving a large estate; and Rebecca, his widow, administered on it, and Minge was her surety: that afterwards, Minge administered on the estate of Dandridge, unadministered by the former administratrix: that the estate has been wasted, both by the administratrix and the administrator de bonis non; and that Minge is also indebted to the estate of Dandridge, and that his responsibilities on these various accounts are more than sufficient to discharge the balance of the purchase money of the land unpaid.

The answer of Minge admits the sale of the land to Dandridge, and states that he conveyed the land to Dandridge, and took from him his bonds and a mortgage upon the land, to secure the purchase money; admits that the legacy given to Mrs.

Dandridge by her father, was to be 399 credited *on the first bond, which was done upon a settlement between him and Dandridge, as to the amount of the legacy; and the balance of the first bond was paid to him; admits that after the estate of Dandridge was taken out of the hands of Rebecca Dandridge, then Rebecca Cocke, he qualified as administrator of J. Dandridge, but that he sold no part of the estate at that time, except an old and useless chariot: that the whole of it remained on the land for the support of the children of Mrs. Dandridge, and in possession of Mr. George Cocke, and the said Rebecca; and that since her death, which happened some time past, the real and personal estate of every kind was taken possession of by the complainant J. W. Murdaugh, and was then in his possession, or the possession of those claiming under him, except the cattle, sheep, hogs, and some household furniture, which the defendant sold for the benefit of the estate, rather than see the whole go to ruin and starve: that he is administrator of D. Minge, the father of himself and Rebecca Dandridge; but, that the plaintiffs have no claim against him on that account, nor is he indebted to Dandridge's estate on any other account; and prays a decree for the sale of the mortgaged premises.

In the progress of the cause, accounts were ordered of J. Minge's administration of the estate of D. Minge, Rebecca Dandridge's administration, and John Minge's administration of J. Dandridge's estate, and between J. Dandridge and J. Minge.

From the reports of the commissioners and other documents in the cause, it appears, that Dandridge purchased the land from Minge, on the 23d of March, 1796, for 2400l. payable in equal instalments of 800l. on the 1st of October in the years 1798, 1800 and 1802; for which Dandridge gave his bonds. On the first bond was a memorandum, that David Minge's legacy to his daughter Rebecca, should be credited on that bond, when ascertained. This appears to have been done, and the balance of that bond paid, in part by J. Dandridge, and in part by his administratrix;

400 "and the bond given up to the latter. The commissioners' reports shew, that a balance was due to the administratrix on her account of the administration of the estate, and a balance of $32 32, due from Minge, on his account of the administration of Dandridge. The Court decreed a sale of the land, to pay the two remaining bonds for the purchase of the land, and interest, after deducting this balance of $32 32; from which an appeal was taken. J. Dandridge renounces this appeal, declaring that Murdaugh used his name in taking the appeal, without authority.

From these reports and documents, it appears, that the personal estate of Dandridge, including 19 slaves, was valued at 1700l. 3 4: that there were large debts due to him, collected by his administratrix and administrator de bonis non: that from the death of Dandridge, early in 1799, to the death of his widow in 1813 or 1814, the whole estate real and personal of Dandridge, remained in her hands and in those of Cocke her second husband, without any account rendered, either by her or the administrator de bonis non, who qualified in 1804 or 1805, either for the rents of the land, or the profits of the personal estate, except, that the administrator de bonis non accounts for the hires of the two negroes, from the year 1807 to 1813 inclusive, and for the perishable property sold after her death. The children were not wholly supported out of the profits of the property retained by their mother and second husband; for, there are large charges in the administration account of Minge, for advances made for their maintenance.

It appears, that the debts due to Dandridge were more than sufficient to pay all his debts, except the two last bonds due to Minge, and that the personal property inventoried was more than sufficient to pay those bonds.

It was the duty of the administratrix and administrator de bonis non, to apply these funds to the payment of those bonds; so as to exonerate the land for the benefit 401 of the infant *heirs. The maintenance of the children, (saying nothing of the support of the widow and her second husband) was no excuse for the failure in this duty. Their interests cannot be so sacrificed by their guardian, or any one dealing with their affairs as guardian. Whilst the whole fruits of the real and personal property were thus enjoyed by the widow and her second husband, without account, the interest on the large debts due to Minge, was allowed to accumulate, so as to swallow up the whole of the real estate; and this, with the concurrence of Minge, after he had administered on Dandridge's estate. There is in the record, an account between John Minge, administrator of Dandridge, and George Cocke, exhibited by Minge, as a voucher for a charge against the estate, for 18l. 11 6, the balance of that account paid by him to Cocke; from which it appears, that after the assignment of dower in the land and slaves to the widow in 1800, in a suit in which Minge was a party, Cocke gives credit to Minge for 4l. 19 1/2, annually for the taxes paid on the land; by which it appears, that Minge, acting for the children, agreed that Cocke should have their lands, only for paying the taxes. The only other credit in that account to Minge as administrator, is, for the hire of Billy, from 1807 to 1812, both years included, at 15l. per annum, which is balanced by an equivalent charge of an equal sum for the board of Lucy Dandridge.

Under these circumstances, the administratrix and her sureties, and the administrator de bonis non, are respectively liable for all the profits of the slaves and other personal property, during the periods of their respective administrations; and the latter, for the value of the slaves and other personal property, to the extent of what may be necessary to satisfy the debts due to Minge, if they be sufficient for that purpose, unless the acts or admissions of the parties, having a right to enforce this responsibility, have precluded them from claiming. This seems to be the case as to

John Dandridge, who has assented 402 to the settlement *of the accounts as made in this cause, and acquiesced in the decree, (but on this point no decision is intended to be made;) and this might be the case as to Murdaugh and wife, if he actually, as is alleged, took possession of the whole property after Mrs. Cocke's death, (an allegation not proved;) and if also Mrs. Murdaugh (he being dead) is bound by his acts or admissions made in the course of this cause.

This, as a general question, is highly important; and in forming an opinion on it, I have had but little assistance from the books to which I have had access. Mrs. Murdaugh, as heir and distributee of her father, was entitled to a part of his real estate, subject to a mortgage, and of his personal estate after the payment of his debts. If the personal estate was delivered over to her husband, she lost her real estate unless he chose to pay the debt; and her husband would hold the personal property exclusive of the rights of her and her heirs. If the personal estate was duly applied to the payment of the debts, the land would be secured to her and her heirs; and the husband would have had no interest in the subject, except his marital right during the coverture, and the possibility, if he survived her, of being tenant by the curtesy. In this case, could the husband rightfully elect that his wife's property should be real or personal, at his pleasure, with or without the concurrence of the personal representative? I think not. This would be to give the husband virtually, under such circumstances, an absolute right to the wife's real estate. The wife not only has the legal right, but the strongest equity in such a case against the husband, to have the personal property applied to the exoneration of the real; rights, which she could not be deprived of without her privy examination, by any act of her husband, either with or without the concurrence of the personal representative. If Minge consented to Murdaugh's taking possession of the personal property, he practised a fraud in collusion with him, upon the rights of his wife. If Murdaugh took it *without his consent, he was a wrong-doer, and responsible to the administrator.

This point was not insisted on in the pleadings or proceedings in the cause, but it appears palpably in the record; and it was the duty of the Court ex officio, when the right of the wife, legal or equitable, against the husband, appeared clearly, to protect her from any injurious effects arising from the acts or admissions of her husband. And although she was a joint plaintiff with her husband, she was not bound by any proceedings or admissions in the cause by her husband, especially affecting her inheritance. A bill by husband and wife, is the husband's suit only, and the wife is joined for conformity, to be bound only so far, as in justice she ought to be bound.

These views are supported by what fell from Lord Hardwicke, in Pawlett v. Delaval, 2 Vez. 663. He states, that "a bill filed in the name of husband and wife, claiming in right of the wife, is the bill of the husband." After stating the case of the Court's refusing, upon the bill of a husband and wife, to decree even the personal property of the wife to the husband, unless with her consent, given in Court upon a privy examination, or unless an adequate settlement be made, upon the ground, that in such cases, the wife has, in respect to such property, an equity against the husband, he observes, "But that is" (the refusal to decree the property to the husband) "because all suits or defences in this Court, by husband and wife jointly, when there is no appearance by guardian, for the wife, are considered as suits and defences of the husband, and therefore, will not suffer the money to be paid to the husband, on the prayer of his counsel; because the Court knows those instructions to counsel come from the husband, who has the power of the suit and defence; and therefore, the Court expects the wife to attend in Court, to give her consent." The Lord Chancellor applied these principles to the case under consideration, under the following circumstances. By a marriage settlement, 404 it was agreed that 23,000l. *should be settled to the separate use of the wife. They had a daughter, and the husband died. There were some transactions between the husband and wife, in his lifetime, from which it was inferred, that she had surrendered this fund to her husband for his own use. The widow married again; and some transactions between her second husband and herself, shewed that the 23,000l. was then considered as a part of the first husband's estate. The daughter claimed this fund as a part of her father's assets. The second husband and wife filed a bill, claiming it as still belonging to the wife, under the original settlement, and to set aside the subsequent transactions, from which her surrender of this fund to her first husband was inferred, as founded in mistake. The Lord Chancellor said, "another consideration very material is, that this is the bill of the husband. It might have been something of a different question, if the bill had been by Lady Isabella herself, or by her prochein amy, claiming her separate property; not that it would turn the question; but every bill by husband and wife, jointly claiming in right of the wife, is the act of the husband, and the claim is by the husband, though in right of his wife, though she joined for conformity. Consider what would be the consequence of giving relief. It is impossible to conceive, supposing Lady Isabella mistaken in what she did, that she meant to give Mr. De'aval, (her second husband,) so large a sum, without mentioning it. Is he, then, to be taken in this Court, not only against Miss Pawlett, (the daughter,) but against her, to have a right to this large sum, under an et cætera?" and he decreed for the daughter.

In the case of Evans v. Cogan, 2 P. Wms. 451, it is said, that "a feme covert cannot bind herself as to her inheritance by her answer;" and much less can her husband bind her. As to her personal property, the answer of husband and wife, and depositions taken in the cause, bind her after the husband's death, but not as to her inheritance, Shelberry v. Briggs, 2 Vern. 249; and when *husband and wife sue, and the husband dies, the wife is not bound by the proceedings in the cause, but may bring a new bill for the same matter. 2 Vern. 197, anonymous. And in the case of Sperling v. Rochfort, 8 Ves. 164, the circumstance of the wife joining the husband in a bill for transferring to him a trust fund settled on her, though not for her separate use, is treated as amounting to nothing, and as not affecting her interests.

In this case, the inheritance of Mrs. Murdaugh is affected by these proceedings, erroneous as to her, and she is not bound by them. The decree must therefore be reversed as to her, and the cause remanded to be further proceeded in, according to the foregoing views.

406 *Childers v. Deane and Page.

July, 1826.

Demurrer to Evidence—What It Should Contain.—A demurrer to evidence should contain the evidence on both sides.

Compound Interest—When Allowed.—Compound interest will not be allowed, except under special circumstances. An agreement at the time of the loan, that at the end of the year, interest shall become principal, or after interest has become due, an agreement that it shall bear interest previous to such agreement, will not be permitted, as tending to usury. But, where a settlement of accounts takes place, after interest has become due, and an agreement then is made, that interest due, shall thereafter carry interest; or, the principal and interest are computed in a master's report, and the same confirmed; in these cases, compound interest is lawful.

Usury—What Necessary to Constitute.—To constitute usury, there must be an intention to take more than legal interest.

Same—What Constitutes—Mistake of Scrivener.—The mistake of a scrivener in putting one sum for another, will not charge a party with usury.

Same—Same—Mode of Calculating Interest.—If a mode of calculating interest, which gives to the creditor more than legal interest, is adopted, and the creditor knows it will have that effect, he is guilty of usury, although he may not suspect that he is violating the law.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Buckingham.

Deane and Page brought an action of debt against Childers, on a note under seal, for $279 56, payable on demand. The defendant pleaded payment, and issue was joined. The defendant afterwards pleaded a special plea, setting out the various considerations on which the note was given, the mode of calculating interest, and concluding with an averment, that the transaction was usurious. The plaintiff replied, denying the several allegations of the plea, and issue was joined.

At the trial, the defendant filed a demurrer to evidence, setting forth the note on which the action was founded; three accounts of articles purchased of the plaintiffs by the defendant, and interest charged at different times; and the evidence of John Walke, stating that the reason why the bond was for more than the balance of the account, (the former being for $279 56, and the latter amounting only to $270 11,) was, that interest was added to the amount of the account, from the 30th of June, 1818, to the 8th of February following: that at the time the defendant executed the bond, it was agreed, that if anything was wrong, it should be rectified: that the witness was witness to the bond, and the agent of the plaintiffs: that at the time of taking the bond, nothing was said as to the interest: that it was not the intention of the witness to have included usurious interest, &c. The plaintiffs joined in the demurrer to evidence, the jury rendered a conditional verdict for the plaintiffs, and the Court gave judgment for them.

The defendant appealed.

Johnson, for the appellant.

Attorney General, for the appellees.

July 31. JUDGE CARR.

This is an action of debt on a penal bill. The defendant pleaded payment and a special plea of usury, setting out at length, the several sums on which the usury is alleged to have been taken for forbearance, and the amount of the sums so charged to have been taken. Issue was joined on both pleas, and a jury sworn. At the trial, the defendant rendered a demurrer to the evidence, which was joined by the plaintiff. The jury found a verdict, subject to the judgment of the Court on the demurrer. The Court decided, that the evidence was sufficient in law to maintain the issues joined on the part of the plaintiff, and tendered judgment accordingly. The defendant appealed.

The first objection taken for the appellant, is, that the tender and joining in demurrer, were erroneous, the evidence being all on the side of the demurrant. But, this does not consist with the record; for the demurrer commences by stating, that the plaintiff introduced, to support his action, a bond in these words and figures; and goes on to set out at large the

Demurrer to Evidence—What It Should Contain.—

A demurrer to evidence should contain the evidence on both sides. Adkins v. Fry, 38 W. Va. 556, 18 S. E. Rep. 740, citing the principal case as so holding. In this case, it was decided that, in a demurrer to evidence, it is not necessary to state on the face of the record that the evidence set forth is all the evidence that was offered, but it is necessary that the whole evidence should be set out.

On the subject of demurrer to evidence, the principal case is also cited in Merchants, etc., Bank v. Evans & Dorsey, 9 W. Va. 383.

For further information on this subject, see monographic note on "Demurrer to the Evidence" appended to Tutt v. Slaughter, 5 Gratt. 364.

Compound Interest—When Allowed.—It is definitely settled in Virginia and West Virginia, that an agreement to pay interest upon interest is valid if made after the interest which is to bear interest has become due. To this effect, the principal case is cited in Craig v. McCulloch, 20 W. Va. 154; Stansbury v. Stansbury, 24 W. Va. 638; Garrett v. Carr, 1 Rob. 212, 214. But an agreement made at the time of the loan, that at the end of the year interest shall become principal, will not be allowed; not that it is usury and will be under the contract illegal and void; but because the chancery court considers it hard and oppressive, and tending to usury. Genl. v. Ingersoll, 11 W. Va. 558, quoting from the principal case. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Fultz v. Davis, 26 Gratt. 911; Jarrett v. Nickell, 9 W. Va. 351.

See further, monographic note on "Interest" appended to Fred v. Dixon, 27 Gratt. 541.

Same—What Constitutes.—In Feistler v. Wheeling, etc., Association, 19 W. Va. 718, it is said: "But it may be said, that intent is of the very essence of usury; and it is certainly true, that all the authorities do hold, that if the lender does not intend to take more on a loan than legal interest, the transaction cannot be held to be usurious. See Childers v. Deane, 4 Rand. 406; Bush v. Buckingham, 2 Vent. 83; Gibson v. Stearns, 3 N. H. 185, 187; Nevison v. Whitley, Cro. Car. 501; Levy v. Gadsby, 3 Cranch 180; Heath v. Cook, 7 Allen 59, 60; N. Y. Fireman's Insurance Co. v. Sturges, 2 Cow. 664; Marvine v. Hymers, 12 N. Y. 223, 231, 236. Some of the decisions have gone even further and hold, that a transaction cannot be held to be usurious, unless the borrower intended to pay more than the legal rate of interest, even though the lender did intend to take more, and that there can be no usury, where either of the parties is ignorant, that more than legal interest has been received. See Condit v. Baldwin, 21 N. Y. 219; Aldrich v. Reynolds, 1 Barb. Ch. 43, 44; Haywood v. Le Baron, 4 Fla. 404. But on the other hand the authorities all show, that if more than the legal rate of interest was intended by the parties to be received and was in point of fact received, the transaction will be held to be usurious, though neither of the parties intended to violate the statutes against usury. See Maine Bank v. Butts, 9 Mass. 55; Childers v. Deane, 4 Rand. 406; Levy v. Gadsby, 3 Cranch 180."

A miscalculation will never charge a party with usury, but whenever the intention of the party is to take more than legal interest, he is chargeable with usury, although he may never have heard that such was the law, and may not have known that he was violating it. Grigsby v. Weaver, 5 Leigh 214, citing principal case to sustain the proposition. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Crump v. Trytitle, 5 Leigh 237.

408 *After stating the plaintiff's evidence, the demurrer states that of the defendant, consisting of several accounts, and the evidence of a witness. This was proper, as this Court has often decided, that a demurrer to evidence should contain the evidence on both sides. If the plaintiff's counsel had considered the demurrer frivolous, he would have refused to join in it; and the Court, if they had agreed with him in opinion, would not have compelled him to join. In that event, the defendant would have excepted to the opinion of the Court, and brought up the case in that shape. The plaintiff's counsel, however, did not refuse, but joined in demurrer; and, if in this he erred in judgment, it was an error of which his client might have cause to complain, but I cannot see how the adversary could take exception to it. It was placing the cause on the very ground he wished.

It is next contended, that the evidence supports the plea of usury, upon two grounds: 1st, Because, in the annual settlements, interest is added to the principal, and this balance is made an interest-bearing fund from that time forward, thus taking compound interest. 2d, Because, in the calculations of interest, a larger sum, in some instances, is taken, than the interest at 6 per cent. would amount to.

With respect to compound interest, there has been considerable difference of opinion and of practice in the English Chancery. Some of the early cases allowed it; but the general rule, as settled by the latter cases, is, that it shall not be allowed. There are still some special circumstances, under which compound interest is allowed; as where a settlement of accounts takes place, after interest has become due, and an agreement is then made that the interest due shall thereafter carry interest; or the principal and interest are computed in a master's report, and the same confirmed; for, after confirmation, it is considered as a judgment. But, an agreement made at the time of the loan, that at the end of the year interest shall become principal, will not be allowed; not that it is usury 409 and will *render the contract illegal and void, but because the Chancery considers it hard and oppressive and tending to usury. The agreement that interest become due, shall carry interest, must be prospective only. To give it a retrospective effect; to say that interest due, shall bear interest from a time previous to the agreement; is equally objectionable, as an original agreement that interest when due, shall become principal. Perhaps it is more mischievous; for, at the original agreement, the parties are independent of each other, and free to contract or not. Subsequently, they meet on different and unequal terms, as debtor and creditor, the one probably distressed, and unable to pay; the other, in a situation to take advantage of this distress, and exact oppressive stipulations. It is said by Chancellor Kent, Vanbenshooten v. Lawson, 6 Johns. Rep. 319, that the agreement, though made after the interest be due, and to operate prospectively only, must also be in writing; and for this, he refers to the case of Thornhill v. Evans, 2 Atk. 330, where he says, Lord Hardwicke directed the master, in taking an account of what was due for principal and interest on the mortgage, to enquire what arrears of interest were, from time to time, agreed in writing, to be turned into principal after such arrears became due, and such arrears to be considered principal from the respective times of such agreement. I have examined the case in Atkyns, and I can find not a word (in my edition) either in the case, or the Chancellor's directions, about the agreements being in writing. Perhaps, however, it is not amiss that the general position should be thus modified. The case in Atkyns was one of great oppression, and practised by counsel on his client; which was properly considered as rendering it more aggravated. Lord Hardwicke seems to admit there, that if a mortgagor does not pay the interest regularly, the mortgagee may, upon agreement, turn the interest into principal; but then he adds, it must be done fairly, and is generally upon the advance of fresh money, and even 410 then, it is *reckoned a hardship upon a mortgagor, and an act of oppression. In Chambers v. Goldwin, 9 Ves. 254, Lord Eldon says, that there is nothing unfair, nor perhaps illegal, in taking a covenant originally, that if interest is not paid at the end of the year, it shall be converted into principal; but this Court will not permit that as tending to usury, though it is not usury. In an earlier case, Waring v. Cunliff, 1 Ves. junr. 99, Lord Thurlow had said, "my opinion is in favor of interest upon interest, because I do not see any reason, if a man does not pay interest when he ought, why he should not pay interest for that also. But (he adds) I have found the Court in a constant habit of thinking the contrary; and I must overturn all the proceedings of the Court if I give it." In ex parte Bevan, 9 Ves. 203, Lord Eldon remarks, "as to the question of compound interest, it is clear you cannot a priori agree to let a man have money for twelve months, settling the balance at the end of six months; that is, you cannot contract for more than 5 per cent. agreeing to forbear for six months; but if, at the end of six months, you agree to settle accounts (that not being a part of the prior contract) and then stipulate that you will forbear for six months, upon those terms, that is legal." Many other cases might be cited to support the positions I have taken; but I will content myself with referring to Connecticut v. Jackson, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 13. Vanbenshooten v. Lawson, 6 Johns. Ch. Rep. 319, where the Chancellor has collected the cases, and treated the subject with his usual care and ability.

The next objection taken is, that too much interest is taken; as the accounts A. B. & C. will shew. I have examined the calculations. Some of them are correct; some incorrect; some take too much, some too little interest. Upon the whole, I am inclined to think there is less interest included, than upon the strictest principles the party was entitled to. To constitute usury, there must be an intention to take more than legal interest. Wherever 411 *such intention appears in the taking more than legal interest, it is evidence of the corrupt agreement required by the statute; though the party may never have heard of the law, or may think that he is steering quite clear of it. Ignorance or mistake of the law excuses no man; but a mistake of fact does excuse. A miscalculation innocently committed, or the mistake of a scrivener in putting one sum for another, will never charge a party with usury. The errors in the account seem to be the effect of pure mistake. This is an inference which a jury could hardly fail to draw from an inspection of the account; and which the Court might well draw upon the demurrer, if it were necessary. But it is not; for, the witness who made the calculations and took the bond, swears, that he had no intention of taking usurious interest, and that there was an agreement to correct all mistakes.

I am clear that there is no usury proved, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

JUDGE GREEN.

There are many cases in which the taking of compound interest is lawful, as in the cases mentioned by Judge Carr. But I should incline to think, that the taking it might, under circumstances, be usurious; as, if upon a debt of long standing, for the sake of getting further forbearance, the debtor, instead of giving a new security for the principal and simple interest, incurred upon the debt, were to agree to make annual rests, and to compound the interest for the time already past, and give a new security for the principal and interest so compounded, the whole to carry interest. Such an accumulation of the debt, arising from the compounding of the interest, might be considered as a premium for the further forbearance. The case at bar has no such features. The balance upon the accounts up to May 1, 1816, due to the plaintiffs, was $102 08 cts. Before striking this balance, no interest was charged.

412 *From that time until the 24th of September, 1817, no payment whatever was made by the defendant. On the 30th of June, 1817, the account is again balanced, and interest charged up to that time, from the 1st of May, 1816, on the balance then due, and upon the cash advances made to the defendant up to that time, from the dates of the advances. In adjusting the accounts up to the 30th of June, 1818, $13 80 cts. are charged for interest, and no more. This is charged at 5 months interest on the aggregate balance of the 30th of June, 1817, composed of principal and interest. This is clearly a mistake in some way or other; and the plea alleges that this interest, $13 80, was agreed to be allowed from the 30th of June, 1817, to the 30th of June, 1818. Upon adjusting the account on the strictest principles, in regard to stating interest, the plaintiffs, instead of $13 80, were entitled to $17 84, for interest on the principal sum due, between those periods; and the balance due them on the 30th of June, 1818, was $274 12, instead of $270 11, as shewn by the accounts; and the interest on so much of that balance as was principal, up to February 8, 1819, when the bond was given, was $9 71, instead of $9 45, as included in the bond. The parties, therefore, have not stipulated for more than legal interest. If a mode of calculating interest, which gives to the creditor more than legal interest, is adopted, and the creditor knows it will have that effect, he is guilty of usury, although he may not suspect that he is violating the law. But no miscalculations, nor mistakes of the scrivener in dates, sums or otherwise, can make the transactions usurious. The bond taken in this case does not secure to the plaintiffs as much interest as they were entitled to; and it is impossible to believe that in taking it, they intended to secure usurious interest. The judgment should be affirmed.

JUDGE CABELL concurred, and the judgment was affirmed.*

413 *Nadenbush and Others v. Lane.

July, 1826.

Bond with Condition—Bail.—It is error to require bail in an action on a bond with a collateral condition.

Judgment by Default—Record—Writ.—In cases of judgments by default for want of appearance, the writ, with the endorsement, is a necessary part of the record.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Berkeley county; where Lane brought an action of debt on a bond against Nadenbush and Harrison. The declaration is in the simple form of a declaration on a bond for the payment of money, without any breaches assigned. An office judgment was obtained for want of appearance, and a writ of enquiry executed; on which the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. The Court rendered judgment against the defendants and their appearance bail.

The record contains a bond, filed with the declaration, which is an appeal bond. The writ has an endorsement in these words: "Debt on an appeal bond. Bail is required."

The defendants Nadenbush, Harrison, and their appearance bail, obtained a supersedeas.

Johnson, for the appellants, contended: 1. That bail was improperly demanded in this case, it being an action of debt on a bond with collateral condition. For this, he referred to 1 Rev. Code, 499, ch. 128, § 42, 43. Ruffin v. Call, 2 Wash. 181. Henderson v. Hepburn, 2 Call, 238, 239. Metcalfe v. Battaile, Gilm. 191. The judgment may be set aside for this cause, as is proved by cases before cited.

Bond with Condition—Action on.—There are two modes of declaring on a bond with a collateral condition, one by declaring upon it as a single bond without noticing the condition, in which case the defendant craves over of the condition and pleads performance, and the plaintiff replies by assigning breaches. The other is to set out the condition in the declaration and assign the breaches in it. Reynolds v. Hurst, 18 W. Va. 650, citing principal case. See further, monographic note on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801.

Judgment by Default—Reversal—Defective Service.—For defective service, a judgment by default at common law is reversible by writ of error, and not by motion, and the writ and return are part of the record. Adkins v. Globe F. Ins. Co., 45 W. Va. 391, 32 S. E. Rep. 197. The principal case is also cited in Bargamin v. Pottiaux, 4 Leigh 422. See further, monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425.

2. No breaches are assigned in this case, which is erroneous, according to the established principles of law. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 82. 2 Chitt. Pl. 153. Hardy v. Bern, 5 Term. Rep. 636. Ward & al. v. Fairfax Justices, 4 Munf. 494.

Leigh, for the appellee, contended, that the facts on which the objections were founded, did not appear judicially 414 *to the Court, as the bond was not a part of the record; and for this he cited the case of Craghill v. Page, 2 Hen. & Munf. 446.

July 31. JUDGE GREEN.

It is admitted that there is error in this case, in requiring bail, and entering judgment against him, and failing to suggest breaches of the condition of the bond, if the Court can ascertain from the record, that the bond sued upon was really a bond with a collateral condition. But, it is suggested, that in a case like this, when the declaration states the obligation, without intimating that there was any condition; and when there was a writ of enquiry, the bond, although copied into the record, is not properly a part of it. If this were so, still this would appear to be a suit upon a bond with a collateral condition, from the plaintiff's endorsement on the writ, which is a part of the record. In all cases of a judgment by default for want of appearance, the writ with the endorsement is a necessary part of the record, that it may be seen whether there was a proper foundation for the judgment, both as to the defendant and the bail; and the fact of there having been a writ of enquiry, is a proof that the bond had a condition, and that it was collateral. If it was a single bill, or a bond with a condition to pay money, no writ of enquiry could have been awarded; but final judgment should have been entered for principal and interest by the clerk.

The judgment must, therefore, be reversed; and as the Court below ought to have dismissed the suit, instead of executing the writ of enquiry, this Court, giving such judgment as the Court below ought to have given, should dismiss the suit.

The other Judges concurred, and the suit was dismissed.*

whether he alleges in his bill, that he is able to prove the usury without the defendant's confession, or not, he can only be relieved upon payment of principal, without interest, under the third section of our Act of Assembly. Decided by two Judges out of three.

This was an appeal from the Richmond Chancery Court.

Scott had obtained a judgment at law against Young, for 750 dollars, with interest and costs, as endorser of a negotiable note, executed by Dabney. A forth-coming bond was given, and forfeited, and judgment obtained on it. Young then filed a bill in Chancery to injoin this judgment, on the ground of usury.

The bill states, that the complainant became the endorser of Dabney on a note for 750 dollars, payable at the expiration of fifty days, which was delivered to Scott for the consideration of 712 dollars and 50 cents, which Dabney had borrowed of Scott: that this note was renewed several times, and on every renewal usurious interest was charged: that the usurious interest paid by him amounted to 168 dollars and 75 cents, which, deducted from the sum of 712 dollars and 50 cents, the principal money borrowed, would leave the sum of 543 dollars and 75 cents; which is all that the complainant is bound to pay, and which he is ready and willing to pay. He therefore prays, that the judgment for the whole amount, exceeding 543 dollars and 75 cents, may be enjoined. The bill calls upon Scott and Dabney to answer, on oath, all the allegations above set forth; but it does not allege, that the complainant is able to prove the usury by evidence independent of the defendants' answer.

Scott answered, denying that the sum originally borrowed was 712 dollars and 50 cents, but in fact 725 dollars: that on the several renewals of the note, two per cent. per month only was charged, but was never paid by the said Young; but, instead of payment, the said Young gave his promissory notes for the greater part of 416 the usurious interest *charged; and he has only paid 135 dollars, as interest, &c.

An injunction was awarded, on filing the bill, except as to the sum of 543 dollars and 75 cents; and on the coming in of the answer, a motion was made to dissolve; and the Chancellor referred the accounts to a Commissioner.

The Chancellor dissolved the injunction for the sum of 242 dollars and 8 cents, with interest, &c. and made it perpetual for the residue.

Young appealed.

Johnson, for the appellant.

Bacchus, for the appellees.

August 1. JUDGE CARR.

It is a fundamental principle with Courts of Equity, that no man shall be forced to accuse himself; nemo tenetur prodere seipsum. In conformity with this maxim, those Courts have constantly held that a defendant may demur to a bill, calling on him to answer any matter which may subject him to fine, forfeiture, pains or penalties. Where the forfeiture or penalty is entirely in the power of the plaintiff, if in his bill he waives it, the defendant cannot demur, but must answer. The English

Statute of Usury subjected the usurious lender of money, &c. to the loss of the sum lent. This, so far as it relates to principal and legal interest, the Chancellors have considered a penalty. When, therefore, a bill in equity called on the defendant to answer as to an usurious transaction, unless it waived the penalties of the act, and offered to pay the principal with legal interest, the defendant might demur. This practice of the English Courts, our Legislature have taken as the basis of the third section of our Act against usury; changing it only so far, as to subject the lender to the loss of all interest, and the payment of the costs of the Chancery suit.

417 This *statute I have always considered as made merely to place that on the ground of law, which was before practice; not to narrow or widen that practice, nor to make any change, except that the lender shall lose all interest and pay costs. I consider every bill in equity, for relief against usury, a bill under this section; that no man can come into that forum for relief from the principal sum borrowed, as that would be calling on equity to enforce a penalty; nor is he obliged to state in his bill that he has no evidence at all, and depends wholly on the answer; and if the answer deny the usury, he may prove it aliunde, if in his power. But however he may succeed, whether by the confession of the answer or other proof, I think, that in the language of the law, "the lender shall be obliged to accept his principal money without any interest, and pay costs, but shall be discharged from all other penalties of the act."

My opinion, of course, is, that the decree be reversed, and entered according to the principles laid down.

JUDGE GREEN.

A bill was filed by the appellant against the appellee, to be relieved against a judgment at law, founded upon an usurious contract. The bill does not allege either that the plaintiff can or cannot prove the usury, without a discovery from the defendant; but, after stating minutely all the circumstances of the contract, and the subsequent transactions and payments, calls upon the defendant to answer many particular interrogations, affirmative answers to which would completely support the charges in the bill. There is no evidence of the usury, except the admissions of the answer, which are full.

The question is, as to the measure of relief; whether, under the provisions of our statute, the plaintiff is to be relieved, upon the payment of so much of the principal sum as remained after deducting the payments made; or, under the principles of a

Court of Equity, independent of 418 *the statute, upon the payment of the balance of principal and legal interest remaining due after crediting the payments. The Court of Chancery adopted the latter rule, and was probably led to it by the discussions in Marks v. Morris; Stone v. Smith & Ware, and M'Pherrin v. King; the bill not stating that the plaintiff could not prove the usury, but by the oath of the defendant, and not praying specific relief in the terms of the act, so as to shew that he claimed the aid of the Court by virtue of the statute.

It will not be necessary to give any opinion as to the result to which the Court came in Marks v. Morris. Whenever that shall be necessary, it should be considered in a full Court. But, it is necessary to consider one of the propositions asserted in that case: that upon a bill to be relieved against an usurious contract, the Court must apply the rule existing in Courts of Equity before, and independent of, the statute, unless the plaintiff prays relief upon the distinct ground that he has no proof of the usury, independent of the defendant's oath, and shews otherwise, that he claims relief under the statute exclusively.

To understand the object of the third section of our statute, it is necessary to see what were the principles upon which Courts of Equity proceeded in giving relief against usurious contracts, independently of our statute.

A Court of Equity has no jurisdiction to enforce penalties; and it was held that the offence prohibited by the statutes of usury, was the taking of more than legal interest: that to take legal interest was not against the policy of the law: that the forfeiture of the whole of the money lent, and subjecting the usurer to the forfeiture of double the amount lent, in cases where he had received the usurious interest, (a forfeiture recoverable by any common informer,) were penalties provided to enforce this policy of the law: that, consequently, to declare the debt forfeited upon the application of the debtor, who was plaintiff, would be to enforce a penalty: but, to relieve against the usurious excess, would be to promote the policy of the law without 419 *enforcing a penalty, and was warranted by the general principles of equity, which relieve against unconscionable advantages taken of the necessitous circumstances of distressed persons. In all such cases, the Court, upon the maxim, that he who asks must do equity, relieves upon the condition that the plaintiff restore to the defendant what he has received from him. To effect these objects, it was necessary for the plaintiff, in a case of usury, expressly to waive the penalty of a forfeiture of the debt (which was in his power, no other being interested,) and to offer to pay the principal and legal interest.

It is also a rule of a Court of Equity, that a party cannot be compelled to answer any matter, if it might subject him to a penalty. His answer to a bill charging usury in the contract, even if the defendant had not received the usury, would subject him to the penalty of the loss of his whole debt, unless the penalty was waived; and therefore, it must be waived by the plaintiff, to entitle him to the defendant's answer. But, cases might occur, in which the defendant, by his answer, might subject himself to a penalty which the plaintiff could not waive; as, if the defendant had received the usurious interest, in which case he would be liable to a penalty recoverable by any informer. In such case, the defendant could not be compelled to answer to the charge of usury. But, if the plaintiff waived the penalty which was in his power, and could prove the usury without a discovery from the defendant, upon an issue, he was entitled to relief. This relief, however, was measured by the same rule, whether the plaintiff had or had not the benefit of the defendant's answer, upon the payment of principal and legal interest; and this, because the Court would, in no case, enforce a penalty, and because the party who had asked equity was, as a condition of relief to him, required to do equity. The relief upon this condition, was not a reward to the defendant for making a discovery; the rule that a party should not be compelled to answer, so as to subject himself to a penalty, being applicable

420 *to the mode of proceeding in the cause, for the purpose of ascertaining the truth of the case, and having no influence upon the measure of relief, that being determined by the facts ascertained, no matter how; and upon the principles that a Court of Equity would not enforce a penalty, and that he who asks equity must do it. These principles run through all the cases in the English Courts upon the subject, and are elucidated by the cases of Bosanquet v. Dashwood, Cas. Temp. Talbot, 38. Brownword v. Edwards, 2 Ves. 243, 249, and Scott v. Nesbitt, 14 Ves. 442.

In this state of things, the Virginia Legislature enacted that the borrower might exhibit his bill against the lender, or a discovery relative to the loan, or the re-payment thereof; and "if thereupon it shall appear that more than lawful interest was reserved, the lender shall be obliged to accept his principal money without any interest, and pay costs; but, shall be discharged from all other penalties of this act."

What was the object of this act, and what is its literal meaning? It applies to all cases, whether the money has been paid or not. The relief is to be given, if it shall appear that the contract was usurious, no matter how the fact may be made to appear. The sole object of the statute seems to be, to remove the difficulties before existing, to proceeding in Chancery, by abrogating by force of the statute, in case of an application to equity for relief, the penalty of total forfeiture, whether the plaintiff in express terms waives that penalty or not; and in case of a payment of the usury, to abolish the penalty recoverable by an informer; so, that in all cases, the defendant might be justly compelled to answer, and the cause might come to hearing in Chancery, upon the bill, answers and proofs, instead of driving the party in the latter case to a demurrer to the discovery, and the Court to investigate the charge of usury, by an issue. One other object of the act was, to prescribe as the measure of relief, the payment of the principal only, instead of the principal and interest, as was before practised.

421 *This obvious and literal construction cannot, I think, be controlled by the preamble to the original act of 1734. That preamble is now no part of the existing law. A preamble may be resorted to for the purpose of aiding the construction of an enacting clause which is equivocal in its terms, but not to control the literal and unequivocal terms of the enactment; and if that preamble were now a part of the law, I should not think it had any effect upon the literal terms of the third section. The difficulty of proving usury, arising from the secrecy with which such contracts are usually made, might be a very sufficient reason for giving a Court of Equity jurisdiction, to give a general relief in all cases where usury appears, no matter in what way.

The consequence of the construction given to the statute in Marks v. Morris would be, that if the defendant admitted the usury, he would get back his principal without interest; but, if he denied it, and it was proved, one of these consequences would result; either the defendant would be entitled to his principal and legal interest, according to the principles of a Court of Equity existing before the statute, (in which case, he would receive a premium for falsehood and perjury;) or, the plaintiff would be relieved by the Court's declaring that the whole debt, principal and interest, was forfeited; in which case, the Court would act directly against its most ancient and best settled principles, applicable to all other analogous cases; or the plaintiff would be entitled to no relief whatever; in which case, the primary object of the Legislature, to benefit the borrower by facilitating his remedy in Chancery, and relieving him to a greater extent than he could have been relieved before, would be utterly frustrated in very many instances. I cannot believe that the Legislature intended to produce, by the act in question, any of these consequences; or if they did, that they would leave that object to be attained by doubtful constructions of the terms of the statute.

If they had intended either of these 422 consequences, *they would have expressed that intent in unequivocal terms.

Upon the whole, I conclude that in all cases where a party applies to a Court of Equity for relief against an usurious contract, if he is entitled to relief at all, he must be relieved upon the terms prescribed by the statute; and that this decree must be reversed, and the injunction perpetuated, except as to so much of the principal debt as remains unpaid.

JUDGE CABELL.

The bill in this case contains no allegation of the ability of the complainant to prove usury, otherwise than by the answer of the defendant. On the contrary, it merely alleges that the contract was usurious, and calls upon the defendant directly and expressly, to answer to the usury, and prays to be relieved against the judgment, except as to the principal sum due; which principal, the complainant expresses his readiness to pay. The answer acknowledges the usury.

As the bill seeks a discovery, and asks the precise measure of relief indicated by the third section of our act of Assembly against usury, (1 Rev. Code, 373,) I cannot consider it in any other light than as a bill exhibited under that section, and I am consequently of opinion, that the Chancellor erred in not conforming his decree to that section.

As the present is a bare Court, as none of the Judges are now present who decided the case of Marks v. Morris, and as it is not at all necessary to the decision of this case, (according to the view that I have taken of it,) that we should discuss any of the principles settled in Marks v. Morris, I studiously forbear to express any opinion in relation thereto.

Decree reversed.*

August, 1836.

Apprenticeship—Liability of Master—Medical Services.

—The master of an apprentice is bound to pay for medical attendance on the apprentice, from the very nature of the relation between master and apprentice; and the father of the apprentice is only bound, when the services have been rendered at his instance.

Instructions.—Reversal.—The instruction of a Court will not be reversed, when it is right in principle, but the reason assigned is erroneous.

An action of assumpsit was brought in the County Court of Halifax, by Craddock and Tuck against Drury Easley, for medical attendance on the son of the defendant. Plea, non assumpsit, and issue. Verdict and judgment for the defendant.

At the trial, the defendant introduced evidence to prove that at the time the said medical assistance was rendered, the said William B. Easley (the son of the defendant,) was living at the house of a certain Samuel Williams, under an indenture of apprenticeship. This indenture (which was also set forth) contains a clause, that the said S. Williams shall "furnish for the said William B. Easley, good and wholesome diet and lodging, and also to clothe him the said Wm. Easley, with good and suitable apparel," "and in all things generally to do and perform whatsoever is just and right towards the said W. Easley, &c." The defendant moved the Court to instruct the jury, that by the said covenant and indenture, the said S. Williams was bound to provide medical assistance to the said W. B. Easley, and that, therefore, this action could not be maintained against the defendant; which instruction the Court gave, and the plaintiffs excepted.

The plaintiffs appealed to the Superior Court, who reversed the judgment of the County Court; and the defendant appealed to this Court.

Johnson, for the appellant, contended for the liability of the master, and relied upon the cases of Seaman v. Castel, 424 *1 Esp. N. P. Cas. 270. Wennell v. Abney, Bos. & Pull. 247. These cases go farther than the case at bar, because they relate to hired servants, and this is the case of an infant apprentice, who has no wages as a reward for his services like the former. He referred also to 4 Comyn's Dig. 857, in the Addenda, and

Rex v. Inhab. of Hales, 1 Stra. 99; in support of this doctrine. Medical assistance is provided for in the covenant under the head of "diet," and the clause to provide "all things necessary, &c."

But, if the County Court erred, the Circuit Court erred also. It was the duty of the Circuit Court to have said in what the County Court were wrong. If the County Court were right in saying that the master was liable for medical assistance afforded to his apprentice, and wrong in saying that the father was not liable, the Circuit Court ought to have discriminated between these two instructions, and not to have reversed the cause in toto, without pointing out the error into which the County Court had fallen.

Leigh, for the appellee, contended that a master is not bound for medical services to an hired servant, as is proved by the cases cited on the other side; and there is no distinction between the cases of apprentices and other servants.

As to the objection that the Circuit Court ought to have discriminated between the good and bad part of the instruction of the County Court, the appellant cannot make that complaint, because he moved for the instruction, and confounded the liability of the master and the non-liability of the father, in one motion. There can be no doubt that the father may be liable, under certain circumstances, as where the services were rendered at his instance. But the County Court have said that the father is not liable under any circumstances. The Court gave both instructions as asked for, and if any part is erroneous, the whole must be reversed.

425 *August 2. JUDGE GREEN delivered the opinion of the Court.‡

This was an action by a physician against the father, for the recovery of a compensation for medical attendance upon an infant son. After the plaintiff gave evidence of his attendance, without any proof, as far as appears, that the attendance was at the instance of the father, the defendant proved that his son was, at the time of the plaintiff's service rendered, an apprentice, and resided at his master's house; and produced the indentures of apprenticeship, by which the master covenanted "to furnish for the said William Easley, (the apprentice,) good and wholesome diet and lodging, and also to clothe him with good and suitable apparel; and furthermore, to use the said William Easley with as much moderation and lenity, as is consistent with the duties required of him, and in all things generally to do and perform whatsoever is just and right towards the said William Easley, so far as his the said Williams's capacity and ability will enable him;" and moved the Court to instruct the jury, that by the said covenant and indenture, the said S. B. Williams, the master, was bound to provide medical assistance to the said William B. Easley, and that therefore this action could not be maintained against the defendant: which instruction was given.

I incline to think that the terms of the covenant had not the effect attributed to them by the Court; certainly not, unless the duty to provide medical assistance for the apprentice, devolved by law upon the master, by virtue of the relation of master and apprentice; and if so, whether the performance of that duty was secured by the covenant or not, was unimportant in this cause. The duty, whether implied by law or stipulated by the contract, would have the same effect upon the rights of the parties in the suit. If, therefore, it was the duty of the master, resulting 426 *from the relation of master and apprentice, to provide medical attendance, the instruction of the Court was substantially right, whether that duty was provided for in the covenant or not, so far as it went to affirm the existence of that obligation.

It seems to be settled in England, that the master is not bound to provide medical assistance for a hired servant, unless he stipulates for it in the contract of hiring; although the contrary was held by Lord Kenyon, Seaman v. Castel, 1 Esp. Ni. Pri. Cas. 270; Wennell v. Abney, 3 Bos. & Pull. 247; and this doctrine appears to be well founded. The wages paid by the master in such case, are the means of providing for the servant whatever he may want, which the master has not stipulated in terms to furnish; and if the servant should, during his service, acquire any thing by his labour for any other, the master would not be entitled to it. The only remedy of the master would be against the servant himself, if he had been injured by the servant's labouring for another, unless that other had seduced the servant from the master's service.

But, the case of an apprentice is different. He receives no compensation from the master, except his maintenance and education; and his whole labour and capacity belong so completely to the master, that any thing which he earns during his apprenticeship is due to the master directly, although the master is not privy or assenting to his earning it. As, if an apprentice runs away and joins a privateer; his share of prize money is due to the master. 3 Vin. Abr. 21, pl. 8. 15 Vin. Abr. 326, pl. 1. Ib. 327, pl. 4. Meriton v. Hornsby, 1 Ves. 48. Hill v. Allen, 1 Ves. 83. As to the maintenance and care of the infant apprentice, the master seems to be placed in loco parentis, and subject to the same obligations as a father. If the apprentice becomes disabled by an incurable disease, the master is still bound to maintain him. 1 Strange, 99. The assumpsit implied in this case, from the mere fact of rendering the medical service, rested upon the 427 master, and not upon the *father.

But, if the service had been rendered at the instance of the father, and upon his credit, he would have been responsible to the plaintiff, notwithstanding the legal obligation of the master.

The Court was therefore right in instructing the jury, that the master was bound to provide medical assistance for the apprentice; but it did not follow, as they determined, that the action could not be maintained. The instruction should have been, that it could not be maintained, unless the services were proved to have been rendered at the instance of the defendant. The judgment of the Superior Court, reversing that of the County Court, is therefore right, and to be affirmed.

APPRENTICES.

Who May Bind.—A father may bind his infant child apprentice by indentures to which the child is a party, but indentures of apprenticeship executed by the father, without the child's concurrence, are not only voidable, but void. Pierce v. Massenburg, 4 Leigh 498. See State v. Renff, 29 W. Va. 751, 2 S. E. Rep. 801.

And overseers of the poor, under a proper order of a county court, may bind out children within their jurisdiction. Brewer v. Harris, 5 Gratt. 285.

Proceedings—Requirements of Statute.—A minor can only be bound as an apprentice by his father, or, if none, by his guardian, or, if neither father nor guardian, by his mother with the consent, entered of record, of the county court of the county in which the minor resides; or, without such consent, if the minor being fourteen years of age agree in writing to be so bound, or unless such minor be found begging in such county, or is likely to become chargeable thereto, and, if not so bound, the indentures of the apprenticeship are void. State v. Renff, 29 W. Va. 751, 2 S. E. Rep. 801. See Code of Va., § 2581; Code of W. Va., p. 718.

Same—Under Order of Court—Appeal.—And, if infants are bound as apprentices pursuant to an order of the county court, no appeal lies from such order. Cooper v. Saunders, 1 Hen. & M. 418. See Code 1887, § 2581.

Same—Same—Certiorari.—But, where, pursuant to an order of the county court, infants are bound apprentices, though there be no appeal from such order, a writ of certiorari lies to bring up the record and correct the proceedings. Cooper v. Saunders, 1 Hen. & M. 418.

The Contract—Parties—Remedies.—Where the indentures of apprenticeship contain covenants by the master in favor of the mother of the apprentices, and also in favor of the apprentices, but the latter are not parties to it, it is valid, and the remedies will be adapted to the case. Brewer v. Harris, 5 Gratt. 285.

Same—Same—Sufficient Execution.—Where the order of court directs a child to be bound out by the overseers of the poor, and only one of the overseers executes the indenture it is sufficient. Brewer v. Harris, 5 Gratt. 285.

Same—Binding for Shorter Periods.—And, when the statute directs that apprentices shall be bound out till they are eighteen years of age, a binding out till the age of seventeen is valid. Brewer v. Harris, 5 Gratt. 285.

Rights and Liabilities—Medical Attendance.—A master of an apprentice is bound to pay for medical attendance on the apprentice, from the very nature of the relation between master and apprentice; and the father of the apprentice is only bound when the services have been rendered at his instance. Easley v. Craddock, 4 Rand. 423.

Same—Enticing Away.—Where a child is apprenticed without its concurrence, the contract being void, a party who entices the child away from its master is not liable in damages. Pierce v. Massenburg, 4 Leigh 498.

Actions—Proper Parties.—Covenant will not lie in the name of the apprentice on the indenture of apprenticeship entered into by the overseers of the poor without any previous order of court for binding out the apprentice. Such indenture is not a statutory deed, and, therefore, covenant can only be maintained on it in the name of the overseers who are parties to it. Bullock v. Sebrell, 6 Leigh 560. See Poindexter v. Wilton, 8 Munf. 183.

Same—Same.—An action in behalf of an apprentice, upon his indenture of apprenticeship, should not be brought in the name of the overseer of the poor, but in his own name. Poindexter v. Wilton, 8 Munf. 183. See Bullock v. Sebrell, 6 Leigh 560.

Quere—Removal—Legal Settlement.—If the apprentice is removed out of the county or corporation in which he was bound, can the court thereof direct the overseer of their poor to send for and bind him to another master; and whether an apprentice so moved obtains legal settlement in the county wherein he is moved by remaining there twelve months during his apprenticeship? Cooper v. Saunders, 1 Hen. & M. 413.

Hamilton v. Shrewsbury.

August, 1826.

Executions*—Proceedings Thereunder Void—Effect.—If the proceedings under an execution are wholly void, no title passes by the sale to the purchaser, and the defendant may have redress in an action of detinue, and a Court of Equity has no jurisdiction.

Same—Sale Thereunder Void—Misconduct of Sheriff—Equity Jurisdiction.—If the execution is valid so far as to bind the property, but the sale under it is void, on account of the interest or improper conduct of the sheriff, the Court, from which the execution issued, may correct the abuse of its own process, by quashing the execution, &c. and there is no ground for equity to interfere.

Same*—Improper Conduct of Sheriff—Effect on Purchaser without Notice.—A fair purchaser under a sheriff's sale, without knowledge of any improper conduct on the part of the officer, acquires a valid title to the property purchased, and the remedy of the party injured is, by action at law, for damages, against the sheriff. The same remedy applies where a sheriff has improperly refused a forthcoming bond, when he ought to have received it.

Appeal from the Chancery Court of Greenbrier.

Hamilton filed a bill against Reynolds, Waugh, and Donnally, to injoin a judgment obtained by Waugh against him. The bill states, that the complainant, with two others, being appearance bail for 428 Stuart and Dennison, judgment *was rendered against them, for failing to enter special bail: that an execution having issued against Stuart and Dennison, and no property being found, the deputy sheriff, Reynolds, required the sureties to pay the money: that, accordingly, one of the bail paid his proportion, (one-third) and the complainant paid his proportion by an arrangement between him and the sheriff, which was fully satisfied: that the third person, who was appearance bail, also made an arrangement with the sheriff, by which his proportion was satisfied; so that the execution was completely discharged: that, notwithstanding these transactions, the said Reynolds returned the execution, allowing a credit only for a small part of the amount paid, and levied it on a slave of the complainant who had run-away: that these proceedings took place at the instance of Donnally, to whom, as was alleged, the benefit of the said execution had been transferred; that the complainant understands that it is the intention of the said Reynolds to proceed to the sale of the said slave, &c. He therefore prays, that the proceedings on the said execution may be stayed, &c.

The injunction was granted.

The complainant afterwards filed an amended bill, stating, that the said Reynolds had sold the slave above mentioned under the execution, and Shrewsbury became the purchaser for $525, although he was worth more than $1000; that the slave was not present when sold, the said Reynolds having permitted him to elope; that previous to the day of sale the complainant had offered to execute a forthcoming bond, so as to leave the slave in the possession of the complainant; but the said Reynolds, after having at first consented to receive it, afterwards refused; that the said slave is now in the possession of Shrewsbury, who receives his services worth $18 per month; that the complainant apprehends that the said Shrewsbury may remove him. He therefore prays, that Shrewsbury may be made a defendant to the suit. 429 *The answer of Reynolds denies, that any credit ought to be allowed to the complainant, as stated in the bill, and enters into a detail of circumstances to establish his denial; that it was by the complainant's own act, that the credit was not allowed on the execution; that at one period, the execution was acquired by the respondent, but it was afterwards wholly transferred to the said Donnally; that the said Donnally sued out an execution, and placed it in the hands of the respondent, as deputy sheriff, and caused it to be levied on the said slave, who was duly advertised and sold for $525 cash, and Shrewsbury became the purchaser; that previous to the sale, the brother of the complainant offered himself and another, as sureties in a forthcoming bond; but, the respondent refused to receive them, as being insufficient, which he believes to have been the fact; that he admits, that at the moment of the sale, the said slave was not present, but he had been within an hour or half an hour before; that just before the sale began, the boy absented himself, but without the knowledge nor even suspicion of the respondent, of his so doing or intending to do so; and he came in within a few hours after the sale was over; but, his absence did not occasion the smallest diminution in the price, for which he sold; that he was well known to all present, having been a servant in a tavern at Charleston for many years; that the sum of $525 was the full value of the said slave, &c.

Depositions were taken, and the cause coming on to be heard, the Chancellor decreed that the bill should be dismissed as to the defendant Shrewsbury, and the cause retained in Court against the other defendants, for accounts, &c. From this decree, the plaintiff appealed, so far as it dismissed his bill as to Shrewsbury.

Leigh, for the appellant.

Johnson, for the appellee.

430 *The counsel for the appellant made three objections to the decree:

1. The sale was void, because the deputy sheriff had no right to sell the property, he being interested in the execution as the assignor of Donnally, and therefore responsible to him, if the execution proved fruitless.

2. The deputy sheriff acted improperly in refusing the security tendered on the forthcoming bond, who was amply sufficient, as the evidence proves. The sale was therefore void, and no title passed to Shrewsbury.

3. The slave was a run-away at the time of the sale. This was irregular. The property must be in the actual possession of the sheriff, and present at the sale. He is bound to keep the property securely. This circumstance rendered the slave much less productive than he would have been, if he had been present, as is proved by the evidence.

August 2. JUDGE CABELL delivered his opinion, in which the other Judges concurred.*

The sheriff of Kanawha county, by virtue of an execution against the goods and chattels of the appellant, sold a slave belonging to the appellant, at public sale, and the appellee became the purchaser thereof. The object of the bill, in this case, is to recover back the slave; and the question is, whether a Court of Equity ought to interfere for that purpose, under the circumstances attending the case.

The sale is objected to on three grounds:

1. That the deputy sheriff was so interested as to be incapable, in point of law, of acting as sheriff on this execution; he having once owned, and having assigned the judgment: 2. That the sheriff refused to receive from the appellant, a forthcoming bond with good security: and 3. That he sold the slave without having him present at the time and place of sale, the said slave having previously run-away.

431 *There is no allegation in the bill, of any fraud or collusion in the appellee, nor of any knowledge by him of any fraud or improper conduct on the part of the sheriff.

If the proceedings under the execution were wholly void, no title passed by the sale to the purchaser, and there was no impediment to an action of detinue in a Court of Law.

If, as was contended by the counsel for the appellant, the levying of the execution was so far valid as to bind the property, but the sale thereof was void on account of the interest or improper conduct of the sheriff who made the sale, still the appellant had complete redress at law. The Court, from which the execution had issued, would, on application, have corrected the abuse of its process, by quashing the execution, setting aside the sale, and restitution of the property might have been enforced at law.

In neither event, therefore, ought a Court of Equity to interfere.

But, I am clearly of opinion, that the title to the property passed by the sale to the appellee. He is a fair purchaser, without imputation of fraud or collusion, and without knowledge of any improper conduct on the part of the officer.

The mere circumstance of the sheriff having sold the property without its being present at the time and place of sale, is not, of itself, sufficient to vacate the sale. Such sale may, under circumstances, be right and proper. There is no proof of such loss to the appellant, as would justify the Court of Equity to interfere, even if it had jurisdiction. If the sheriff has been guilty of improper conduct in this respect, or in refusing to receive a delivery bond when he ought to have received it, he is responsible for damages in an action at law, to those who may be injured.

This case is very different from that of Carter v. Harris, lately decided in this Court. In that case, the sheriff was the plaintiff in the judgment. He sold the property under the execution, and 432 became himself the purchaser, *after having fraudulently taken measures to prevent others from bidding, or giving a fair price for it. It was his own personal fraud that justified the interference of equity. There is no such ingredient in this case, and the decree ought to be affirmed.

Commonwealth v. Pierce's Administrator.

August, 1826.

Auditor—Power to Issue Warrants.—By the general law prescribing the duties of the Auditor, he is not authorised to issue a warrant for any claim, not arising under some law or resolution of the General Assembly: and, therefore, a claim under the act of January 8, 1814, for the passage of troops over a toll-bridge, who were in the service of the Commonwealth, but not taken into the service of the State by any law or resolution, cannot be sanctioned by the Auditor, but the redress of the claimant and by application to the Legislature.

Militia—Requisition of United States—Liability of Virginia for Expenses.—Expenses of the militia in time of war, under requisition of the United States, are properly payable by them; and if the State of Virginia consents to advance any portion of these expenses, she is under no legal or moral obligation to pay more.

Same—Same—Same.—If the payment of these expenses is left by law to the discretion of the Executive, a party cannot claim, as a matter of legal right, more than the Executive. In their discretion may choose to allow.

Same—Statute.—For What It Provides.—The act of January 8, 1814, only provides for expenses necessary to place the militia under requisition for the service of the United States, at the appointed place of rendezvous.

The administrator de bonis non of Thomas Pierce, deceased, presented to the Executive a demand of his intestate, for the liquidation and payment of a claim against the State, for the passage of certain companies of militia, during the late war, over a toll-bridge belonging to the intestate. The amount demanded was $317 45 cents, being the sum due at the legal rate of tolls. The Executive referred these accounts to the military accountant, who rejected all but a balance of $79 52 cents, for which the Governor gave an order to the Auditor of public accounts 433 *to issue a warrant on the Treasurer, and charge it to the United States. The claimant, refusing to accede to the abatement which had been made, demanded of the Auditor a warrant for the whole amount; which was refused, on the ground, that the Auditor had no discretion to depart from the direction of the Executive, and the law not having made any special provision for the payment of such claims.

*The PRESIDENT and JUDGE COALTER, absent.

The claimant appealed to the Superior Court of Henrico, where the decision of the Auditor was reversed, and the whole claim allowed; from which decision, an appeal was taken by the Commonwealth, with an agreement that the facts above stated, in substance, should be considered as a case agreed.

The Attorney General, for the appellant, contended, that neither the Auditor nor the Superior Court, had any jurisdiction to control the decision of the Executive in this case: that the subject of this claim was submitted by the acts of 1814, to the discretion of the Executive, and the military accountant was created only to obey their directions: that this case did not come under the general law authorising appeals from the Auditor. He referred to 1 Phill. Evid. 281, and Moody v. Thurston, 1 Stra. 481, to shew that in a case like the present, the decision of a board, created by statute, is conclusive.

M. Robinson, for the appellee, replied, that the acts of 1814, did not apply to this case: that the bridge was authorised by law, and the tolls then fixed were a contract with Pierce, and the Legislature had no power to alter those terms: that, to contend that the Executive had the power of deciding finally upon this claim, would be to give them judicial power, in opposition to the express provisions of the constitution.

434 August 5. JUDGE GREEN delivered the opinion of the Court.

From the case agreed, it appears that in 1813 and 1814, many companies of militia in the service of the Commonwealth passed over a bridge belonging to the intestate of the appellee, which was established, and the rates of toll fixed, by an act of Assembly. The tolls for the passage of these troops, at the legal rate, amounted to $317 45 cents. The intestate, in 1816, applied to the Executive for the payment of this account. They referred the accounts to the military accountant, and he allowed only $79 52 cents, as due upon them; for which the Governor gave an order to the Auditor to issue a warrant on the Treasurer, and charge it to the United States. The claimant refused to accept the smaller sum; and in 1825, the appellee, his administrator, claimed of the Auditor a warrant for the whole amount of $317 45 cents, which he refused to issue. Thereupon, the appellee petitioned the Superior Court of Henrico for an appeal from the decision of the Auditor, which was allowed, and the decision reversed. The Superior Court directed a warrant to issue for the whole amount of the demand.

The propriety of this order depends upon several acts of Assembly, the general act prescribing the duty of the Auditor of Public Accounts, and the acts providing for the payment of certain military expenses and the appointment of a military accountant.

The first of these acts is a general and permanent law, and directs that the Auditor shall audit all accounts, claims and demands whatsoever, against the public, arising under any law or resolution of the General Assembly, and grant to every public claimant authorised by law to demand the same, a warrant on the Treasurer for the sum due; and when he shall disallow or abate any article of demand 435 *against the Commonwealth, any person thinking himself aggrieved thereby may, by petition, appeal to the Superior Court of Chancery or Superior Court of Law held at Richmond, for redress, and such Court shall proceed to do right therein: and a like petition shall be allowed in all other cases to any other person, who is entitled to demand against the Commonwealth any right in law or equity.

The act of January 8, 1814, provided for a particular occasion. After reciting that it was the duty of the United States to defray all expenses incurred in the defence of the United States, and especially such as were necessary to give effect to the requisitions of militia called out by the President of the United States in the service thereof; but no provision having been made by the United States for certain expenses rendered necessary by the march of certain detachments of militia to Norfolk and elsewhere, it provides, that the Executive be authorised to cause to be paid any expenditures heretofore incurred or hereafter to be incurred, for the support, equipments and transportation of any part of the militia to the place of rendezvous, which in their discretion may be deemed just and necessary, and appropriated $100,000 to the purposes of the act.

To enable the Executive to carry this act into effect, another act passed on the 1st of February, 1814, authorising the Executive to appoint a military accountant to perform such duties as they might assign to him, in the settlement of military claims and accounts.

The act of January 1814, provided for no other militia expenses than those necessary to place the militia under requisition for the service of the United States, at the appointed place of rendezvous; expenses which were properly payable by the United States, but which they had not provided for, as is expressly stated in the act. The moral obligation to pay those expenses devolved on them, and not on the State of Virginia; and without the provision made by the act of 1814, there would have been no legal or moral claim upon the State

436 of Virginia to pay any "part of those expenses. That this was the class of expenses intended to be provided for by the act, appears not only from the terms of the act, but by the circumstances that no provision was made for supporting or defraying the expenses of the militia after they reached the place of rendezvous, nor was there any law for employing any part of the militia in the service of the State, and paying their expenses. Both the claimant and the Executive understood that the troops, on account of which the charges in question were incurred, were troops in the service of the United States. The accounts were exhibited by the party as accounts against the United States; and the portion directed to be paid by the Executive, was directed to be charged to the United States. The Legislature, providing for the payment of those expenses which were properly chargeable directly upon the United States, might justly limit the advances to be made, by any rule, according to their discretion. They accordingly limited the payments to be made by the Executive, to such as in their discretion might be deemed just and necessary. A party, claiming under this act, can claim as a matter of legal right, only so much as the Executive in their discretion choose to allow. The grounds upon which they disallowed the greater part of the claims in the case, do not appear; nor is it material that they should, since the subject was committed to their sound discretion. The Auditor had no authority to audit the accounts in question originally. His duty was, to issue his warrant for the sum directed by the Executive to be paid. He had no authority to control the judgment of the Executive in this particular, any more than he has to control the discretion of the Executive, the Courts of Justice, and other tribunals, to whose discretion is confided the making allowances to persons who render services to the public in many other instances, without any limit to that discretion. When there is such a limit fixed by law, it is the duty of the Auditor not to carry into effect any order transcending the legal limitation upon that discretion. In this case there was no such limit.

437 *We are not, however, at liberty to consider this as a case falling under the act of 1814. The case agreed expressly states, that the troops were in the service of the Commonwealth. By what authority they were so, is not stated. There was no law or resolution of the General Assembly, that authorised any militia to be employed in the service of the State, or providing for the payment of the expenses thereby incurred. In such a case, the Auditor could audit no account, nor issue any warrant, for such expenses. His power is to audit accounts and issue warrants to those authorised by law to demand the latter, for demands arising under some law or resolution of the General Assembly. If in a case of emergency, the Executive were to call the militia into service, the expenses incurred thereby could only be provided for by subsequent legislation. The pay and subsistence of the troops, and other expenses incident to their service, could not be adjusted by the Auditor and the Courts of Justice upon the principles of a quantum meruit or quantum valebat.

That part of the general law which authorises an original petition, upon which right is to be done to any person having any demand in law or equity against the Commonwealth, cannot apply to such a case as this. Such demand must be founded upon some existing law. No such demand can exist against the public upon the principles of implied assumpsits, unless it be founded upon some contract authorised by law, made by a public agent, or upon the payment to the Commonwealth, of money which she was not entitled to claim.

If any injustice was done to the complainant by the Executive, in rejecting the larger part of his claim, he can only be relieved by an application to the Legislature. The order must be reversed, and the petition dismissed.

*Enders, &c. v. Brune.

August, 1826.

Principal and Surety—Substitution—Case at Bar.—Where A. gives his bond for duties on goods imported into the United States, for B. the importer, and B. is not bound in the bond; if A. discharges the bond, it seems that he cannot be placed in the condition of the United States, as to priority, in a claim against A. under the law of Congress.

Same—Same—Same.—But, upon general principles of equity, A. in such case, will be substituted in place of the creditor (the U. S.) and have every preference that the U. S. were entitled to.

Same—Same—Operation of Doctrine.—Equity does not regard form but substance; and therefore it does not require that a surety shall be bound in the same bond with his principal, in order to make the doctrine of substitution operate, but merely that having bound himself for the debt of the principal debtor, he should have paid it.

This was an appeal from the Richmond Chancery Court, where Brune (suing for the benefit of the house of Van Kapf & Brune) filed his bill against Shelton & Co. and Enders and Clarke, their trustees. The bill states, that Shelton & Co. imported in the ship Clara, certain goods and merchandize, from Bremen to Baltimore: that at the particular instance and request of the said Shelton & Co. and under the rule of the Custom House, requiring that the obligors in the duty bonds should reside in Baltimore, the complainant was induced to become bound in bonds for the duties on the goods so imported, to the United States, and procured two other persons to join in the said bonds: that the said bonds were fully paid to the United States by the complainant: that the said Shelton & Co. had assigned over all their effects to Enders and Clarke, for the benefit of certain cred-

Subrogation—On What Doctrine Founded.—The doctrine of subrogation cannot be perverted so as to work injustice. It is the creature of equity, and justice is its object. It is founded upon principles of equity and benevolence, and is only to be administered in a clear case, and never to the prejudice of the rights of others. Miller v. Holland, 84 Va. 669, 5 S. E. Rep. 701, citing the principal case as authority for the statement.

The doctrine of subrogation is the offspring of natural justice, and is not founded in contract. It is the creature of equity, and is so administered as to attain real essential justice without regard to form. "It has nothing of form, nothing of technicality about it, and he who, in administering it would stick in the letter, forgets the end of its creation, and perverts the spirit which gave it birth." Douglass v. Fagg, 8 Leigh 598; Hudson v. Dismukes, 77 Va. 247; Fidelity Ins. etc., Co. v. S. V. R. Co., 86 Va. 17, 9 S. E. Rep. 769; Sands v. Durham, 99 Va. 268, 38 S. E. Rep. 148; Hawker v. Moore, 40 W. Va. 61, 20 S. E. Rep. 849; Myers v. Miller, 45 W. Va. 617; 31 S. E. Rep. 981; Pace v. Pace, 85 Va. 793, 30 S. E. Rep. 361.

Again in McNeill v. Miller, 29 W. Va. 463, 2 S. E. Rep. 337, it is said: "The doctrine of subrogation is derived from the civil law, and has been adopted by our courts of equity. It is treated as a creature of equity, and administered so as to secure real and essential justice without regard to form, and is independent of any contractual relations between the parties to be affected by it. It is broad enough to include every instance in which one party pays a debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which, in equity and good conscience should have been discharged by the latter; but it is not to be applied in favor of one who has, officiously and as a mere volunteer, paid the debt of another, for which neither he nor his property was answerable, and which he was under no obligation to pay; and it is not allowed where it would work any injustice itors specified in the deed of assignment: that at the complainant having paid off the said duty bonds, conceives that he is entitled to be paid out of the effects of Shelton & Co. the amount of the said bonds, in preference to any other creditor, not only on the ground of the law relative to the collection of duties, but upon the general principles of equity. The bill prays that the said Shelton & Co., and Enders and Clarke may be made defendants: that the said trustees may be compelled to exhibit the deed of *trust aforesaid: 439 that they be decreed to pay the demand of the complainant out of the trust subject, &c.

The answer of Enders and Clarke admits the assignment of the co-partnership effects of Shelton & Co. to them as trustees: that they believe that each of the partners of the said firm, has made an assignment of his individual estate to trustees, since the assignment of their partnership funds; and they refer the complainant to their answer in another suit, for a similar demand, for their grounds of defence to the allegations of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff filed an amended bill, making Chamberlayne and Bacchus defendants, as the trustees of Walter Shelton (one of the firm of Shelton & Co.) alleging, that the said Walter had conveyed to them, for the benefit of certain creditors, a considerable property real and personal, other than that conveyed by the first deed: that the said Walter, at the time he executed the said second deed, was entirely insolvent, and had no other estate than that conveyed by the said deed: that the Sheltons have both taken the oath of insolvent debtors. The bill prays also, that the several creditors under the two deeds aforesaid may be made defendants.

Enders and Clarke answered the amended bill, suggesting that the second deed was not made to secure bona fide creditors; and that, therefore, if the plaintiff is entitled to the preference which he claims, his demand ought, in equity, to be paid out of that fund, rather than out of the property conveyed to them, which was intended to satisfy real and bona fide debts.

The Chancellor decreed that the defendants Enders and Clarke should pay, out of the trust subject in their hands, the amount claimed by the plaintiff, with interest, &c.

Enders and Clarke appealed.

Scott, for the appellants.

Nicholas, for the appellee.

440 *The Attorney General, for the trustees of Walter Shelton.

The topics of argument are so fully stated in the following opinion, that it is unnecessary to insert them here.

August 7. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

The case made by the bill is briefly this: that Shelton & Co. merchants of Richmond, imported some linens from Bremen to Baltimore; that they requested the plaintiffs to enter into bonds with the collector of the port, for the duties accruing to the United States on these goods; that in compliance with this request, the plaintiff, Brune, executed, with sureties, these bonds to the collector, which the plaintiffs have discharged; that by this payment, the plaintiffs have acquired the right, as well under the laws of Congress, as by the general principles of equity, to be placed in the shoes of the United States, and to enjoy the preference which is secured to them by law, over other creditors; that Shelton & Co. becoming insolvent subsequently, have conveyed all their property to trustees for the benefit of certain creditors. The prayer of the bill is, that the plaintiffs may be substituted to the United States, and that the trustees be decreed to pay first their debt, out of the trust subject.

Shelton & Co. have not answered, and the bill as to them is taken for confessed. The trustees answer, resisting the claim on various grounds.

The points taken by their counsel in the argument, were, 1. That there is no evidence, that Brune & Co. ever executed bonds for the duties: 2. No proof that they have discharged them: 3. That if executed and paid, the transaction does not present the case of principal and surety contemplated by the act of Congress: 4. That it is not a case for substitution: 5. That there is another fund, (the second deed of trust,) to which the plaintiffs ought to resort.

441 *1. In considering the first point, I will not stop to enquire, whether the affidavit of Brune is admissible, but will throw it out of the case, being satisfied that there is abundance of evidence without it. By the letter of Shelton & Co. dated Richmond, September 11, 1818, these defendants say to the plaintiffs, "The linens sent to your address you will please to bond, and ship them by the first vessel bound for this place. We have not as yet received the invoice and bill of lading; calculate on getting it tonight. We shall make the necessary entries at our custom-house, and transmit the same to your address."

It may not be amiss to remark, in passing, that this last sentence seemed to be considered in the argument, as rendering it probable that Shelton & Co. meant to pay the duties at the custom-house in Rich-to the rights of others. Clevinger v. Miller, 27 Gratt. 740; Enders v. Brune, 4 Rand. 438; Lewis v. Palmer, 28 N. Y. 271; Sheld. Subr. §§1-3, and cases cited." The principal case is also cited with approval on the subject of substitution in Ford v. Thornton, 8 Leigh 700; Powell v. White, 11 Leigh 316, 325, 333; foot-note to Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Gratt. 164; Jones v. Phelan, 20 Gratt. 243; Johnson v. Young, 20 W. Va. 661; Norris v. Woods, 89 Va. 876, 17 S. E. Rep. 552. See further, on this subject, monographic note on "Subrogation" appended to Janney v. Stephen, 2 Pat. & H. 11.

Same-Sureties.—A principal for whom another, at his request, undertakes as security, although such principal's name does not appear in the obligation given by the surety, is as much bound to indemnify such surety for what he pays on the obligation as if his name appeared in it as principal, and the surety in such case is entitled by subrogation to enforce for his exoneration or indemnity all the rights, remedies and securities of the creditor against the principal debtor. Harnsberger v. Yancey, 33 Gratt. 539, saying that Enders v. Brune was decided upon this principle. To the same effect, the principal case was cited in Sherman v. Shaver, 75 Va. 11.

Same—Estate of Principal.—That the surety has the right of substitution against the estate of his principal, where payment of a preferred debt has been made by such surety after the death of the principal, would seem to be settled in Virginia. Robertson v. Trigg, 32 Gratt. 85, referring especially to the principal case.

mond. But, that could not be done. The duties must be bonded and paid to the collector at the port of entry. Nor does the letter indicate such an idea. Shelton & Co. knew that the invoice, or evidence of it was necessary to the entry of the goods at Baltimore. They supposed that there was but one invoice; and expecting that it would come to them of course as owners of the goods, they meant to take the proper steps at the custom-house here, to enable them to send on the evidence. This is clear from the letter of the plaintiffs in reply to the above. Under date of September 14, 1818, they say, "The twelve bales of linen per Clara, having been shipped to our address, and being also furnished with a duplicate invoice, we have been enabled to enter them at our custom-house; consequently, you need not make any entry to be forwarded here. None of the said linens," (the letter adds,) "have been bonded. As soon as they are, we'll forward them to you, and advise you thereof."

It will be as well here, to dismiss with a passing remark, another point much relied on in the argument, to wit: that the bonds given to the collector could not have been executed under the authority of the 442 letter of Shelton & Co. *because the bonds and the letter both bore date on the 11th of September, 1818. But, it is clear to me, that the bonds, though dated the 11th, were not executed till afterwards. The letter just quoted is dated the 14th, and it states that the bonds were not then given. I understand it thus. By the act of Congress, the master must report his vessel to the proper officer within 24 hours after his arrival; and within 15 days thereafter, the goods must be entered with the collector. It is not required that immediately upon such entry, bonds should be given; but the goods cannot be landed until they are given. They are payable on goods of this description in 8, 10 and 12 months from the date of the entry; and, therefore, though executed after it, they bear equal date with it. Under date of September 24th, 1818, the plaintiffs write to the defendants, Shelton & Co., thus: "Your 12 bales linen per Clara, have been forwarded per schooner Varnat, capt. Banks, which sailed a couple of days since. We gave to capt. Banks the original invoice, certified at our custom-house, and the bill of lading signed by capt. Banks, both under cover to you. Annexed you'll find account of charges of said linens, amounting to $383 26 cents, for which, if found correct, please give us credit," &c. The account here referred to, contains a particular statement of all the charges, freight, primage, drayage, &c. paid by the plaintiffs for Shelton & Co.; and also, of the three bonds entered into at the custom-house; and the letter states, that for that part of it which the plaintiffs advanced in cash, they had valued on Shelton & Co. in favor of Luke & Sizer. These accounts are received by Shelton & Co. without objection, retained by them, and now produced by the defendants as evidence. The answer which sets them out acknowledges, that the goods had been sent to Richmond. All this evidence, taken together with the law, (which forbids the landing of the goods until the bonds are given,) proves clearly to me, that the bonds were executed as charged in the bill.

443 *II. Have the plaintiffs discharged these bonds? The answer itself states that the respondents have been informed, and believe, that the plaintiffs did pay some money for duties upon goods imported by Shelton & Co. and refers to the account before mentioned to shew in what character they paid it. The money, thus admitted to be paid, could be no other than the duty bonds. But further and stronger! The plaintiffs produce these bonds, agreeing exactly in date and sum with those in the account. Brune makes a statement that these are the bonds given to the collector; that they have been paid off by his house, and are annexed to the statement; and to this statement the collector of the port sets his certificate, that it is correct, only as to a few groats in the amount; thereby admitting its correctness in every thing else. This, I think, is equal to a receipt in full of the bonds.

III. We come now to the only real question in the case. Have the plaintiffs a right to the priority they claim, 1. Under the laws of the United States: 2. Under the doctrine of substitution?

1. In the 3rd volume of the laws of the United States, (old edition,) p. 423, sec. 5, it is enacted, that where any revenue officer, or other person, hereafter becoming indebted to the United States by bond or otherwise, shall become insolvent, &c. the debt of the United States shall be first paid; and he is declared insolvent by the act, who, not having enough to pay all his debts, shall voluntarily convey all his property away. (It was admitted on all hands, that Shelton & Co. were insolvent, and had made a general conveyance of their property.) 4th vol. L. U. S. (same edition) p. 386, sec. 65. If the principal in any bond given for duties on goods, &c. shall become insolvent, &c. and any surety in the bond &c. shall discharge it, such surety, &c. shall have and enjoy the like advantage, priority or preference, for the recovery of such monies, &c. as are reserved to the United States, and may maintain a suit in his own name, in 444 law or equity, for all *monies paid thereon. Is the case of the plaintiffs within this last act? I incline to think not. The law speaks of principal and surety in the bond. Although these bonds were executed by Brune, for the debt of Shelton & Co. and the plaintiffs, by discharging them, paid their debt; yet Shelton & Co. were not principals and the plaintiffs sureties in the bonds. They could hardly, it would seem, maintain an action on the bonds at law, against Shelton & Co. as principals; and I doubt whether equity could help them. The law was providing for a particular case. If ours be not that case, equity, no more than law, can make it so. Both Courts must construe the statute according to its true meaning; and that meaning is the same, whichever forum has to expound it.

2. Can the plaintiffs claim a preference to the other creditors of Shelton & Co. on the doctrine of substitution? This doctrine, which was, I believe, borrowed from the civil law, has long been well known to the English Chancery, and constitutes one of the most beautiful features of the system. Pothier, in his Treatise on Obligations (the greatest portion of which, Sir William Jones says, is law at Westminster, as well as at Orleans, and which seems to be growing still more into use since his day,) Pothier says, Art. 6, No. 518, "It is to be holden as a principle, that all who are bound for a debt for others or with others, by whom they ought to be discharged, either for the whole or a part, have a right, in paying such debt, to require the cession of the actions of the creditor, against the other debtors who are liable for it." "This obligation of the creditor to cede his actions, is grounded, (he says,) on this rule of equity, that being commanded to love all men, we are bound to grant them every thing, which they have an interest in having, when we may do so without injuring ourselves." He adds, "a debtor in solidum having then a just interest in having the actions of the creditor, against his co-debtors, to make them pay their part of a debt which they owe as well as he, the creditor cannot refuse it. For the same reason he cannot refuse it to a surety, and generally to all those, who, being bound for the debt, have an interest in being discharged, in whole or in part, by those for or with whom they are debtors."

In enforcing these principles, Courts of Equity look not to the form, but to the essence, of the transactions. They consider the doctrine of substitution, not as one founded in contract, but the offspring of natural justice. Nor do they leave it to the creditor to cede his actions; but so soon as a third person, who has become bound with the debtor, pays his debt to the creditor, they substitute him to the creditor, giving him every right, every lien, every security, to which the creditor could resort; and if the creditor should, with bad faith, release any of those securities, it would be a bar pro tanto to his recovery against the surety. (See the cases on this subject, referred to in Mitchell v. Thompkins, 2 Rand. 428; M'Mahon v. Fawcett, Ib. 514.)

How does this doctrine apply to the case? Shelton & Co. were the importers. The duties on the goods were a debt accruing to the United States, from the time of the actual importation; and the importation was complete, as soon as the goods were brought within any port, with the intention of being unladen or sold there. U. S. v. Vowell, 5 Cranch, 368. The Mary, 1 Gall. 206; U. S. v. Arnold, 1 Gall. 348. U. S. v. Prince, 2 Gall. 204. Immediately, therefore, that these goods reached the port of Baltimore, Shelton & Co. owed a debt to the United States, which, independent of any security by bond, they had a right to enforce by action of debt on the principles of the common law. If Shelton & Co. had themselves executed a bond for the duties under the revenue act, it would not have extinguished the original debt created by the act of importation; much less was that debt extinguished by the execution of such bond for them by the plaintiffs. From the time of the importation the United States has a lien on the goods.

This is collateral to the personal claim "on the importer. The law provides, that the importer, within 15 days after the arrival of the goods, may enter them, pay the duties at once, or give bond with sufficient sureties to secure the payment of them in future; or otherwise, that the goods be deposited in the public stores, as a security for such payment. If the importer gives bond with sureties for the duties, this security takes the place of the goods, and they are released; but in either case, whether the goods remain as a security, or the bond is given in their stead, the original debt remains. The act directing bond to be given, evidently intended to extinguish no debt, but to substitute one security for another; for throughout the act, the bond is called a bond to secure the duties, and not a bond in payment of the duties. For the positions here taken, I refer to the United States v. Lyman, 1 Mason, 482, where the whole subject is ably discussed, and many cases cited.

Here then, the plaintiffs, at the request of Shelton & Co. executed bonds to the collector for the payment of the duties on their goods, Shelton & Co. remaining bound to the United States to the full amount of those duties. The United States had their choice, either to sue Shelton & Co. on their original debt, or the plaintiffs on their bond. Shelton & Co. were the principal debtors; by which I mean, those who contracted the debt for their own benefit. The plaintiffs (call them sureties or what you will) were persons bound for the debt of another. The United States, if they had chosen to sue Shelton & Co. would unquestionably have had a preference over every creditor who claims under the deed of trust. But, instead of suing Shelton & Co. they collected their debt of the plaintiffs. Ought not the plaintiffs then, to succeed to the rights of the United States? To be substituted to their lien, their priority?

It is objected that this is not a case for substitution, because Shelton & Co. were not principals, and the plaintiffs sureties in the same bond; and we are told, that all the cases in the English books are of this kind. I grant that when one man becomes bound for another, he generally takes care to have that other bound along with him; and, therefore, the cases for substitution are generally of this kind. I admit, also, that when a statute gives a particular remedy, (as the law before cited,) to a surety in a bond, for recovery of the debt paid for his principal, we may be bound to follow the strict letter of the law. But, the doctrine of substitution is governed by principles wholly different. It has nothing of form, nothing of technicality about it; and he who, in administering it, would "stick in the letter," forgets the end of its creation, and perverts the spirit which gave it birth. It is the creature of equity, and real essential justice is its object. All agree that where A.

is bound in a bond with B. for B.'s debt, the doctrine of substitution holds. Now, I ask, where is the difference in the eye of reason, whether A. is bound for the debt of B. jointly with B. or separately from him? He is still bound for the debt of B. As between him and B. he stands as much in the relation of a surety, as if they were jointly bound. So he does, as between him and the creditor, where the separate bond is taken as collateral security. Suppose A. owed B. a debt by simple contract or bond. C. at the request of A. executes his separate bond to B. as collateral security. After this, the creditor B. gets a mortgage from the debtor A. further to secure this debt. Would not C. upon discharging the debt, be substituted to this mortgage? Again. Suppose that C. when he executed his separate bond to pay the debt of A. to B. had taken a mortgage from A. for his security. I ask, would not the creditor B. have had a right to resort to this mortgage to satisfy his debt? These principles are the every day equity of the Court; and the case before us rests on precisely the same ground. The United States are the creditor; Shelton & Co. the debtors. At the request of these debtors, the plaintiffs execute their bond to the United States. The priority given by the law to the United States, is the mortgage taken by the creditor *of his debtor. The plaintiffs pay off the debt, and ask the Court to give them the benefit of the creditor's lien. Who can object to this? Who is injured by it? Not the United States; for, they have received their debt from the plaintiffs, and justice binds them to give the plaintiffs their vantage ground. Not Shelton & Co., for they have no interest in the matter. Not the creditors of Shelton & Co. under the trust; for, the United States had this priority. These creditors were but subsequent incumbrancers. The elder lien was upon the property; and whether enforced by the United States in their own name, or by the plaintiffs standing in their stead, could make little difference with these creditors.

There are some minor points that I do not notice, not because they have been overlooked, but because they do not seem to have any weight. Thinking the right of the plaintiffs clear, to come in under the first deed of trust, I have not thought it worth while to speak of the second.

I am clear that the decree be affirmed.

Franklin v. Cox.

August, 1836.

Pleading and Practice—Non Est Factum—When Received.—The plea of non est factum is a plea to the merits, and ought to be received after an issue made up on the plea of payment, upon the delay in filing it being sufficiently accounted for.

Same—Same—Affidavit—Allegations of.—The affidavit filed with the plea need not allege that the defendant did not deliver the paper in question, as his deed, after the blank was filled up with the sum without his presence or knowledge.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Campbell county.

An action of debt was brought in the County Court of Campbell, by Cox against Franklin and three others, on *a paper under seal, purporting to be a penal bill, and to be executed by the defendants. The defendants pleaded payment, and issue was joined. At a subsequent term, the defendant Franklin, offered an additional plea, which was a general plea of non est factum. This plea was rejected by the Court, and the defendant excepted.

The bill of exceptions sets out an affidavit which was offered with the plea, stating, that on the 11th day of November, 1823, the defendant subscribed his name and affixed his seal to a paper then in blank, for the purpose of becoming the surety of Campbell Franklin, (one of the obligors) in a bond to the plaintiff for a sum which was not to exceed $600: that at the time he subscribed his name, no sum of money was expressed, and the bond was to have been filled up in a sum not exceeding $600; which paper was afterwards filled up with the sum of $1150, without his knowledge, and not in his presence: that on the morning of the second day of the Court, and before the first cause upon the docket had been called, the defendant offered the said plea, upon the following state of facts verified by affidavit, to wit: that when the office judgment was set aside, the defendant's counsel was directed to put in a plea of non est factum; but he was at that moment engaged, and put in the plea of payment, to prevent the confirmation of the office-judgment, intending afterwards and at the same time to add the plea of non est factum. He, however, forgot to do so; nor did it occur to him that he had nor done it, until the week before the present Court, and the cause never having been called.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff on the plea of payment, and the Court gave judgment accordingly.

The defendant appealed to the Superior Court, where the judgment of the County Court was affirmed; and the appellant appealed to this Court.

Stanard, for the appellant.

Johnson, for the appellee.

450 *August 9. JUDGE GREEN delivered his opinion, in which the other Judges concurred.

It does not appear upon the bill of exceptions, upon what ground the County Court refused leave to file the plea of non est factum, which was offered. If it was on the ground that it was offered at too late a period, I think the Court erred. It was a plea to the merits, and the delay in offering it was sufficiently accounted for. If the Court proceeded upon the idea, that the affidavit offered with the plea was insufficient, because it did not allege that he did not deliver the paper in question, as his deed, after the blank was filled up with the sum without his presence or knowledge, I think the Court erred in this point also. The declaration alleges a writing obligatory, perfected on the 23d July, 1817. The affidavit states that the defendant signed and sealed a blank paper on that day, which has been since filled up in his absence, and without his knowledge. If this had been in the form of a special plea, concluding that it was therefore not his deed, it would have been good, without an averment that he had not delivered it after it was filled up; as, if an infant executes a deed, and confirms it by word or act after he comes of age, it is valid ab initio; yet in pleading his infancy, he is not bound to allege that he did not confirm it after he attained his age. The plaintiff must reply that he did confirm it. So in this case, if the plea had been special, and the defendant had really delivered the bond after it was filled up, the plaintiff should have replied that fact, if such a replication would not have been a departure from his declaration.

There is a manifest mistake in the affidavit, in respect to the date at which the defendant signed and sealed the paper; a mistake of the writer of the affidavit.

Both judgments should be reversed, and the verdict and judgment set aside, and the cause remanded, with directions 451 *to admit the plea of non est factum, upon the mistake in the affidavit, in respect to the date at which the defendant signed and sealed the paper in question, being corrected.

Clark v. Long.*

August, 1886.

Chancery Practice—Who Should Be Parties—Want of Parties—How Advantage Taken.—All persons materially interested in the subject in controversy ought to be made parties in equity; and if they are not, the defect may be taken advantage of, either by demurrer, or by the Court at the hearing.

Same—Bill to Redeem Mortgage—Necessary Parties.—Therefore, the purchaser of an equity of redemption, cannot file a bill to redeem against the mortgagee, without making the mortgagor a party.

Clark filed a bill in the Chancery Court of Lynchburg, against Long and Crews,

*For monographic note on Parties, see end of case.

Chancery Practice—Who Should Be Parties—Want of Parties—How Advantage Taken of.—It is a general rule that all parties interested in the subject matter of the suit must be made parties in equity, and this rule is founded on the reason, that courts of equity aim to do complete justice, by deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested in the subject matter of the suit, so that the performance of the decree of the court may be perfectly safe to those who are compelled to obey it, and also that future litigation may be prevented. James River & K. Co. v. Littlejohn, 18 Gratt. 82, citing principal case as authority and in Pappenheimer v. Roberts, 24 W. Va. 708, it is said: "It is a general rule in equity that all persons interested in the subject matter, involved in the suit, who are to be affected by the proceedings and result of the suit, should be made parties however numerous they may be, and if they are not made parties, and their interest appears upon the face of the bill, the defect may be taken advantage of either by demurrer or upon the hearing; and if it appears on the face of the record that the proper parties are wanting, the decree will be reversed by the appellate court unless the objection was waived in the court below. Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 59; Clark v. Long, 4 Rand. 451; Sheppard v. Starke, 3 Munf. 29; Barton's Ch. Pr. § 84; Story's Eq. Pl. § 76."

To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Buck v. Pennybacker, 4 Leigh 11; James River & K. Co. v. Littlejohn, 18 Gratt. 84; foot-note to Taylor v. Spindle, 2 Gratt. 44; foot-note to McDaniel v. Baskerville, 13 Gratt. 228; Richardson v. Davis, 21 Gratt. 704, 709; foot-note to Sexton v. Crockett, 23 Gratt. 890; *Armistrot v. stating, that the complainant, to save himself from heavy losses, from debts due to him from Penn, and from endorsements for the said Penn, took a conveyance of an estate, called the Grove, containing 1000 acres: that the complainant has paid the said Long, as executor of Penn, for the said land, leaving a large unsatisfied balance due to him: that at the time of the conveyance, Long, as executor of Brydie, had a claim for $2000, according to his own mode of settlement, but, the complainant was assured, by the said Penn, that if the account was fairly settled, not one farthing would be due; and he also remarked, that this claim was, originally, an usurious one, and that some sort of lien had been given on the land; but no further information was given on this point. The complainant expressly charged usury in the transaction between Penn and Brydie: that he has paid the said Long $1341 33 cents, on account of the said incumbrance, but declined paying more, until he could 452 be *furnished with a statement of the amount actually and bona fide due: that the land has been advertised for sale, under the deed of trust executed to Crews, for the benefit of the said Long, to secure the debt aforesaid: that the said deed was not recorded in proper time, &c. He, therefore, prayed that the sale might be enjoined, &c.

Long denied the usury, and entered into a detail of circumstances, to prove the legality of the contract with Penn, and of the conveyance of the land, to secure the said debt: that it is true that the said deed was not recorded in proper time; but, he submits it to the Court, whether it is not good against the complainant from the time it was recorded: that if he be mistaken in this, then, he conceives that the complainant admits that Penn gave him notice of the trust deed and bond, and he must, therefore, be considered as a purchaser with notice, &c.

The accounts were referred to a Commissioner, a report made, exceptions filed, and evidence taken.

The Chancellor decreed, that the injunction should be dissolved, as to a certain sum, and made perpetual, as to the residue. From this decree, the plaintiff appealed.

Leigh, for the appellant.

Johnson, for the appellee.

August 9. JUDGE CARR.

It is the constant object of Courts of Equity to do complete justice, by deciding and settling the rights of all persons interested in the subject of the suit, so as to make the performance of the order of Court perfectly safe to all those who are compelled to obey it, and to prevent future litigation. For this purpose, all persons materially interested ought to be parties, plaintiffs or defendants, however numerous they may be, that a complete decree may be made between them; Mitf. Pl.

144, 145; and though the defect
453 *of parties be a ground of demurrer, yet if the party fails to demur, the Court may take notice of the defect at the hearing. There are many cases where this Court have reversed the decree and sent the cause back for the want of proper parties.

In Wilcox v. Calloway, 1 Wash. 38, it is decided that where an attempt is made to subject land in the possession of a purchaser with notice, to an equitable lien, the person under whom such purchaser claims, or his legal representatives, ought to be made parties to the suit. In Duval v. Bibb, 4 Hen. & Munf. 113, it is said that the vendee or his legal representatives ought to be parties to a suit in Chancery, brought by the vendor against a subsequent purchaser, to recover a balance alleged to be due from the vendee. In Lewis v. Madison, 1 Munf. 303, it is laid down, that in a suit in Chancery to recover land, against a vendee, on the ground that the vendor had previously agreed to convey the same land, in a certain event, to the plaintiff, the vendor or his legal representatives ought to be made parties. Many more cases might be quoted. In Shepherd's ex'r v. Starke, &c. 3 Munf. 29, it is decided that if it appear on the face of the record that proper parties to the suit are wanting, the decree will be reversed, unless the objection was expressly relinquished in the Court below.

In the case before us, it appears that J. Penn, being indebted to Long, executor of Brydie, executed to trustees a deed of trust conveying his tract of land called the Grove, to secure the payment of the said debt. The bill states, that Penn afterwards sold and conveyed this land, (or the equity of redemption, rather) to the plaintiff, Clark; but even of this, there is no evidence in the record. The deed, said to be executed to Clark, is not filed; nor is there any party before the Court, so authorized to waive the production of that deed, as to bind Penn by the waiver. But, taking it for granted, that the deed actually exists, the plaintiff is the purchaser of an equity of redemption, and files his bill to redeem, impeaching the consideration of the deed of trust, contesting the amount due under it, and calling for a settlement of all these points. Is not Penn interested in these questions? Suppose we were to decide that the contract was not usurious, and that there was a balance of $2000 due on the deed of trust. Would this decree bind Penn? Suppose he were afterwards to shew, that there was no deed to Clark, or that the deed was naught. Could he not rip up all that we might do in this suit? Could he not try over again the question of usury with Long, and also, the question of the balance really due on the trust? I should think so.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that the decree should be reversed, and the cause sent back for proper parties.

The other Judges concurred, and the decree was reversed, and the cause sent back.*

I. SCOPE OF NOTE.

Parties to particular actions will be found fully treated in the specific titles, throughout this work. See the table of cross references supra and the monographic notes referred to throughout this article. The treatment in this note includes simply such principles of law as are of general applicability to all classes of parties, together with selected cases illustrating these principles.

II. AT LAW.

A. RULES OF GENERAL APPLICATION.

1. NECESSITY OF MAKING PARTIES.—It is a conceded principle accepted everywhere, that no one is bound by the judgment of a court in a case in which he is not a party. Powell v. Gilbert, 1 Va. Dec. 318; Bland v. Wyatt, 1 Hen. & M. 543; Baylor v. Dejarnette, 13 Gratt. 164; Armstrong v. County Court, 15 W. Va. 190.

But where the person has a mere interest in the question arising out of a collateral liability, such interest does not render him a necessary, or proper party. Mitchell v. Chancellor, 14 W. Va. 22; Austin v. Richardson, 1 Gratt. 323.

2. SAME PERSON BOTH PLAINTIFF AND DEFENDANT.

In General.—A person, though acting in different capacities, cannot be both plaintiff and defendant in an action at law, though joined with others. The rule is otherwise in equity, which alone can afford a remedy in such cases. Cann v. Cann, 40 W. Va. 133, 20 S. E. Rep. 910; Sweetland v. Porter, 43 W. Va. 189, 27 S. E. Rep. 352; Swearingen v. Steers, 49 W. Va. 312, 38 S. E. Rep. 510.

Idem Sonans.—The identity of name of a plaintiff and a defendant, in the absence of proof to the contrary, is presumption of identity of person. Sweetland v. Porter, 43 W. Va. 189, 27 S. E. Rep. 352.

B. PLAINTIFFS.

1. RIGHT TO SUE FOR BENEFIT OF ANOTHER.

In General.—Sec. 2, ch. 71 of the Code means, as if written as follows, including the words in parenthesis: "If a covenant or promise be made for the sole benefit of a person with whom it is not made, or (if a covenant or promise is made for the sole benefit of a person) with whom it is made jointly with others, such person may maintain in his own name any action thereon, etc." Johnson v. McClung, 26 W. Va. 659. And see § 2880. Code of Va.; Tyler v. Ricamore, 87 Va. 468, 13 S. E. Rep. 799; Porter v. Nekervis, 4 Rand. 859; monographic note on "Assignments" appended to Ragsdale v. Hagy, 9 Gratt. 213.

Should Be Set Out in Declaration.—The party with whom a contract is made may maintain an action at law thereon in his own name, and if the recovery be for the benefit of another, that fact may be set out in the declaration, or endorsed on the writ or the declaration, but the statement or endorsement is unnecessary, and is no part of the record, and the fact that the contract sued on is set forth in the declaration and does not disclose the beneficial interest of the party for whose benefit the action is brought does not show a variance between the declaration and the contract, and is no ground for a demurrer. Consumers Ice Co. v. Jennings, 100 Va. 719, 42 S. E. Rep. 879.

It is usual, though not necessary, when an action at common law is brought for the benefit of another, to state the fact in the body of the declaration, or to indorse it on the declaration, or the writ. But such statement is no material part of the pleadings. The beneficial plaintiff is not party on the record, and hence does not come within the provisions of the act of February 29, 1888, extending the time within which certain actions must be brought. Fadeley v. Williams, 96 Va. 397, 31 S. E. Rep. 513.

The proposition laid down in Clarksons v. Doddridge, 14 Gratt. 42, that, though it is usual to state in the declaration or by endorsement thereon, or on the writ, that the action is brought for the benefit of the parties entitled, yet this is not essential, has been approved in Hayes v. Va. Mut., etc. Assn., 76 Va. 223; Triplett v. Goff, 83 Va. 785, 3 S. E. Rep. 536; Bentley v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., 40 W. Va. 739, 23 S. E. Rep. 586. See also, monographic note on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801; monographic note on "Assignments" appended to Ragsdale v. Hagy, 9 Gratt. 409.

Parol Contracts.—In actions upon parol contracts, the rule is well established, that the party may sue thereon with whom the contract is made, or who is beneficially interested in it. When a promise is made to a person indebted to another, to pay the debt to the creditor, and the latter is a stranger to the contract and to the consideration, the party to whom the promise is made alone has the right of action thereon. A modification of this rule is to be found in a class of cases which hold that where the debtor places money or property in the hands of a third person as a fund from which the creditor is to be paid, the latter may maintain an action against the holder of the fund. In such case a trust is created, and a promise inferred on the part of the holder, from his acceptance of the fund without objection, to pay the creditor. Ross v. Milne, 12 Leigh 204; Jones v. Thomas, 21 Gratt. 101.

In actions upon sealed instruments different principles apply. When a debt exists from one person to another, and an obligation or bond is given to the debtor to discharge such debt, he alone can maintain an action for the breach of such obligation." Jones v. Thomas, 21 Gratt. 101.

2. RIGHT TO SUE IN NAME OF ANOTHER.—It is a general rule, that an action on a contract must be brought in the name of the party in whom the legal interest in such contract is vested. The legislature alone has power to make an exception to this rule. An exception is made by the Code, ch.

14, § 14, p. 583, which authorizes the assignee of any bond, note or writing not negotiable, to maintain thereupon any action in his own name which the original obligee or payee might have brought. The assignee acquires only an equitable right with a capacity, expressly given him by statute, to assert it at law in his own name. But the legal title still remaining in the obligee or payee, a right of action is incident thereto; and the assignee may, at his election, sue at law in his own name, or in that of the obligee or payee for his benefit. Garland v. Richeson, 4 Rand. 266. Another exception seems to be made by the Code, ch. 116, § 2, p. 500. Clarksons v. Doddridge, 14 Gratt. 44. See monographic note "Assignments" appended to Ragsdale v. Hagy, 6 Gratt. 400.

C. DEFENDANTS.—The defect of a misspelled name of a party defendant is cured by serving process upon the proper party, and by amending the bill by inserting the correct name. Martin v. Martin, 95 Va. 28, 37 S. E. Rep. 810.

It is no cause for demurrer, in an action of debt on a negotiable note, that a party defendant is described in the declaration as "H. D. McClintic." If there be any misnomer it should be pleaded in abatement, or the defendant on his own motion and affidavit should have the declaration amended by inserting the proper name. Handley v. Ludington, 4 W. Va. 53.

D. JOINDER.

1. OF PARTIES.

a. In General.—"In actions by and against several persons, whether ex contractu or ex delicto, all the causes of action must be stated to be joint. Thus a plaintiff cannot, in a declaration against two defendants, state that one of them assaulted him, and in another part that the other assaulted him, or took his goods, for the trespasses are of several natures, and against several persons, and they cannot plead to this declaration." McMullin v. Church, 83 Va. 506; Langhorne v. Richmond R. Co., 91 Va. 376, 23 S. E. Rep. 159.

b. Plaintiffs.

(1) Ex Contracts.

In General.—Two or more parties having distinct causes of action against the same defendant, cannot join in one suit to enforce their rights. To enable plaintiffs to join in one suit, they must have a community of interest; such as to establish a street, or to have obstructions in an existing street removed; or, as taxpayers, to restrain municipal corporations and their officers from transcending their powers in a way injurious to taxpayers. Roper v. McWhorter, 77 Ga. 314; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Smoot, 81 Va. 496.

Executor of Decedent.—Plaintiffs were sureties on a sheriff's bond, and as such took an indemnifying bond from defendants. Pending an action on such bond, certain of the plaintiffs died. Held, that such action could proceed in the name of the survivors, without joining therein the executors of the decedents. Beckham v. Duncan, 1 Va. Dec. 669.

Representative of Several Infants.—One person being personal representative of several of the children, he is but one plaintiff, and though one of his intestates dies after B. and he is described as the personal representative of each intestate, that is surplusage, and there is no misjoinder of plaintiffs. Clarkson v. Booth, 17 Gratt. 490.

(2) Ex Delicto.—Where a tort upon personalty effect both the estate of an agent and that of the reversioner or remainderman, each may sue separately. And, as damages are apportionable, recover the injury done to his estate. Jordan v. Benwood, 43 W. Va. 312, 36 S. E. Rep. 266.

c. Defendants.

(1) Ex Contractu.

In General.—If an action at law be brought against two or more persons, it must appear from the declaration that the contract or tort upon which it is brought is a joint contract, or a joint tort. Langhorne v. Richmond R. Co., 91 Va. 376, 22 S. E. Rep. 519.

Action on Joint Bond.—A suit on a joint and several bond must be brought either against all the obligors jointly, or one of them singly, and not against any intermediate member; and if an error in this respect appears on the record, the judgment will be reversed, notwithstanding such error was not pleaded in abatement. This proposition laid down in Leftwich v. Berkeley, 1 Hen. & M. 61, has met with approval in subsequent cases. See Atwell v. Milton, 4 Hen. & M. 257; Moss v. Moss, 4 Hen. & M. 304, 306; Newell v. Wood, 1 Munf. 556. And Saunders v. Wood, 1 Munf. 406, is reported in the following words: "This case depending upon the same principles as that of Leftwich v. Berkeley, 1 Hen. & M. 61, the judgment against the appellants was reversed by the whole court (consisting of all the judges), for the reasons given in that case." In Chapman v. Chevis, 9 Leigh 307, it is said: "It seem that from the case of Leftwich v. Berkeley, 1 Hen. & M. 61, and other cases in this court, that though the obligee in a joint and several bond cannot proceed against more than one obligor unless he proceeds against all, yet if one be dead, he may proceed jointly against all the survivors." The principal case was distinguished in Winslow v. Com., 2 Hen. & M. 405, on the ground that in that case the omitted obligor was dead before the suit was brought. The principal case was also cited in Meredith v. Duval, 1 Munf. 79.

Surviving Obligors in Bond.—Where a bill seeks a personal decree against two surviving obligors in a bond, it is not necessary to make the personal representative of a deceased obligor a party to the bill, as no personal decree could be had against him. Hunter v. Robinson, 5 W. Va. 272.

The surviving obligor in a joint note is alone liable to an action at law on the note. Chandler v. Hill, 2 Hen. & M. 124. And see Harrison v. Field, 2 Wash. 180; Richardson v. Johnston, 2 Call 527; Powell v. White, 11 Leigh 809; Somerville v. Grim, 17 W. Va. 306. See also, monographic note on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801.

In a joint action upon contract, the plaintiff must have judgment against all the defendants before the court, or he can have judgment against none. If one of the defendants, who had suffered judgment by default for want of appearance, could, notwithstanding a verdict against another defendant, allege errors in the proceedings, for arresting or reversing the judgment against him, which would have been cured by a verdict against him, it would have the effect of arresting or reversing the judgment as to the other party also, against whom there was a verdict. Jenkins v. Hurt, 2 Eand. 447.

(2) Ex Delicto.

In General.—The general rule is that any number of tortfeasors may be joined in the same action, where all are alleged to have participated in the wrong. They may be sued jointly or severally at the election of the plaintiff; and that is true notwithstanding there may exist a difference in the degree of liability, or the quantum of evidence necessary to establish such liability. Riverside Cotton Mills v. Lanier (Va.), 45 S. E. Rep. 875.

Where the tort complained of, though it may have been participated in by both of the defendants, is treated by the law as the several act of each, and the plaintiff might have sued one only of them; but he elected to sue them both jointly, and having so elected, he was bound to declare against them jointly in each count in the declaration. McMullin v. Church, 82 Va. 506.

Action for Malicious Prosecution.—For a malicious prosecution, two or more persons may be sued jointly in one action, or severally in separate actions. But counts against two or more cannot be joined in the same declaration with counts against each person severally. McMullin v. Church, 82 Va. 501.

Corporations.—Where a corporation liable for personal injuries inflicted by its agents, becomes merged into, or consolidated with another corporation, which by authority of law or act of the parties is responsible for such liability, an action at law may be maintained for such injuries against either of said corporations, but not as a joint action against both. They are not jointly liable. One is liable for committing the alleged tort, the other is liable by reason of the consolidation. In a joint action it must appear from the declaration that the contract or tort upon which the action is brought is a joint contract, or a joint tort; otherwise the declaration will be bad on demurrer for misjoined of causes of action and of parties. Langhorne v. Richmond R. Co., 91 Va. 369, 22 S. E. Rep. 159. See monographic note on "Corporations (Private)" appended to Slaughter v. Com., 13 Gratt. 767.

2. OF TWO CAUSES OF ACTION.

In General.—The rule with respect to "the joinder of several rights of action, or liabilities," is that: "When the same form of action may be adopted for several distinct injuries, the plaintiff may, in general, proceed for all in one action, though the several rights effected were derived from different titles; but a person cannot, in the same action, join a demand in his own right, and a demand as representative of another, or in autre droit; nor demands against a person on his own liability, and on his liability in his representative capacity." And "in actions by and against several persons, whether ex contractu or ex delicto, all the causes of action must be stated to be joint. Thus a plaintiff cannot, in a declaration against two defendants, state that one of them assaulted him, and in another part that the other assaulted him, or took his goods, for the trespasses are of several natures, and against several persons and they cannot plead to this declaration." McMullin v. Church, 82 Va. 504; Clarkson v. Booth, 17 Gratt. 497.

Consolidation.—When the plaintiff has two causes of action, which may be joined in one action, he ought to bring one action only; and if he commence two actions, he may be compelled to consolidate them, and to pay the costs of the application. "The joinder in action often depends on the form of the action, rather than on the subject matter or cause of action: thus, in an action against a carrier for the loss of goods, if the plaintiff declare in assumpsit, he cannot join a count in trover, as he may if he declare against him in case; for the joinder depends on the form of the action." Hence, the result of the authorities is stated to be, that "when the same plea may be pleaded, and the same judgment given on all the counts of the declaration; or whenever the counts are of the same nature, and the same judgment is to be given on them all though the pleas be different, as in the case of debt upon bond and on simple contract, they may be joined," and Mr. Chitty adds, "Perhaps the latter, that is, the nature of the causes of action, is the best test or criterion by which to decide as to the joinder of counts." 1 Chitty's Pl. 221, 222; McMullin v. Church, 82 Va. 505.

E. MISJOINDER.—By the express terms of the act of assembly approved February 27, 1894, (Acts 1893-4, p. 489) as amended and re-enacted by act approved February 26, 1896 (Acts 1895-6, ch. 423, p. 453) it is provided that whenever it shall appear in any action at law or suit in equity, heretofore or hereafter instituted, by the pleadings or otherwise, that there has been a misjoinder of parties, plaintiff or defendant, the court may order the action or suit, to abate as to any party improperly joined, and to proceed by or against the others as if such misjoinder had not been made. The word may in a statute of this kind which is in furtherance of justice means the same as shall. Potter's Dwarries on Statutes, etc., p. 220. Lee v. Mutual, etc., Life Ass'n, 97 Va. 102, 33 S. E. Rep. 556; Riverside Cotton Mills v. Lanier (Va.), 45 S. E. Rep. 875.

Where a plaintiff has improperly joined innocent persons as defendants with his action, "in order to promote justice and avoid litigation," he undoubtedly has not only the right, but it is his duty, even without the consent of the defendants, to dismiss his action as to any of the defendants improperly joined in the action. By so doing it will leave the action, as if he had declared only against those defendants, as to whom he has not dismissed his action. Carlon v. Ruffner, 13 W. Va. 307.

F. NONJOINER.—Nonjoinder in assumpsit, as well as in debt and covenant, can only be taken advantage of by plea in abatement, save when it appears on the face of the declaration. Prunty v. Mitchell, 76 Va. 109; Wilson v. McCormick, 86 Va. 905, 11 S. E. Rep. 976.

In an action of assumpsit against a partnership, if the defendants claim that there was a nonjoinder of proper defendants, such matter can only be raised by plea in abatement and must be filed at rules, § 58, ch. 125 of the Code having no application to such a case. Rutter v. Sullivan, 25 W. Va. 427.

III. IN EQUITY.

A. RULES OF GENERAL APPLICATION.

1. PERSONS INTERESTED.—It is a general rule in equity that all persons interested in the subject matter of the bill, and who are involved in and will be affected by the proceedings and result of the suit, should be made parties, however numerous they may be. Clark v. Long, 4 Rand. 451; Call v. Scott, 4 Call 407; Key v. Lambert, 1 Hen. & M. 330; Mayo v. Murchie, 3 Munf. 358; Ross v. Milne, 12 Leigh 204; Crawford v. McDaniel, 1 Rob. 456; Austin v. Richardson, 1 Gratt. 325; Hagan v. Wardens, 3 Gratt. 315; Ball v. Johnson, 8 Gratt. 281; Osborne v. Taylor, 12 Gratt. 117; Baylor v. DeJarnette, 13 Gratt. 164; Richardson v. Davis, 21 Gratt. 710; Armentrout v. Gibbons, 25 Gratt. 375; Dabney v. Preston, 25 Gratt. 842; Pairo v. Bethell, 75 Va. 826; Walters v. Farmers' Bank, 76 Va. 12; Stovall v. Border Grange Bank, 78 Va. 198; Major v. Ficklin, 85 Va. 736, 8 S. E. Rep. 715; Campbell v. Shipman, 87 Va. 655, 13 S. E. Rep. 114; Thornton v. Gaar, 87 Va. 315, 12 S. E. Rep. 753; Meek v. Spracher, 87 Va. 167, 12 S. E. Rep. 397; Castleman v. Berry, 86 Va. 606, 10 S. E. Rep. 884; Gentry v. Gentry, 87 Va. 480, 12 S. E. Rep. 966; Davis v. Henry, 4 W. Va. 580; Ralphsnyder v. Ralphsnyder, 5 W. Va. 503; Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 60; Magers v. Edwards, 13 W. Va. 822; Burlew v. Quarrier, 16 W. Va. 108; White v. Kennedy, 23 W. Va. 231; Norris v. Lemen, 28 W. Va. 330; Kellam v. Sayre, 30 W. Va. 198, 8 S. E. Rep. 559; Gall v. Gall, 50 W. Va. 523, 40 S. E. Rep. 880.

Reason for the Rule.—It is necessity which lies at the foundation of the rule of equity, requiring all persons materially interested in the subject, or who will be directly affected by the decree, to be made parties in the cause. The jurisdiction of the court could not, otherwise, be fully or safely exercised. And when it has once obtained possession of the subject and the parties, it will, when it conveniently can, without transcending its own principles, render complete justice, and prevent further litigation, by settling the whole controversy. Austin v. Richardson, 1 Gratt. 325.

a. In General.—The general rule that all persons materially interested should be made parties, is too familiar to require authority to support it. And in regard to the nature of interest, it is wholly unimportant whether it be a legal or an equitable interest of the absent parties in the subject matter of the suit. Story's Eq. Pleading 137. This constitutes one of the leading distinctions between proceedings at law and in equity. A person with a mere equitable or remote interest cannot sue at law, and if he be improperly joined, the suit may fail. The analogies, therefore, derived from legal proceedings do not apply. Crawford v. McDaniel, 1 Rob. 456.

b. Persons Materially Interested.—It is also a general rule in equity (subject to certain exceptions) that all persons materially interested either legally or beneficially, in the subject matter of a suit, are to be made parties to it, either as plaintiffs or as defendants, however numerous they may be, so that there may be a complete decree which shall bind all to it. Jameson v. Deshields, 3 Gratt. 13; Crawford v. McDaniel, 1 Rob. 456; Armentrout v. Gibbons, 25 Gratt. 371; Dabney v. Preston, 25 Gratt. 838; Fitzgibbon v. Barry, 78 Va. 755; Yost v. Porter, 80 Va. 859; Norris v. Bean, 17 W. Va. 661; Rexroad v. McQuain, 24 W. Va. 32; Benson v. Snyder, 42 W. Va. 223, 24 S. E. Rep. 880; Marshall v. Hall, 43 W. Va. 641, 26 S. E. Rep. 300; Miller v. Morrison, 47 W. Va. 664, 35 S. E. Rep. 905; Gall v. Gall, 50 W. Va. 523, 40 S. E. Rep. 380.

"In Clark v. Long, 4 Rand. 452, CARR, J., delivering the opinion in which the other judges concurred, says: "It is the constant object of courts of equity to do complete justice by deciding and settling the rights of all persons interested in the subject of the suit, so as to make the performance of the order of the court perfectly safe to all those who are compelled to obey it, and to prevent future litigation. For this purpose all persons materially interested ought to be parties, plaintiffs or defendants, however numerous they may be, that a complete decree may be made between them." Richardson v. Davis, 21 Gratt. 710.

It is also a well-established rule of chancery practice, that a person, to be a party in interest, must be interested in the property involved in the issue. It is not sufficient that he may be interested in the question litigated, or that by the determination of the question litigated, he may be a party in interest to some other suit growing out of the decision of the question litigated. (See Mayo v. Murchie, 3 Munf. 401-2.) Elcan v. Lancasterian School, 2 Pat. & H. 69.

And where a person has a mere interest in the question involved in a suit in equity, arising out of collateral liability, though the decree may upon that question, be evidence for or against him in some future controversy, such interest does not render him a necessary or a proper party. Austin v. Richardson, 1 Gratt. 310.

c. Persons Beneficially Interested.

In General.—It is a well-settled principal, in equity, that the person having a beneficiary interest, is a necessary party, which illustrates "the ordinary doctrine that the real parties in equity shall be brought before the court whenever their interest may be effected." Davis v. Henry, 4 W. Va. 580; Ralphsnyder v. Ralphsnyder, 5 W. Va. 503.

Applicable to Trustees.—All persons beneficially interested in the object of that suit, must, as a general rule, be made parties, and this rule applies to suits for the appointment of new trustees. But it is necessary in no case to make those persons parties who are entitled only to future and uncertain and contingent interests. Fitzgibbon v. Barry, 78 Va. 765.

The trustee holding the legal title must be made a party in a suit in equity concerning the trust subject; and the cestui que trust must generally be also made parties. Fleming v. Holt, 12 W. Va. 153.

In Commonwealth v. Ricks, 1 Gratt. 416, decided by this court it was held that cestui que trust, not being parties, are not bound by the decree." Richardson v. Davis, 21 Gratt. 710.

3. NECESSARY PARTIES.

a. In General.—Equity deals with the real parties in interest and if they are not before the court no proper decree can be made. Castleman v. Berry, 26 Va. 604, 10 S. E. Rep. 884; Campbell v. Shipman, 87 Va. 655, 13 S. E. Rep. 114; Grove v. Judy, 24 W. Va. 294; Kellam v. Sagre, 30 W. Va. 198, 3 S. E. Rep. 589; Penn v. Hearon, 94 Va. 774, 27 S. E. Rep. 599.

The general rule certainly is that none are bound by a judgment or decree except those who were parties or standing in privity with others who were. But there are exceptions to the rule of equal authority with the rule itself. Baylor v. Dejarnette, 18 Gratt. 164.

It appearing in the progress of a cause, that a person having such an interest in the subject matter of the suit as to make him a necessary party to the cause, is not before the court, it is error to decree in his favor, without his being first made a party, and ascertaining his rights. Brown v. Knapp, 7 W. Va. 678.

b. Distributees.—It is an elementary principle, which requires no citation of authorities to support it, that no valid decree can be pronounced in favor of or against any person who has not appeared or been made either a formal or informal party to the case. And it is equally well settled, that to a suit brought by one or more distributees or general legatees of the estate of a decedent for a settlement of such estate and the recovery by the plaintiff of his distributive share thereof, not only the administrator but also all the distributees or general legatees must be made parties before any decree can be made in such suit. Woodyard v. Buffington, 23 W. Va. 196.

c. Heirs.—The personal representative and heirs of a deceased joint grantee of real estate are necessary parties to a bill by a vendor to subject real estate to the payment of the purchase price thereof. Taylor v. Forbes, 101 Va. 658.

d. Pendente Lite Purchasers.—At common law it was not necessary to make a pendente lite purchaser of lands a party, but the common-law rule is correctly changed by §13, ch. 139, Code 1887 of W. Va., under which it is held that when a party purchases land with notice of an equity in a third party, in a suit by such third party to enforce his equity brought after such purchase, such purchaser is a necessary party if relief by way of a sale of the land is given, unless it appear that he had notice of the suit pending at the time of his purchase, or that notice of his lis pendens had been recorded under §13, ch. 139, Code of 1887 before such purchase. Barrett v. McAllister, 33 W. Va. 738, 11 S. E. Rep. 220. And see Harmon v. Byram, 11 W. Va. 511; Zane v. Fink, 18 W. Va. 693; Arnold v. Casner, 22 W. Va. 444; Lynch v. Andrews, 25 W. Va. 751, 756. For further discussion of this subject, see monographic note on a. In General.—It is a general rule, that all persons interested in the subject matter of the suit must be made parties; and this rule is founded on the reason, that courts of equity aim "to do complete justice, by deciding upon and settling the rights of all persons interested in the subject matter of the suit, so that the performance of the decree of the court may be perfectly safe to those who are compelled to obey it, and also that future litigation may be prevented." Story Eq. Pl. § 72; Clark v. Long, 4 Rand. 451; Jameson v. Deshields, 3 Gratt. 4. There are exceptions to this general rule which, in the language of JUDGE STORY, "will be found to be governed by the same principle which is, that as the object of the general rule is to accomplish the purposes of justice between all the parties in interest, and it is a rule founded, in some sort, upon public convenience and policy, rather than upon positive principles of municipal or general jurisprudence, courts of equity will not suffer it to be applied so as to defeat the very purposes of justice, if they can dispose of the merits of the case before them without prejudice to the rights of interests of other persons who are not parties." Story Eq. Pl. § 77; James River, etc., Co. v. Littlejohn, 18 Gratt. 83; McClaskey v. O'Brien, 16 W. Va. 855.

"Lis Pendens" appended to Stout v. Vause, 1 Rob. 169.

4. PROPER BUT NOT INDISPENSABLE PARTIES.

b. Representation.

(1) Statement of Rule.—Where a large number of persons are interested in a common subject it is allowable, according to settled practice, for some to file a bill on behalf of themselves, and the others similarly situated, seeking any relief to which they might all in common be justly entitled, although their individual interest might be separate and distinct. Bull v. Read, 13 Gratt. 78; Blanton v. Southern Fertilizing Co., 77 Va. 337; McClung v. Livesay, 7 W. Va. 329.

"One of the most frequent exceptions in practice to the general rule is, that the court permits a suit to be brought by one person in behalf of himself and all other persons having a like interest as the plaintiff, when the persons, who answer that description of a like interest with the plaintiff, are very numerous or cannot be easily discovered or ascertained. Thus a creditor may maintain a suit on behalf of himself and all other creditors of a deceased debtor against his proper representatives for an account and application of his assets real as well as personal in payment of their demands." Norris v. Bean, 17 W. Va. 602.

(2) Reason for Rule.—In Reynolds v. Bank of the Valley of Virginia, 6 Gratt. 180, 181, the law is thus stated by BALDWIN, Judge: "The best general rule, perhaps, to be deduced from the authorities is, that all persons having material interest in the subjects, which are to be affected by the object of the suit, must be made parties to the bill either as plaintiffs or defendants. But there are various classes of cases, to which the application to the rule would be attended with such delay, inconvenience and expense, as would be found intolerable in the administration of justice. Among these are suits brought by creditors against the representative of a deceased debtor, for the account of the assets of his estate and the application thereof to the payment of his debts. In such cases all the creditors have common, and at the same time distinct, interest in the subject and object of the suit; and a strict adherence to the general rule would require them all to be made parties to the bill. To avoid the necessity of this, and yet prevent the unjust and injurious consequences, which might otherwise ensue, a practice has grown up and is well established of making those who are not plaintiffs substantial instead of formal parties, by allowing a few or one only of the creditors to sue on behalf of himself and all the rest, and those so represented to come before a master, establish their demands, and participate in the relief." Norris v. Bean, 17 W. Va. 602-3.

(3) Statutory Rule.—§ 9, c. 137, of the Code, provides that "when, in any suit in equity, the number of parties exceeds thirty, and any one of said parties, jointly interested with others in any question arising therein, shall die, the court may nevertheless proceed, if in its opinion all classes of interest in the case are represented, and the interest of no one will be prejudiced by the trial of the cause, to render a decree in such suit as if such person were alive, decreeing to the heirs at law, distributees or representatives of such person, as the case may require, such interest as such person would have been entitled to had such person been alive at the date of the decree." The circuit court may, at its discretion, act upon this provision of the Code, and this court will seldom interfere with the exercise of such discretion. Northwestern Bank v. Hays, 37 W. Va. 475, 16 S. E. Rep. 561.

(4) Application of Rule.—This rule of representation often applies to living persons who are allowed to be made parties by representation for reasons of convenience and justice, because their interests will be sufficiently defended by others who are personally parties, and who have motives both of self interest and affection to make such defense, and it is therefore considered unnecessary to make such living persons parties, and indeed improper to do so, and thus compel them to litigate about an interest which may never vest in them. But the rule also often, and a fortiori, applies to persons not in being, and who of course may never be in being, who are allowed to be made parties by representation for reasons not only of convenience and justice, but of necessity also, because it is impossible to make them personally parties. It will be found by an examination of all the cases, that the rule and the reason of it go to this extent, and that necessity is recognized as an all-sufficient reason for it wherever such necessity exists. Faulkner v. Davis, 18 Gratt. 680.

Virtual Representation.—For the proposition that, upon the principle of virtual representation, it is in general unnecessary to make parties of persons entitled to a remainder, such as an estate tail, coming after the first estate of inheritance, and yet such parties are bound by the decree. Baylor v. DeJarnette, 13 Gratt. 153, is cited and followed in the following cases: Faulkner v. Davis, 18 Gratt. 680; Harrison v. Wallton, 95 Va. 735, 30 S. E. Rep. 372; Gray v. Smith, 76 Fed. Rep. 532, and cases cited; Hawthorne v. Beckwith, 89 Va. 790, 17 S. E. Rep. 241; McArthur v. Allen, 3 Fed. Rep. 330, and cases cited; 3 Min. Inst. (2d Ed.) 248, where the principal case is cited. See in accord, Fitzgibbon v. Barry, 78 Va. 755. In Williamson v. Jones, 39 W. Va. 364, 19 S. E. R. 444. The doctrine of virtual representation as laid down is approved, but in that case the doctrine did not apply for the reason that, the parties' interests were vested. Foot-note to Baylor v. DeJarnette, 13 Gratt. 153.

Where all parties are brought before the court that can be brought before it, and the court acts upon property according to the rights that appear, without fraud, its decision is final and conclusive not only on the parties before the court, but also on those who thereafter come into being. The latter are regarded as parties by representation, and are as effectually bound by decrees as if they had been in being and made parties in person. Harrison v. Wallton, 95 Va. 721, 30 S. E. Rep. 372.

Waiver of Objection by Defendant.—"While it is entirely admitted, that all persons concerned in the demand, made by a bill in equity, ought to be parties plaintiff, with the exception of cases in which they are very numerous and the like; there is no rule or principle which prohibits the defendant, where such parties are really represented, from dispensing with strictness of form, or with objections of a merely legal character in deducing the character of the representative. There may be a difference between the total absence of parties for want of whom the court of equity is disabled from its favorite object of doing complete justice in one suit, and cases in which there is a mere defect in the power of the agent, to which the adverse party desirous perhaps of a speedy decision, is content to abandon his objection." ROANE, J., in Mayo v. Murchie, 3 Munf. 399.

c. Division.—While it is the general rule that all persons interested in the division of the same subject ought to be made parties in a suit brought by one or more of them, yet, where the division as to all is not to be made at once and the same time but at several different periods, only those entitled to participate in the division then in question need to be made parties. Branch v. Booker, 3 Munf. 48.

d. Agents.

Auctioneers.—It is unquestionably true, that a person who is a mere agent in a transaction ought not to be made a party to a bill, as for instance an auctioneer, who has sold an estate the sale being the matter of controversy. Tavenner v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 673.

Agent for Purchase of Land.—So an agent for the purchase of land is not a proper party to a bill against the principal for a specific performance, although the agent signed the memorandum for the purchase in his own name. See Jones v. Hart, 1 Hen. & M. 470; Tavenner v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 673.

Trustees.—"But on the other hand there is a class of persons called generally agents, who are nevertheless properly parties to a suit in equity brought by the principal. The agents to which I refer are trustees. The general rule in such cases is, that trustees as well as the cestui que trust are necessary parties in suits in equity. And as a general rule the trustee, who has the legal title must be made a party. The reason for this rule is, that he holds the legal title and should therefore be made a party, though he has no beneficial interest in the subject of controversy; and this rule applies, whenever the legal right to sue for the thing demanded is in a different party from the one claiming the beneficial interest. The one thus holding the legal right to sue is so far as this rule goes in such case regarded as a trustee, who should be made a party. Thus when a bill is filed for the specific performance of a covenant under the hand and seal of one for the benefit of another, the covenantee though he has no beneficial interest, must be a party to a bill brought by the person for whose benefit the covenant was made against the covenantor." Tavenner v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 674.

Agreements Not under Seal.—"But the same rule does not apply to agreements not under seal, where the one party is merely the agent of another, and makes the agreement as such, though in his own name. In such case it is not necessary in suing to enforce such agreements not under seal or to set them aside in equity to bring the agent before the court, for either in law or in equity the principle may in such case interpose and supersede the right of the agent, and claim to have the contract performed to himself, although made in the name of the agent." Tavener v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 674.

5. RIGHT TO SUE FOR BENEFIT OF ANOTHER.

a. In General.—There is no such thing in equity as bringing a suit in the name of one party for the use of another. Equity deals with the real parties in interest. Auditor v. Johnson, 1 Hen. & M. 586; Corbin v. Emmerson, 10 Leigh 669; James River, etc., Co. v. Littlejohn, 18 Gratt. 82; Omohundro v. Henson, 26 Gratt. 512; Palro v. Bethell, 75 Va. 826; Lynchburg Iron Co. v. Tayloe, 79 Va. 671; Castleman v. Berry, 86 Va. 604, 10 S. E. Rep. 884; Tatum v. Ballard, 94 Va. 370, 26 S. E. Rep. 871; Penn v. Hearon, 94 Va. 778, 27 S. E. Rep. 599; Hurt v. Miller, 95 Va. 32, 27 S. E. Rep. 881; Vance v. Evans, 11 W. Va. 342; Scott v. Luddington, 14 W. Va. 398; McClaskey v. O'Brien, 16 W. Va. 794; Zane v. Fink, 18 W. Va. 604; Grove v. Judy, 24 W. Va. 298; Kellam v. Sayre, 30 W. Va. 198, 3 S. E. Rep. 589; Smith v. Cornelius, 41 W. Va. 50, 33 S. E. Rep. 599. See, treating this subject at length, monographic note on "Assignments" appended to Ragsdale v. Hagy, 9 Gratt. 409.

b. Assignors.—"JUDGE STORY upon the authority of numerous cases which he cites, lays down the true doctrine as to assignors to be this, that where the assignment is absolute and unconditional, leaving no equitable interest whatever in the assignee, and the extent and validity of the assignment are not doubted or denied, and there is no remaining liability in the assignor to be affected by the decree, it is not necessary to make the assignor a party." James River, etc., Co. v. Littlejohn, 18 Gratt. 82.

When the sole plaintiff voluntarily transfers or assigns his interest in the estate or property, which is in controversy in the suit, after the suit is brought, the suit does not thereby abate, and in most cases it does not thereby become so defective, that it cannot be further proceeded with, unless such transferee or assignee is made a party to the suit, for the reason that such transferee or assignee is a lis pendens purchaser from the plaintiff and, as a general rule in such case, is bound by the decision of the suit, in which the estate or property transferred or assigned is in controversy. But perhaps there may be cases, where, if the sole plaintiff voluntarily transfers or assigns his interest in the estate or property, after the suit is brought, the suit will thereby become so defective, that it cannot be proceeded in to final adjudication, until the transferee or assignee is made a party by proper bill. Zane v. Fink, 18 W. Va. 604.

6. BILL SHOULD SHOW PROPER PARTIES ARE MADE.

a. In General.—A bill in chancery should by proper allegations show on its face, that the proper parties are made to the suit. McKay v. McKay, 28 W. Va. 514; Norris v. Lemen, 28 W. Va. 336; White v. Kennedy, 23 W. Va. 221.

Where it does not appear in the pleadings or otherwise in the case, that a person has an interest in the subject matter of the suit, he is not a necessary party to the suit. Chapman v. P. & S. R. Co., 18 W. Va. 185.

b. Effect of Failure.

(i) In General.—If upon a bill in chancery against one defendant, on her filing an answer and stating facts which show that a third party ought to have been made a defendant, the court simply orders this third person to be made a defendant, process issues against him and is served upon him; but the original bill was not amended, and in it there were no allegations against this person, and no relief was prayed against him; evidence is taken to prove the facts alleged in the answer, which show the interest in the suit of this third person and a commissioner of the court reports the facts to the court, after he had served a notice on this third person that the matter was before him and he would report thereon; this third person never appeared in the suit. The court had no jurisdiction over him, and could in such a case render no decree against him, and if it did so, such decree was a mere nullity, and if such decree was final, it could be reversed on a bill of review or by an appellate court on appeal. McCoy v. Allen, 16 W. Va. 724-5.

It is error to decree on a petition filed by permission of the court, making numerous parties, both adults and infants, defendants thereto, on whom neither service of process is had, nor any appearance in any manner by them to such petition shown by the record. Morgan v. Morgan, 42 W. Va. 542, 26 S. E. Rep. 294.

(2) Naming in Summons.—"If a person is not named in the bill and no allegation with reference to him appears therein, the naming of him in the summons does not make him a party to the suit, although he may have been served with process; and though named in the prayer of the bill and in the summons and served with process, yet if there is no allegation in the bill with reference to him, he is not a party to the suit, because there is nothing in the bill to which he could answer and his rights, if he has any, are not to be adjudicated without giving him an opportunity to defend his interest. Moseley v. Cocke, 7 Leigh 224." Chapman v. P. & S. R. Co., 18 W. Va. 196.

(3) Naming in Prayer of Bill.—Although a person be named in the prayer of the bill and also in the summons and served with process, yet if there is no allegation in the bill with reference to him, he is not a party to the suit, because there is nothing in the bill, to which he could answer, and his rights, if he has any, are not to be adjudicated without giving him an opportunity to defend his interest. Chapman v. P. & S. R. Co., 18 W. Va. 185.

(4) Answer by Third Party.—The mere fact that persons answered a bill in which they were not named, and in which they did not, even by inference, from anything stated in the bill, appear to have any interest or concern, though such answer was by leave of the court, did not make them parties to the cause; and they would not be bound by the decree of the court against them; nor would they be entitled to the benefit of a final decree of the court substantially in their favor; nor could they be either prejudiced or benefited by depositions taken in the cause. Shaffer v. Fetty, 30 W. Va. 248, 4 S. E. Rep. 278.

7. EFFECT OF BEING MADE A PARTY.—When a person is made a party to a suit as to his rights involved therein, he must await the action of the court, and cannot, by independent proceedings outside of the suit, defeat such action. Parsons v. Snider, 42 W. Va. 517, 26 S. E. Rep. 285.

B. COMPLAINANTS.

1. IN GENERAL.—It is very often regarded by a court of equity, though never by a court of law, that it is immaterial whether a particular party in certain cases is made a plaintiff or defendant. Fleming v. Holt, 12 W. Va. 153.

A bill in equity may in frame, as to parties, follow the chancery practice used before the enactment of § 37, c. 125, Code, or the form prescribed by that section, but it must do one or the other. If the statutory form be used, persons named in the caption as plaintiff and defendant are such merely from being there named as such; but, if the statutory form be not used, the bill must formally, or in some plain, distinct way make parties plaintiff and defendant; otherwise, it is fatally defective and a decree upon it would be null. Cook v. Dorsey, 38 W. Va. 196, 18 S. E. Rep. 468.

2. INTEREST.

General Rule.—"It is a general rule in equity that every party interested in any suit must be made a party to the suit either as plaintiff or defendant, and the real party in interest must be the complainant; and it is immaterial that the interests of the defendants are in conflict with each other, or that some of their claims are identical with those of the plaintiff. Equity deals with the real parties in interest. Castleman v. Berry, 86 Va. 606, 10 S. E. Rep. 884; Kellam v. Sayre, 30 W. Va. 198, 3 S. E. Rep. 569." Campbell v. Shipman, 87 Va. 659, 13 S. E. Rep. 114; Stovall v. Border Grange Bank, 78 Va. 188; Jameson v. Deshields, 3 Gratt. 13; Meek v. Spracher, 87 Va. 167, 12 S. E. Rep. 397.

Interest of Complainants Must Be Consistent.—In equity it is only requisite that the interest of the plaintiffs be consistent, and it is immaterial that the defendants are in conflict with each other in that some of their claims are identical with those of the plaintiff, etc. Meek v. Spracher, 87 Va. 167-8, 12 S. E. Rep. 397.

Necessary Averments in Bill.—A plaintiff cannot obtain relief in equity, unless he both avers in his bill, and, if the averment is denied, also proves, that he has an interest in the subject-matter of the suit, and a proper title to institute the suit. If his want of interest or right to sue appears upon the face of his bill, it ought to be taken advantage of by demurrer; but if it does not so appear, then the defendant may show such want of interest or title by plea or answer. Barr v. Clayton, 29 W. Va. 256, 11 S. E. Rep. 899.

In Sillings v. Bumgardner, 9 Gratt. 278, this court held, that, although a suit could not be maintained by a plaintiff having no interest, and in such case the objection could not be removed by the introduction of other parties having interests, yet, if it appears that the plaintiff has an interest, though in a different character from that in which he sues, the descriptive words may be stricken out, and the suit may proceed in his name, and that of his co-plaintiffs brought before the court by an amended bill. Coffman v. Sangston, 21 Gratt. 269.

Assignee.—The mere possession of a writing by which a debt is acknowledged, without any written agreement from the person to whom that acknowledgment was made, is not sufficient to sustain a bill in equity. In such case, the person to whom the debt was originally due, must be made a party to the suit. Lynchburg Iron Co. v. Tayloe, 79 Va. 674, citing Auditor v. Johnson, 1 Hen. & M. 536.

3. TAXPAYERS.—Citizens and taxpayers merely as such, having no special property or interest to be affected, save in common with other citizens and taxpayers, cannot become parties to a proceeding by a court to alter the location of the rebuilding a county bridge and cannot sustain an appeal to review such proceeding under § 47, c. 39, Code 1867. County Court v. Armstrong, 34 W. Va. 326, 12 S. E. Rep. 488.

4. MARRIED WOMEN.—By Code, ch. 66, § 12, a married woman may sue and be sued in equity, without joining her husband in the suit where the case concerns her separate property. Rader v. Neal, 18 W. Va. 373. See monographic note on "Husband and Wife" appended to Cleland v. Watson, 10 Gratt. 159.

5. ATTORNEY IN FACT.—A suit cannot be maintained in the name of an attorney in fact, even in a court of equity. Jones v. Hart, 1 Hen. & M. 470. See monographic note on "Attorney and Client" appended to Johnson v. Gibbons, 27 Gratt. 632.

C. DEFENDANTS.

1. IN GENERAL.—One of the essential qualifications necessary to a bill in chancery is that it should, either in the caption or in the body of the bill, name some person or persons as parties defendant, and describe them as having some interest in the subject matter of the suit, and pray for some relief against them; and these requisites are as essential to a bill of review as to an original bill, and without them a paper purporting to be a bill of review should be dismissed on demurrer, from the files on motion. Kanawha Valley Bank v. Wilson, 35 W. Va. 36, 13 S. E. Rep. 58.

2. PERSONS NOT NAMED IN BILL.—No person has a right to file an answer in any suit in which he is not a party. And, although the subpoena and conditional decree be both served upon him, if he is not named in the bill and if there is no allegation in it, which bears upon or in any manner refers to him and if no decree is prayed against him, either in terms, or in the usual language praying a decree, "against all persons unknown, and who may be hereafter discovered claiming under or combining with the defendants," but it is a distinct charge against other persons, and it prays distinctly a decree against them for certain property, he is not, in any fair sense of the term, made a party defendant. Moseley v. Cocke, 7 Leigh 234; Gall v. Gall, 50 W. Va. 523, 40 S. E. Rep. 880.

Where a bill in equity neither makes one a party nor contains matter touching him, and asks no relief as to him, any decree touching him is void, and not res judicata. Bland v. Stewart, 35 W. Va. 518, 14 S. E. Rep. 215.

3. INTEREST.

In General.—"It may be remarked that the defendants to a bill in equity should consist of all persons interested in the relief sought, who are not already joined as plaintiffs." Meek v. Spracher, 87 Va. 167, 12 S. E. Rep. 397.

"No one should be made a defendant against whom there can be no decree or relief granted in the suit. Barton Ch. Pr. 133, 138. But all persons materially interested in the subject of a controversy ought to be made parties in equity. Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 60; Sand. Eq. 191. This rule, however, is restricted to those who are interested in the property which is involved in issue, and does not extend to persons who have an interest in the point or question litigated. Sand. Eq. 191." Howard v. Stephenson, 33 W. Va. 116, 10 S. E. Rep. 66. And see Code of W. Va., ch. 139, § 7; Neely v. Jones, 16 W. Va. 625.

Persons Interested in Resisting Relief Asked for.—Persons are not improper defendants who are so connected with the case made as to be directly interested in obtaining or resisting the specific relief asked in the bill or given in the decree, such as claimants, by written executory contract, of part of the personal property mentioned in the deed of trust in controversy. Zell Guano Co. v. Heatherly, 38 W. Va. 409, 18 S. E. Rep. 611.

A party who is charged in the bill with participation in the forgery of a deed to land, and of taking and certifying a false and fraudulent certificate, as a notary public, of the acknowledgment of such deed, for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the true owners, to the interest and advantage of such notary public, and the object of the bill is to have such deed delivered up to be canceled, is in his individual capacity, a proper party defendant. Alexander v. Davis, 42 W. Va. 465, 26 S. E. Rep. 291.

Party Not Named in the Bill.—A party not named in the bill, but whose interest in the subject matter of the bill only appears in the answer of a defendant, cannot file an answer to the bill as a defendant, if his doing so without the bill being first formally amended is objected to by the plaintiff; and if the court permits such answer to be filed and afterwards renders a decree against the plaintiff in favor of such party thus formally introduced into the case, the appellate court on the appeal of the plaintiff will reverse such decree. But where the record shows affirmatively that the plaintiff was present in the court, when the party was thus formally introduced into the cause and did not object but filed a replication to such answer, and the cause with reference to such new party was fully and fairly heard on its merits without objection to the court below, this will be regarded as a waiver by the plaintiff of such defect in the proceedings in the court below, and the appellate court would not reverse the decree for such defect in the proceedings. McMullen v. Eagan, 21 W. Va. 235.

Defendants with Conflicting Interest.—A bill in equity which includes many defendants who have distinct interests is multifarious and therefore erroneous. Stuart v. Coalter, 4 Rand. 74; Crickard v. Crouch, 41 W. Va. 503, 23 S. E. Rep. 727.

4. NEUTRAL DEFENDANT.—If the party defendant stands nearly neutral, the court is bound to see that all necessary parties are brought before it; but if he prays the court to decree in that stage, or consents that it should so decree, it amounts to waiver of the objection. ROANE, J., in Mayo v. Murchie, 3 Munf. 397.

5. INFANTS.—As the rule in equity is that all interested shall be parties to a cause: held, not error to make, in suit for specific performance, a party defendant of an infant, who is not named in a contract, but to whom part of the purchase money notes are made payable. Gentry v. Gentry, 87 Va. 478, 12 S. E. Rep. 966. See monographic note on "Infants" appended to Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Gratt. 505.

6. PERSONS UNKNOWN.—The affidavit of a corporation must, of necessity be made by an agent; and the affidavit of a local attorney of a corporation that the names of certain persons to be made defendants to a bill by such corporation, are to the amount unknown, is a sufficient compliance with § 2230 of the Code, to authorize a proceeding, by publication, against such persons as "parties unknown." Fayette Land Co. v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 93 Va. 274, 24 S. E. Rep. 1016.

Where parties have been properly proceeded against as "parties unknown," they may appear in person or by attorney and file their answers, or may appear within three years after entry of a judgment, decree or order against them; and a plea in abatement by a defendant who has been served with process, setting forth the names and residences of all parties interested in the suit, is immaterial, and should be rejected. Fayette Land Co. v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 93 Va. 274, 24 S. E. Rep. 1016.

D. JOINDER.

1. IN GENERAL.—There is no inflexible rule as to the joinder of parties in the court of chancery. Snyder v. Cabell, 20 W. Va. 48, 1 S. E. Rep. 241.

2. COMPLAINANTS.

General Rule.—The general rule is that several complainants, having distinct and independent claims to relief against a defendant, cannot join in a suit for separate relief of each. Nor can a single complainant, having distinct and independent claims for relief against two or more defendants severally, join them in the same bill. Snyder v. Cabell, 20 W. Va. 48, 1 S. E. Rep. 241.

A number of persons who have been fraudulently induced to enter into a contract with a company by means of the same false representations, and have sustained the same injury, except in amount, and seek precisely the same character of relief, may unite in one bill praying for the cancellation of their contracts, and make the offending company and its officers and agents, through whom the fraudulent representation were made, parties defendants. Rader v. Bristol Land Co., 94 Va. 765, 27 S. E. Rep. 560.

Joinder of Improper Parties.—If one person to whom alone the right asserted in a bill in chancery appertains, and other persons who have no right, join in the bill, and the cause be proceeded in to a decree in a court of chancery, without any objection there to the joining of improper parties plaintiffs in the bill; upon appeal from the decree to this court, the objection will have only this effect here, that the court will consider the right as vested in the plaintiff entitled thereto, and affected by his acts or omission. Dickenson v. Davis, 3 Leigh 401.

3. DEFENDANTS.

General Rule.—Defendants who have a common interest and a common defense are properly joined in one suit, and a demurrer to a bill which charges community of interest and defense is properly overruled. Coleman v. Claytor, 93 Va. 20, 24 S. E. Rep. 463.

For Discovery.—It is no longer the practice to join, as defendants in a suit in equity, for the purpose of discovery and costs against them, those who are not proper parties on other grounds. Alexander v. Davis, 42 W. Va. 465, 26 S. E. Rep. 201. See monographic note on "Bills of Discovery" appended to Lyons v. Miller, 6 Gratt. 427.

Settlement of Estates.—Where a creditor comes in under an order for an account of debts against a decedent's estate, and proves a debt upon which a third person is jointly bound with the decedent, such third person is not a necessary party to the suit, as no relief is there sought against him. It is not the practice of the courts, nor is it the policy of the law, to encumber suits for the administration of assets of decedent's estates with collateral issues affecting the adjustment of equities between persons having no privity with many of the other creditors. Robnett v. Mitchell, 101 Va. 702. See monographic note on "Creditors' Bills" appended to Suckley v. Rotchford, 12 Gratt. 60.

Defendant against Whom There is No Equity.—On the hearing of a suit in chancery, if it be discovered that the cause is not matured for hearing as to some of the defendants, against whom the plaintiff appears to have a claim in equity, the bill ought not to be dismissed upon the merits; but only as to those defendants against whom there is no equity; as to the other defendants, it should be sent back to the rules for farther proceedings; notwithstanding the plaintiff may have been negligent, and the cause was prematurely set for hearing on his motion. Key v. Hord, 4 Munf. 485; Henderson v. Anderson, 4 Munf. 435.

E. OBJECTIONS.

a. In General.—No principle of equity is more familiar or better settled than this: that "all persons materially interested in the subject of controversy ought to be made parties in equity, and if they are not, the defect may be taken advantage of, either by demurrer or by the court at the hearing." Clark v. Long, 4 Rand. 451; Armentrout v. Gibbons, 25 Gratt. 375; Dabney v. Preston, 25 Gratt. 841; Almond v. Rothgeb, 1 Va. Dec. 138; Snavely v. Pickle, 29 Gratt. 43; Lynchburg Iron Co. v. Tayloe, 79 Va. 671; Welsh v. Solenberger, 85 Va. 441, 8 S. E. Rep. 91; Burlew v. Quarrier, 16 W. Va. 108.

"If no relief be sought, as, for instance, if the bill be for discovery alone, it cannot be objected to for want of parties; but if relief be asked, the prayer of a process must be so framed as to bring all persons interested in the relief before the court, either as defendants or plaintiffs. In both of these points, however, the rule of equity differs from the rule of law, both in the necessity of joining all interested parties in the suit, and in option of joining them as plaintiffs or defendants. At law, a disputed issue alone is contested; the immediate disputants alone are bound by the decision; and they alone are the proper parties to the action. In equity, a decree is asked, and not a decision only; and it is, therefore, requisite that all persons should be before the court whose interest may be effected by the proposed decree, or whose concurrence is necessary to a complete arrangement. The same reason which requires that the immediate disputants be the only parties at law, also requires their arrangement as parties, plaintiffs and defendants, so that all the plaintiffs shall support one side, and all the defendants the other side, of the question in issue. In equity, it is only requisite that the interest of the plaintiffs be consistent, and it is immaterial that the defendants are in conflict with each other or that some of their claims are identical with those of the plaintiff. And, although a conflict of interests among the defendants is no valid objection to a bill, it does not follow that the court will adjudicate on their conflicting claims; in fact, it will not do so, unless the division be necessary to the plaintiff's right." Meek v. Spracher, 87 Va. 167-8, 12 S. E. Rep. 397.

b. When Made.—By the well-established practice of courts of equity, all known persons interested in a common unliquidated fund must be made parties in a suit demanding an account and share of that fund. The object of this rule is to prevent multiplicity of suits, and save the parties accountable for the fund from the harassments of repeated settlements and litigation respecting it. This rule of practice is intended for the protection of the accounting party, and is enforced at his instance only. Hence, according to the course of the court of equity in England, the objection must be made by demurrer, either ore tenus or in writing or by plea or answer. When the objection has not been made and brought under notice of the court before the decree, it cannot be effectually urged as cause of reversing the decree in an appellate tribunal. To allow it to be so urged by a party who has failed to urge it in the preliminary stages of the litigation, after all the expense and trouble of that litigation shall have been incurred, would frustrate the very object sought by the rule. That object cannot be attained, unless the party for whose protection the rule was established were required to ask its application to prevent future, rather than frustrate passed litigation, and by its frustration render future necessary. Moore v. George, 10 Leigh 239.

c. How Made.

(1) In General.—If persons materially interested in the subject matter of controversy are not made parties in equity, the defect may be taken advantage of either by demurrer, or by the court at the hearing and although the bill was not demurred to in the court below, nor the defect noticed by that court at the hearing it will be noticed at the hearing in the appellate court, and the decree reversed for that cause. Cunningham v. Patteson, 3 Rand. 46; Richardson v. Hunt, 2 Munf. 148; Sheppard v. Starke, 3 Munf. 29; Sillings v. Bumgardner, 9 Gratt. 275; James River, etc., Co. v. Littlejohn, 18 Gratt. 54; Armentrout v. Gibbons, 25 Gratt. 371; Dabney v. Preston, 25 Gratt. 841; Clayton v. Henley, 32 Gratt. 46; Lynchburg Iron Co. v. Tayloe, 79 Va. 671; Hinton v. Bland, 81 Va. 588; Almond v. Rothgeb, 1 Va.

Dec. 188; Proctor v. Hill, 10 W. Va. 60; Hoge v. Vintroux, 31 W. Va. 2; Morgan v. Blatchley, 33 W. Va. 155, 10 S. E. Rep. 232; Hitchcox v. Hitchcox, 39 W. Va. 607, 20 S. E. Rep. 595; Crickard v. Crouch, 41 W. Va. 503, 23 S. E. Rep. 727; Moore v. Jennings, 47 W. Va. 181, 34 S. E. Rep. 793; Miller v. Morrison, 47 W. Va. 664, 35 S. E. Rep. 906; Gall v. Gall, 50 W. Va. 523, 40 S. E. Rep. 880.

"The rule on this subject is, that where the defect in not making proper parties appears on the face of the bill, the objection may, and ought, to be made by demurrer. Where it does not so appear it should be made by plea or answer. 2 Rob. Prac. 276, old Ed. When, however, the objection is delayed till the hearing in the appellate court—whether it will avail or not will depend much on the circumstances. If the absent party has an interest in the subject matter of controversy, of such a nature that a final decree cannot be made without affecting his interest, the appellate court, of its own motion, will direct that he be brought before the court, whether the objection was or was not made in the court below. If, on the other hand, the interests of the absent parties are separable from those of the parties before the court, so that the court can proceed to a final decree, and do complete justice without affecting the absent parties, the latter are not regarded as indispensable. A defendant who claims that certain persons should be made parties to share a common burden ought to make the objection, as a general rule, in the pleadings; and if the objection be delayed until the case reaches the appellate court, that court will not require it unless it is clear that the absent party is likely to be prejudiced by the decree." Clayton v. Henley, 32 Gratt. 65; Prunty v. Mitchell, 76 Va. 170.

(2) Demurrer.

In General.—A bill should not be dismissed on demurrer merely for the want of proper parties. If it otherwise appears that the plaintiffs may be entitled to relief. Jameson v. Deshields, 3 Gratt. 4; Stewart v. Jackson, 8 W. Va. 31.

Matter Concerning Separate Estate of Wife.—A demurrer filed to a bill, for nonjoinder of husband in a suit in chancery by wife, upon a matter concerning her separate property, should be overruled. Rader v. Neal, 18 W. Va. 373. See monographic note on "Husband and Wife" appended to Cleland v. Watson, 10 Gratt. 159.

Demurrer for Want of Parties Should Name Necessary Parties.—A demurrer to a bill for want of parties should properly name the necessary parties defendant, who have been omitted so as to enable the plaintiff to amend his bill and call the attention of the court to this defect; and if it does not, the demurrant cannot complain that the demurrer is not sustained; but the court ought in the final hearing of the case, though the demurrer has been overruled, to decline to determine the cause on its merits, until the necessary parties defendant have been brought before the court by an amendment of the bill and have been given the opportunity to be heard. Robinson v. Dix, 18 W. Va. 529.

In Robinson v. Dix, 18 W. Va. 528, it is held that the demurrant should name the necessary parties who have been omitted; but it is further held in the same syllabus that the court ought in the final hearing of the cause, though the demurrer has been overruled, to decline to determine the cause on its merits until the necessary parties defendant have been brought before the court by an amendment of the bill, and have been given the opportunity to be heard. Moore v. Jennings, 47 W. Va. 181, 34 S. E. Rep. 793.

In the prayer of a bill, parties are described as "Whitley & McConkey," and in the charging part the same parties are prayed to be made defendants, except that these parties are described as "McConkey & Co." In the first part of the decree, they are styled "McConkey and Co." and in the latter part they are called "Whitley & McConkey." It being apparent that they are the same parties, there is no error in overruling a demurrer for that cause. Highland v. Highland, 5 W. Va. 63.

Where Party Has Left Jurisdiction.—The general doctrine is, that if a person who ought to be a party departs from the jurisdiction of the court, the plaintiff cannot be required to make him a party. Mitf. Pl. book 2, ch. 3. If a sufficient reason for not bringing a party before the court is suggested by the bill, as if a party is resident out of the jurisdiction of the court, and that fact is charged, a demurrer will not hold. Moore v. George, 10 Leigh 245.

(3) Plea in Abatement.

In General.—Mr. Robinson says: "Plea in abatement on account of all contracting parties not being sued, were first made necessary in the time of LORD MANSFIELD. It was then adjudged (in 1770) that the defendant must say in his plea who the partners are, and that if he does not plead the matter in abatement, the objection is waived." 5 Rob. Prac. p. 78. Prunty v. Mitchell, 76 Va. 171.

Where a part of the copartners only are sued, or other parties improperly included, it is a matter to be pleaded in abatement for nonjoinder or misjoinder, and if so pleaded will defeat a recovery against those only who are embraced in the action or where improper parties are included as copartners, notwithstanding the provision of the law found in the Code 1860, ch. 177, § 19. Urton v. Hunter, 2 W. Va. 88; Rutter v. Sullivan, 25 W. Va. 427; McDonald v. Cole, 46 W. Va. 186, 32 S. E. Rep. 1033.

Joint Obligors.—Where on a joint obligation one is sued, the defendant cannot take advantage of the nonjoinder except by plea in abatement alleging the joint obligation, and that the co-obligor is alive. Reynolds v. Hurst, 18 W. Va. 648.

Record Must Show Error.—An exception for lack of parties to the report of commissioners to make partition is not well taken when the record fails to disclose the interests of such parties. McClanahan v. Hockman, 96 Va. 392, 31 S. E. Rep. 516.

The omission of a necessary party, who voluntarily appears, is a harmless error. Moore v. Bruce, 85 Va. 139, 7 S. E. Rep. 195.

(4) Court at Hearing.—And if a defect of parties is apparent upon the record, the court will take the objection, though the defendants do not. Jameson v. Deshields, 3 Gratt. 13.

And whether the objection is made or not, the court sua sponte, where such defect is apparent on the face of the bill and exhibits, will notice the omission. Armentrout v. Gibbons, 25 Gratt. 371; Dabney v. Preston, 25 Gratt. 388; Snavey v. Pickle, 29 Gratt. 42; Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 60; Morgan v. Blatchley, 33 W. Va. 155, 10 S. E. Rep. 282; Hitchcox v. Hitchcox, 39 W. Va. 607, 20 S. E. Rep. 595.

(5) In Appellate Court.

In General.—"And if the defect be apparent on the face of the record, although the bill was not demurred to in the court below, nor the defect noticed by that court at the hearing, it will be noticed at the hearing in this court, and the decree reversed for that cause. These principles have been recognized and affirmed by this court as well-established rules of equity. In cases too numerous to mention. In Sillings v. Bumgardner, 9 Gratt. 273, 275, JUDGE MONCURE, delivering the opinion of the court, says: 'But the counsel for the appellee contended that this objection not having been made in the court below, now comes too late. But it was not waived in the court below; the want of parties appeared on the face of the bill; and in such cases it is well settled that the objection is fatal in the appellate court, though not taken in the court below.' Citing 2 Rob. Prac. 273, 483, and cases cited; Richardson v. Hunt, 3 Munf. 148; Sheppard v. Starke, 3 Munf. 29, and the principle has been reaffirmed to its full extent in the most recent case in this court on the subject, Armentrout v. Gibbons, 25 Gratt. 371, where some of the numerous decisions of this court on the question are cited." Dabney v. Preston, 25 Gratt. 341.

d. Amendments.

(1) Leave Granted in Lower Court.—Where the plaintiff has shown a right to relief against the defendants before the court, his bill ought not to be dismissed, because the proper relief cannot be extended to him, in consequence of his omission to make the necessary parties. In that case the plaintiff ought to have leave to amend his bill. Mitchell v. Chancellor, 14 W. Va. 22; Allen v. Smith, 1 Leigh 231; Kincheloe v. Kincheloe, 11 Leigh 400; Key v. Hord, 4 Munf. 486; Jameson v. Deshields, 3 Gratt. 13. And see Harrison v. Loneberger, 11 W. Va. 75.

Section 53, c. 125, Code, provides that when, in any case, a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court may cause them to be made parties by amendment to the action or suit. Smith v. Parsons, 33 W. Va. 644, 11 S. E. Rep. 68; Gall v. Gall, 50 W. Va. 523, 40 S. E. Rep. 380; Jameson v. Deshields, 3 Gratt. 13.

Multifariousness.—But if, on the hearing of a cause, it appears by the record that all the necessary defendants have not been made parties, and if the bill were amended, and they were made parties that the bill would necessarily be multifarious, the court ought not to give the plaintiff leave to amend his bill; but it should be dismissed without prejudice to the plaintiff in instituting any other suit or suits. Shaffer v. Petty, 30 W. Va. 248, 4 S. E. Rep. 278.

When No Relief Is Prayed.—And where parties are already before the court as defendants to an original bill, and no relief is prayed against them, in the amended bill, it is unnecessary to make them, or their personal representatives, parties to such amended bill. Beckham v. Duncan, 1 Va. Dec. 669.

(2) Leave Granted in Appellate Court.

In General.—The court of appeal, if there be a defect of parties, will send the case back to the court below that proper parties may be made. Jameson v. Deshields, 3 Gratt. 13; Proctor v. Hill, 10 W. Va. 60; Hoge v. Vintroux, 21 W. Va. 2.

Where Plaintiff Has No Right to Relief.—But where a plaintiff in equity has shown no right to relief, an appellate court will not reverse a decree dismissing his bill, although all the parties directly interested in the subject matter were not before the court. Mitchell v. Chancellor, 14 W. Va. 27.

Where Person Would Be Mere Formal Party.—So if it appears affirmatively that a person, if made a party would have been a mere formal party, against whom no decree would have been asked, and whose presence was not necessary for the protection of any of the defendants, the appellate court will not reverse a decree for his absence. James River, etc., Co. v. Littlejohn, 18 Gratt. 54.

Plaintiff Should Make Proper Parties.—So in the case of Swann v. Seldon, this court decided that the decree dismissing the bill on the merits ought not to be reversed, merely on the ground that some of the persons concerned in interest had not been made parties. It is the business of the plaintiff to make all proper parties. If he fails to do so, it is too late for him, in the appellate court, to take advantage of his own omission, for the purpose of reversing a decree which is correct and proper in all other respects. Kincheloe v. Kincheloe, 11 Leigh 398.

Error Cannot Be Corrected in Lower Court after Appeal.—And errors for the want of necessary parties cannot be corrected in the lower court by an amended and supplemental bill and bill in the nature of a bill of review, after an appeal is allowed and while it is pending in the appellate court. Almond v. Rothgeb, 1 Va. Dec. 138.

Cost.—On an appeal from an interlocutory decree, correct on the merits, but erroneously for want of proper parties, the court will reverse the decree, but allow the appellees to recover costs as the parties substantially prevailing; because, an appeal from an interlocutory decree, is only given to prevent the payment of money or change of property, or to settle principles. Cunningham v. Patteson, 3 Rand. 66.

e. Objection May Be Waived.—But the objection for want of parties may be expressly relinquished in the court below. Clark v. Long, 4 Rand. 453; Sheppard v. Starke, 3 Munf. 29; Armentrout v. Gibbons, 25 Gratt. 371; Proctor v. Hill, 10 W. Va. 60; Burlew v. Quarrier, 16 W. Va. 109; Donahue v. Fackler, 21 W. Va. 125; Cook v. Dorsey, 38 W. Va. 196, 18 S. E. Rep. 466; Moore v. Jennings, 47 W. Va. 181, 34 S. E. Rep. 793.

In Burlew v. Quarrier, 16 W. Va. 108, it is held that: "All persons materially interested in the subject of the controversy ought to be made parties in equity, and, if they are not, the defect may be taken advantage of either by demurrer or by the court at the hearing. It is not necessary, although more regular, that the want of parties should be made either by plea, answer, or demurrer. On the contrary, if it appear on the face of the record that proper parties are wanting, the decree will be reversed, unless the objection was expressly relinquished in the court below." Sheppard v. Starke, 3 Munf. 29; Clarke v. Long, 4 Rand. 451; Armentrout v. Gibbons, 25 Gratt. 371; Hitchcox v. Hitchcox, 39 W. Va. 607, 20 S. E. Rep. 595; Donahue v. Fackler, 21 W. Va. 125; Moore v. Jennings, 47 W. Va. 181, 34 S. E. Rep. 793.

Transposing Parties.—It is also the practice in equity to allow amendments of bills by transposing parties from plaintiff to defendant, and vice versa, if it is necessary to do complete justice between the parties in the cause. But this will not be allowed at the mere caprice of parties. Burlew v. Quarrier, 16 W. Va. 143.

2. MISJOINDER.

a. In General.—If parties having separate and distinct claims unite as plaintiffs it is a misjoinder. Graveley v. Graveley, 84 Va. 145, 4 S. E. Rep. 218.

Act of Legislature.—The legislature has by an act approved February 27, 1894, provided "that whenever it shall appear in any action at law or suit in equity, by the pleadings or otherwise, that there has been a misjoinder of parties plaintiff or defendant, the court may order the action or suit to abate as to any party improperly joined, and to proceed by or against the others as if such misjoinder had not been made." Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Dougherty, 92 Va. 375, 23 S. E. Rep. 777.

Application of Act.—The act of assembly approved February 27, 1894, (Acts 1833-4, p. 489,) permitting abatements where there has been a misjoinder of parties plaintiff or defendant does not apply to actions or suits decided before that date. Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Dougherty, 92 Va. 372, 23 S. E. Rep. 777.

Discretion of Court.—The chancery court exercises a sound discretion in determining whether there is a misjoinder of parties, under the particular circumstances of each case. Snyder v. Cabell, 29 W. Va. 48, 1 S. E. Rep. 241.

b. How Objection Made.

In General.—In Valden v. Stubblefield, 28 Gratt. 153, it was held, that "in this country the rules well settled, that in cases of misjoinder of parties as plaintiffs in equity, the objection must be made by demurrer, if the defect is apparent on the face of the bill, or by plea or answer if the defect does not so appear; and unless so made, the objection will not avail at the hearing, if a decree can be rendered without prejudice to the rights of parties." Burlew v. Quarrier, 16 W. Va. 142-3.

Demurrer.—There is no doubt that where a misjoinder is apparent on the face of the bill, or in a case like this, on the face of the petition, the objection may be raised by demurrer. Valden v. Stubblefield, 28 Gratt. 153; Ward v. Funsten, 85 Va. 365, 10 S. E. Rep. 415.

M is administrator of husband and wife, and it being doubtful whether the right to a fund is in the estate of husband or wife, he sues for it in equity in both characters. The bill is not demurrable for misjoinder of parties. Brent v. Washington, 18 Gratt. 526.

But it is a good ground of demurrer to the whole bill, that a person, who has no interest in the suit and has no equity against the defendant, is improperly joined as a plaintiff. Tavener v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 673.

c. When Objection Made.—Where objection is not made for a misjoinder of parties either by demurrer, plea or otherwise in due time it will be disregarded after arguments on the merits and final hearing. Dickenson v. Davis, 2 Leigh 401; Malone v. Hobbs, 1 Rob. 300; Tarr v. Ravenscroft, 12 Gratt. 651; Valden v. Stubblefield, 28 Gratt. 153.

F. NEW PARTIES.

1. IN GENERAL.—"The great objects of a court of equity are, to do complete justice by settling the rights of all persons interested in the subject of the suit, to make the performance of the orders of the court perfectly safe, and to prevent future litigation and multiplicity of suits. To these ends, it is necessary that all persons interested in the matter, should be before the court, in such way as to be bound by its decree. If the bill omit some who are interested, or if, in the progress of the suit, a new interest arises in one, not a party, it is the practice of every day to change the proceedings, either by amended or supplemental bill, so as to bring these new parties before the court; and LORD HARDWICK says, 'It is frequently known, that after a cause is gone into, and even thoroughly heard, yet the court is compelled to let it stand over for want of parties.'" Kling v. Ashley, 5 Leigh 411.

2. WHEN ADMITTED.—After a decision by the court of appeals, remanding a cause to the court of chancery, new parties may be admitted. Anderson v. Anderson, 1 Hen. & M. 12.

3. WHO ADMITTED.

Parties Having Same Interest as Plaintiff.—When the plaintiff has an interest in the subject matter of a suit, the bill may be amended, and other persons having the same interest, may be joined as coplaintiffs. Coffman v. Sangston, 21 Gratt. 268.

Assignees.—A court of equity requires the real parties in interest to bring the suit both legal and equitably, as in the case of trustees or assignees under insolvent acts or assignees in bankruptcy. And where the sole plaintiff, who originally brought the suit in his own name and not in autre droit, is discharged under insolvent acts and makes an assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors, or where such plaintiff has been declared a bankrupt, the assignees must be made parties, before the suit can be further proceeded in. In such case or cases the suit does not abate in the strict meaning of the word, but becomes so defective, that it cannot be further proceeded with in their absence. And in some other cases where the transfer pendente lite is considered as a transfer by operation of law and not voluntary, perhaps the same rule should be applied. Zane v. Fink, 18 W. Va. 693.

Interest.—Where the answer insists, that new parties should be made defendants, because they have become interested in the land with the defendants, which land is sought to be subjected to the payment of the purchase money, unless it appears, that they were interested in the land, when the suit was brought, it is not error to decline to make them parties. Hill v. Maury, 21 W. Va. 163.

4. HOW ADMITTED.

Petition to Be Admitted.

In General.—Upon a petition filed by a stranger to the cause, asking relief against the defendant therein on new matter contained in such petition, if such defendant ask to become a defendant to such petition, he should be allowed to do so; and, if he be refused the privilege of defending such petition a decree divesting his property rights from him, on the facts contained in such petition, is erroneous. Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 112, 14 S. E. Rep. 447.

Leave of Court Necessary.—A petition filed by a stranger to a cause, asking relief against a defendant therein on new matter contained in such petition, must be filed by leave of court. Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 112, 14 S. E. Rep. 447.

In Shinn v. Board of Education, 39 W. Va. 497, 20 S. E. Rep. 604, it is held that, "when a party files his petition, asking to be admitted as a party defendant in a pending suit in equity, in which no allegation is made naming or referring to him in any way, and no relief is prayed against him, and he is admitted to become such party defendant, he does not become a party in the cause until he has been made a party by some allegation in the bill as amended." This, however, does not apply in a case where a party files his petition, making the parties to the suit parties thereto, and setting up claim to the subject matter in controversy, when his petition may properly be treated as an original bill. Sturm v. Fleming, 32 W. Va. 404; Skaggs v. Mann, 46 W. Va. 309, 33 S. E. Rep. 110; Cleavenger v. Felton, 46 W. Va. 249, 33 S. E. Rep. 117.

Where a petition is filed in a suit in equity by one not a party to it, and whose rights are not mentioned in the bill, and such petition asks relief touching the subject matter of the bill, and such petition discloses an interest in the petitioner in such manner hostile to the claim of the plaintiff, the plaintiff must file an amended bill to bring the petitioner and his claim before the court, before there can be an adjudication of the plaintiff's rights. The mere petition does not make the petitioner a party for the purposes of decree. Gall v. Gall, 50 W. Va. 523, 40 S. E. Rep. 380.

Where a person files his petition asking to be admitted as a party defendant in a pending suit in equity, in which no allegation is made naming or referring to him in any way, and no relief is prayed against him, and he is admitted to become such party defendant, he does not become a party in the cause until he has been made a party by some allegation in the bill as amended. Shinn v. Board of Education, 39 W. Va. 497, 20 S. E. Rep. 604; McCoy v. Allen, 16 W. Va. 724; Gall v. Gall, 50 W. Va. 523, 40 S. E. Rep. 380.

Depositing Petition in Clerk's Office.—"The mere depositing a petition in the clerk's office in vacation does not effectuate the object sought; does not operate proprio vigore to make the petitioner a party. To do this an order of the court is necessary. Piedmont, etc., Life Ins. Co. v. Maury, 75 Va. 508." Walter v. Chichester, 84 Va. 724, 6 S. E. Rep. 1.

Form.—A petition filed by a stranger to a cause, asking relief against a defendant therein on new matter contained in such petition, must make such defendant a party to it, and process to answer it must be served on such defendant, unless waived by appearance or otherwise. Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 112, 14 S. E. Rep. 447.

Right of Party Petitioning.—A person who comes for the first time into a pending cause by petition, and is a proper person to file such petition, may have prior erroneous orders in the cause reheard and corrected, upon prayer for that purpose in his petition whether the case be proper for a petition for rehearing or bill of review in the case of a party to the cause. Crumlish v. Shenandoah Valley R. Co., 40 W. Va. 637, 23 S. E. Rep. 90.

When Petition Refused.—A petition praying for new parties is properly rejected by the trial court where it appears that they are not necessary parties, and that the object is delay. Robnett v. Mitchell, 101 Va. 763.

Laches.—While all persons interested in the subject matter of the suit should be made parties, yet if their case is fully stated and investigated upon their petition to be made parties and on account of their laches they should not be allowed to disturb the status of the case, the appellate court will not reverse the decree of the court below in the case; if, however for other reasons the case must be retried they may be made parties, if they desire it, when the case goes back. Triplett v. Romine, 33 Gratt. 651.

Admissions Made in Petition.—A party who files a petition in a cause praying to be admitted as a party defendant, and in his petition admits a fact, cannot thereafter, when so admitted, deny that fact in his answer to the bill. McClanahan v. Hockman, 96 Va. 392, 31 S. E. Rep. 516.

Proceedings Pending Appeal.—Upon a petition filed by a stranger to a cause, asking relief against the defendant therein on new matter contained in such petition, if such defendant, by an order in the cause, be allowed to file a petition to set aside a deed from him, vesting such stranger filing the first-mentioned petition with the right asserted therein, and the petition of such defendant be dismissed, and an appeal taken by him, it is error for the court, pending such appeal, to proceed to decree such stranger, upon his petition, the relief sought thereby against such defendant. Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 112, 14 S. E. Rep. 447.

G. DECREES.

1. WHEN REVERSED.

Instance of Parties Not Prejudiced.—An appellate court will not reverse a decree at the instance of a party not prejudiced by it. Handy v. Scott, 26 W. Va. 710.

If the court pronounces an erroneous decree in relation to the interest of parties who are not in court, that does not prejudice parties who are in the suit, it is not matter of which the latter can complain. Kuhn v. Mack, 4 W. Va. 186.

Where a defendant a short time before the institution of a suit against him, has relinquished all right to and interest in the subject matter of controversy, and subsequently, before the hearing, has his relinquishment put upon record, he cannot complain that the circuit court, without awarding any costs against him, has entered a decree in favor of the plaintiff, and confirming the relinquishment of the defendant. Workman v. Doran, 34 W. Va. 604, 12 S. E. Rep. 770.

Instance of Party Having No Interest.—An appellate court will not reverse a decree, though erroneous, at the instance of a party not interested in the property involved in the suit. Elcan v. Lancasterian School, 2 Pat. & H. 68; Chappell v. Robertson, 2 Rob. 590.

Instance of Nonresident Party.—A nonresident party, against whom a decree has been rendered upon order of publication, must proceed in the manner prescribed by the statute for the review of such decree and cannot in the first instance appeal therefrom to this court. (P. 718.) Handy v. Scott, 26 W. Va. 710.

2. EFFECT.—Where the appellate court has decided against the right of certain persons to become parties, upon remand those persons cannot come into the court below as parties and litigate anew the questions already determined. Robinson v. Crenshaw, 84 Va. 348, 5 S. E. Rep. 223.

H. MISCELLANEOUS CASES.

Person Made Party to Disqualify as Witness.

When a cause has reached such a stage in proof as to show that a person was an improper party, and was made one in order to disqualify him as a witness, then he should be dismissed out of the suit and thus restore his competency as a witness. Alexander v. Davis, 42 W. Va. 465, 26 S. E. Rep. 201.

Effect of Acts Done by Some of the Parties.—Where a large number of persons are interested in a common subject, and acts are done to the injury of the common right, the approval of the majority will neither excuse the wrong nor take away from the other parties their remedy by suit. Bull v. Read, 18 Gratt. 78.

Rule against Persons Not Parties to Suit.—It was not error in the court below to refuse to issue a rule against parties who were not named in this suit, to cause them to show for whose use and benefit the same was prosecuted. Vandiver v. Hyre, 5 W. Va. 414.

"Whether there are proper parties to a suit, or not, will not depend on the will or election of the suitors, who frequently go to trial without objection; as is evidenced by all those cases where the court themselves direct the cause to stand over for new parties to be made: and they ought, generally, to be such, that the decree if pronounced either way, will be obligatory on all parties interested, and not only in the controversy pending, but avoid the danger of contradictory decrees, thereafter, between any persons interested in the pending controversy." COALTER, J., in Mayo v. Murchie, 3 Munf. 376.

Party Having Two Distinct Rights or Interests.

Where the same person has two separate and distinct rights or interests in the subject matter of a suit, and the allegations of the bill comprehend but one of said rights or interests, the fact that such person is made a party to such suit will not estop conclude, or prevent him from asserting or defending his rights or interests in regard to said subject matter so far as they were not involved or comprehended in the allegations of the bill in such suit. As to the matters not so comprehended in the bill, he will not be regarded as a party to the suit. McNutt v. Trogden, 29 W. Va. 469, 2 S. E. Rep. 828.

A party cannot assume successive positions in the course of a suit, or series of suits, in reference to the same fact or state of facts, which are inconsistent with each other and mutually contradictory. Having assumed one position, he and his privies are thereafter estopped from assuming a conflicting position touching the same subject matter. Cheas., etc., Co. v. Rison, 99 Va. 19, 37 S. E. Rep. 820.

If a person is interested in the subject matter of a suit in two capacities, the one as trustee in one deed of trust, and the other as beneficiary in a different deed of trust, both deeds of trust being upon the same property, and he is made a party to a suit brought to set aside the latter trust deed, in which no reference is made to him as trustee in the other trust deed, he will not be regarded as a party to said suit in his capacity of trustee in the former trust deed. McNutt v. Trogden, 29 W. Va. 469, 2 S. E. Rep. 828.

Coleman v. Lyne's Executor.

October, 1886.

Chancery Practice—Answer—Failure to Notice Allegations of Bill—Effect.—Where the answer of the defendant in Chancery omits to notice some of the allegations of the bill, and replies to others, the allegations not noticed are not considered as admitted: but the plaintiff must except to the answer as insufficient.

Same—Same—Insufficiency.—An answer cannot be excepted to as insufficient after replication.

Same—Settlement of Stale Accounts.—Equity will not, without strong reasons, rip up old transactions, or settle stale accounts.

Same—Bill Pro Confesso—Effect.—Quære whether on a bill taken pro confesso, the plaintiff can have a decree for his claims, without documents or other evidence to support his bill?

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Lynchburg, where Coleman filed his bill against Henry Lyne, which was afterwards revived against his two executors. The subpoena to revive was served on both executors; but only one of them answered, and the suit was ordered to stand revived against both. All the circumstances are so fully stated in the following opinion, and the arguments of counsel so fully considered, that no other report is necessary.

Johnson, for the appellant.
Leigh, for the appellee.

October 12. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

The following is a brief history of this case: In 1805, the plaintiff filed his bill stating a partnership for the sale of goods, between himself and Henry Lyne, and filing the articles of agreement by which it was constituted. These bear date in November, 1785; and after stating the terms and nature of the trade, add that it was a small trial made by the parties: that they would keep up a regular correspondence, settle accounts spring and fall, and decline or continue the connection as it should be found advantageous or otherwise. The bill states a settlement in 1789, and a balance of £ 317 13 7½ profits in favor of the plaintiff; but of this settlement, no evidence is produced. The prayer is for the sum stated as a balance, or such as might be found due on account. A conditional decree was taken against the defendant, but he died before its service; and the suit was revived against his executors, Henry Lyne and Thomas Starling. Lyne answered; the plaintiff took a general replication; and commissions for taking depositions were awarded. At the next rules, the plaintiff set down the cause for hearing. This was in November, 1809. At the June Term, 1810, the cause came on for hearing on the bill, answer of Lyne and exhibit; and the Court referred the accounts to a Commissioner. On this order the cause stood, till October, 1819, more than nine years; when, on the motion of the plaintiff, the reference was set 456 aside; and the cause coming on to be heard on the bill, answer, and articles of agreement, the Court dismissed the bill with costs. From this dismissal the appeal comes up.

Various grounds were taken in the argument to convict this decree of error.

It was contended, that the answer did not controvert a single allegation in the bill, which should therefore have been taken as confessed, and the matter thereof decreed. If this were a case where there had been no appearance, or where, after appearance, the defendant had failed to answer, and the plaintiff had by regular steps proceeded to have his bill taken pro confesso, the question would properly arise, whether, upon the statement in the bill without documents or other evidence, the plaintiff could get a decree for his claim. It is a question, however, which need not now be considered. The point before us is a very different one. The defendant has appeared and answered. If the plaintiff had considered the answer as admitting all his allegations, he should have set the cause down on bill and answer. If the answer was deemed insufficient from omitting to notice any material allegations in the bill, the plaintiff should have excepted to it, and called for a better answer. If his exceptions had been sustained, and the defendant had refused to answer further, his bill might have been taken pro confesso generally. Jopling v. Stuart, 4 Ves. 619. Turner v. Turner, Ibid. in note, and other cases there cited. This course of proceeding puts the defendant on his guard, and prevents surprise.

But, a much broader doctrine was contended for, and one which seems to me pregnant with mischief, and calculated to entrap incautious defendants. It was insisted that all the allegations of the bill, not expressly denied by the answer, must be considered as admitted by the defendant to be true; and the counsel put it on this ground. A total failure to answer admits the whole bill to be true; ergo, a partial failure to answer admits the part 457 unanswered to be true. But in the case of a total failure, the *party is in contempt; and yet such steps are taken, as are calculated to warn him of the effects of his contumacy. Whereas, when he answers, and no exception is taken to his answer as insufficient, he has no notice that hereafter, at the hearing, certain facts will be relied on as proved because he has not expressly noticed and negatived them in his answer.

One or two cases were cited from our Reports, as countenancing the idea of the counsel; but, they will be found to be cases as in Page's ex'rs v. Winston's adm'r, 2 Munf. 298, in which the allegation in the bill was, that some fact did not exist, or that something was not done. (negatives which could not be proved,) or cases where the documents and circumstances in the cause prove, prima facie, that the fact alleged and not denied, is true; as in Scott & ux. v. Gibbon & Co. 2 Munf. 86.

But in the case at bar, so far from setting down the cause on bill and answer, or excepting for insufficiency, the plaintiff has taken a general replication to the answer; thereby waiving all exception to it, and acknowledging that it does not contain a sufficient admission of the allegations in the bill. In 1 Newland's Chancery, 183, it is said, "The plaintiff must take care also, not to reply to the answer, if he means to except to it; for thereby the answer is admitted to be sufficient." In 2 Madd. Chancery, 275, it is said, where the defendant, by his answer, admits the plaintiff's case, or sufficiently so to render the examination of witnesses unnecessary, a replication (unless in the case of an infant) need not be filed; and for this he cites Wyatt's Prac. Reg. 374, and Keeper v. Wilde, 1 Vern. 140. Hinde's Practice, 289. The replication in the plaintiff's answer or reply to the defendant's plea or answer; and this must be filed in order to put the answer in issue, unless the plaintiff find sufficient matter confessed, in the defendant's answer, to ground a decree upon, and sets down his cause upon bill and answer." This is the uniform language of the books of practice. Nay, the very words of the replication 458 *say, "This repliant saith that he will aver and prove his said bill to be true, certain." &c. and "that the said answer is uncertain, untrue," &c. "all which matters and things, this repliant is, and will be, ready to aver and prove," &c. After this, surely the plaintiff is estopped from relying on the answer to prove his whole case; and in point of fact and common sense, the answer (though it is informal, and, upon exceptions, must have been adjudged insufficient,) does not contain an admission of the allegations in the bill. The executor means to say only, that he is wholly ignorant of the matter, and that neither the books nor papers of his testator throw any light upon it.

The next position taken was, that the Court, instead of dismissing the bill, should have ordered a second account, or an issue. I know very well, that in general, where a partnership is stated in the bill, and confessed by the answer, an account is of course; but that rule is always subject to this exception; that the party applying for the account do not sleep upon his case, but bring it forward in a reasonable time. Equity will not, without strong reason, led it aid to rip up old transactions, or settle stale accounts; especially, if that settlement is to be made, not by the parties themselves, but by their successors, who know nothing of the business. In the case of Lacon v. Briggs, 3 Atk. 105, Lord Hardwicke, where an account was asked after 17 years, says, "I am of opinion, that if I should decree an account in this case, I should make one of the worst precedents that a Court of Equity can make, for disturbing the peace of families." Ray v. Bogart, 2 Johns. Cas. 432, is a very strong case to this point; also Ellison v. Moffat, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 46, where the bill on a partnership was brought after 26 years; and though the intervention of the American war accounted for part of that time, though there were books of the firm, and though the defendants, who were executors, had offered $2,500 by way of compromise; yet, when in their answer they alleged that they were unable to state an account, having no books nor vouchers of their testator: that the offer of a compromise, was merely an effort to buy their peace; and that the demand was stale and barred by time; the Chancellor dismissed the bill, saying, "It would not be sound discretion to overhaul accounts in favor of a party, who has slept on his rights for such a length of time; especially against the representatives of the other party, who have no knowledge of the original transaction. It is against the principles of public policy to require an account, after the plaintiff has been guilty of so great laches." It is useless to cite other cases. The books are full of them. In the case before us, the partnership seems intended to have been a temporary thing, a mere experiment upon a very limited scale, and settlement of accounts twice a year. It commenced in 1785, and the suit is brought in 1805, twenty years after. Whether the connection lasted one, two, or three years, we know not. Indeed, except the statement in the bill (which is no evidence) we have not one title of information on the subject. The defendant died before answer. One of his executors answered. The other never appeared; nor did the plaintiff take any steps to bring him before the Court. He seems to have been quite satisfied to drop him, and proceed singly against the other. The plaintiff set down the cause on the answer of Lyne, saying that he knew nothing of the matter, and had no books or accounts of his testator. The Court ordered an account. The case stood on the order for nine years. Then, on the motion of the plaintiff, it was set aside, and the cause brought again to a hearing. It had been now thirty-four years since the date of the partnership. In all this time, the plaintiff had not been able to produce an atom of evidence. Ought the Court to have ordered another account, or an issue? Assuredly not in my opinion. Indeed, I think it would have been right to have dismissed the bill, when the Court first sent it to a commissioner. It was then 25 years old. The plaintiff had stated in his bill, that he had no materials for an account. The defendant was dead; and his representative had said he knew nothing about it. How then could an account be taken?

It was strongly objected, that costs were decreed against the plaintiff; but I do not see that it was wrong. He had filed a bill in a case where he did not produce the least evidence, that there was a single cent due him, a case wholly unsupported. Why should he not pay the costs?

I think the decree should be affirmed.

The other Judges concurred, and the decree was affirmed.*

Morris v. Deshazo.

October, 1826.

Appeals—At What Time Bond Must Be Given.—An appeal from a Court of Common Law cannot be allowed, with condition to give bond and security, after the term at which the judgment was obtained.

Same—Same.—But a Court of Chancery has power to grant an appeal, if bond and security be given within a reasonable and limited time. In the next vacation after the term at which the decree was rendered.

Morris filed a caveat in the County Court of Henry, against Deshazo, to prevent the issuing of a grant to the latter. A jury was impanelled, who rendered a verdict for the defendant; and the Court gave judgment accordingly. An appeal was granted to the plaintiff, on condition that he should give bond and security "in the clerk's office, within thirty days." The Superior Court affirmed the said judgment; and Morris obtained a supersedeas from a Judge of this Court.

As the argument turned on the merits, and the cause was decided on the regularity of the appeal, nothing need be said as to the points made in the argument.

October 16. JUDGE GREEN delivered the opinion of the Court.†

The appeal in this case, from the County to the Superior Court, was improvidently allowed, upon the condition that the appellant should give bond and security in the clerk's office within thirty days; and which was accordingly given after the adjournment of the Court. An appeal from a judgment in a Court of Law, cannot be allowed upon such terms, as has been decided in Thompson & O'Neal v. Evans, 6 Munf. 397; although appeals from decisions in the Superior Courts of Chancery may be allowed, upon such a condition. Steady v. Jackson, 1 Rand. 413. The acts of Assembly upon this subject, as to appeals both from Courts of Law and Chancery, seem, at first view, to have the same effect; but they have not. An appeal can be allowed from a judgment at Law, only by the Court pronouncing the judgment, and during the term of the Court at which the judgment was pronounced. The same Court, at a subsequent term, or the Judge thereof, in vacation, cannot, under any circumstances, allow an appeal; nor can an appeal be allowed in such case, by an Appellate Court, or a Judge thereof, under any circumstances. The judgment can be brought before an Appellate Court, only by a writ of error, or a supersedeas, awarded by the Appellate Court, or a Judge thereof. The act of Assembly, in respect to these cases, provides, that "Before granting any appeal, or issuing of any writ of error or supersedeas, the party praying the 462 same, shall enter into "bond," &c. As an appeal can only be granted in Court, and by the Court during the term at which the judgment was pronounced; and the bond is to be given before the granting of the appeal; it follows, that the giving of a bond after the term, does not justify the allowance of an appeal during the term. If an appeal under such circumstances were valid, it would have its effect from the moment it was granted, and the plaintiff's right would be suspended for a time, without security, and the bond might never be given. In the cases of writs of error and supersedeas, although they may be awarded, they cannot issue or have any effect, until bond and security be given.

*JUDGES COALTER and CABELL, absent.

‡JUDGE COALTER, absent.

Appeals may be allowed from decrees in Chancery, by the Court pronouncing the decrees, during the term; in which case the statute directs, that "before granting any such appeal," the party shall give bond and security; but, an Appellate Court, or a Judge thereof, in vacation, or the Chancellor who has pronounced the decree, may, during the succeeding vacation, grant an appeal, if it appear to his satisfaction, that the failure to appeal from his decree at the time, or during the term when it was pronounced, did not proceed from any culpable neglect in the petitioner, or that upon the whole circumstances of the case, the petitioner ought to have the benefit of an appeal. These appeals, allowed by the Appellate Court, or a Judge thereof, or by a Chancellor who pronounced the decree, in the next vacation, are analogous to the writ of error, or supersedeas, at law. Although allowed, they have no effect, until the bond and security be given; and this of necessity, for the bond is given, not to the Judge, but in the clerk's office. If, at the time a decree is pronounced, the party wishes an appeal, but is not then prepared to take and perfect it, by giving bond and security, and should satisfy the Judge that this inability does not arise from his culpable neglect, or, that upon the whole circumstances, he ought to have the benefit of an appeal; to allow an appeal, upon condition that bond and security 463 should be given within a reasonable *and limited time, in the next vacation, would be doing, in effect, only what he would be bound to do in vacation, upon being satisfied of the same facts; and the order would have the same effect, as if it had been made in vacation. It would not intercept the execution of the decree, until the bond and security were given. This power in the Chancellor, to allow an appeal in vacation, after the term at which the decree was pronounced, and the want of power in the Judge of the Court of Law, to allow an appeal after the term at which the judgment was given, makes an appeal allowed in Court, from a decree, with time to give bond and security, good; and an appeal from a judgment at law, upon such condition, irregular.

The judgment of the Superior Court is reversed; and the Court giving such judgment as the Superior Court ought to have given, the appeal from the County to the Superior Court is dismissed as improvidently granted; the appeal bond being given after the expiration of the term at which the judgment was given; the appellee to recover his costs in this Court, being the party substantially prevailing.

M'Rae v. Scott & Saunders.

October, 1836.

Instructions—Matters of Fact.—The instruction of a Court to the jury ought not to involve matters of fact as well as of law.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Chesterfield county.

Scott & Saunders, surviving partners of the late firm of Lyle, Scott & Saunders, brought assumpsit against M'Rae, for the amount of certain goods taken up by the defendant at the store of the plaintiffs.

464 The defendant *pleaded non assumpsit, and the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs. Judgment was given accordingly.

At the trial, the defendant filed a bill of exceptions, stating that at the trial the defendant introduced a witness to prove, that in the latter part of the year 1812, the defendant being engaged at a game of cards with Saunders, one of the plaintiffs, and others, he, the defendant, won of the said Saunders $215, which was then received; that all gaming ceased thereafter between the said parties, and there was no further gaming at that time between any other persons; that some time after the gaming between the parties was over, and they had left the card table, (about the space of a quarter of an hour,) but before the company broke, and in the same room, the said Saunders applied to the defendant for the loan of money, which the defendant positively refused; but the said Saunders replied, that it was hard that the defendant should be indebted to the firm of Lyle, Scott & Saunders, and would not lend him, nor pay them; that the defendant then

Instruction—Matters of Fact.—In Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Noell, 86 Va. 24. 9 S. E. Rep. 478, it is said: "It is a fundamental maxim that the court responds to questions of law, and the jury to questions of fact. The court must decide on the admissibility of evidence, that being a question of law; but not as to its weight after it is admitted, that being a question of fact: and the decided cases, says Mr. Conway Robinson, evince a zealous care to watch over and protect the legitimate powers of a jury. They show that the court must be very careful not to overstep the line which separates law from fact. They establish the doctrine that when the evidence is parol, any opinion as to the weight, effect or sufficiency of the evidence submitted to the jury, any assumption of a fact as proved, will be an invasion of the province of the jury. 1 Rob. Pr. 388; Cornett v. Rhudy, 80 Va. 710; McDowell v. Crawford, 11 Gratt. 402; Bart. Law Pr. 214; Baring v. Reeder, 1 Hen. & M. 174; Moore v. Chapman, 3 Hen. & M. 206; *Whitacre v. said, he would pay to Lyle, Scott & Saunders what silver he had about him, if he, Saunders, would promise to credit him on their books; that the money, ($215,) was paid, and Saunders promised that he would enter the credit in the books of Lyle, Scott & Saunders, the next morning. Upon this evidence, on the motion of the plaintiffs, the Court instructed the jury that the said $215 so won of, and so paid to Saunders, does not entitle the defendant to a credit therefor against the plaintiffs in this action. 1. Because this paying and receiving back the money lost by Saunders, is to be regarded in the same light as if the promise to give credit had been made direct for the money lost. 2. Because the money to be received by Saunders was for his own use, and not for the concern. 3. Because the said sum of $215 might have been recovered by Saunders of the defendant; and having so received it back, he was not bound by his promise to give the credit in the *company's books.

To this opinion the defendant excepted, and took an appeal.

The case was submitted.

October 20. The PRESIDENT delivered the opinion of the Court.*

The objection to the instruction of the Judge to the jury, which is stated in the bill of exceptions, is, that it involves matter of fact which ought to have been left to the jury. Whether paying the money lost at play by Saunders, one of the plaintiffs, to the defendant, and his receiving it back, under the circumstances stated in the bill of exceptions, was to be regarded, (as was said by the judge,) in the same light as if the promise had been made directly for the money lost, was matter to be deduced or not, by the jury, from the evidence. So also, whether the money received by Saunders, was for his own use, and not for the firm. If for the firm, his promise to credit in the books, the next morning, was not a void promise, as stated by the Judge; although, as regarded the money lost at play, he had his remedy against the defendant, under the statute against gaming.

The judgment is therefore to be reversed, the verdict to be set aside, and further proceedings had therein; in which the instruction given is to be refused.

October, 1826.

Appeal—Refusal to Allow Person to Sue in Forma Pauperis.—An appeal will lie from the order of an Inferior Court refusing to grant leave to a person held in slavery, to sue in forma pauperis.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Lee county.

Sam, a man of colour, held in slavery by Blakemore, petitioned the Superior Court for leave to sue for his freedom. This petition was accompanied by several affidavits, and a statement of the case by the counsel, who had been appointed by the Court to conduct the cause on behalf of the petitioner. The Court refused to grant the prayer of the petition, because the fact stated by the counsel were not sustained by the evidence.

The petitioner appealed.

Nicholas, for the appellant, assigned by the Court.

No Counsel, for the appellee.

October 21. The PRESIDENT delivered the opinion of the Court.†

The affidavits in this case, and the circumstances stated in the opinion of the counsel appointed by the Court, on the application of the pauper, present a case which certainly would have justified the Superior Court in making the order authorising the pauper to sue for his freedom, in pursuance of the act of Assembly. The Court, therefore, erred in refusing to make such order, and in dismissing the complaint of the pauper.

If this were an ordinary case, the difficulties which have been suggested as to the right of the plaintiff to appeal from such an order, might be insurmountable; as to which we *give no opinion. But, in these pauper cases for freedom, this Court have not adhered strictly to rules applicable to other cases, nor to the letter of the act giving it jurisdiction. In a plain action of assault and battery, in which a penny damages were given on a plea of not guilty, it has often decided on the right of the pauper to freedom, though that question was not involved in the pleadings. In the present case, though the plaintiff might perhaps renew his application to sue for his freedom, on further proof, (as to which it is not necessary to give an opinion) yet, for all that appears, the judgment of the Superior Court may be final as regards his right to freedom; which, if not a franchise, is analogous to it, and ought to bring the case within the spirit of that clause of the act, which gives to the Court jurisdiction in cases in which a franchise is brought in question.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings, in which the Superior Court is to make the order permitting the plaintiff to sue in forma pauperis, according to the provisions of the act.

†JUDGE COALTER absent.

§Unlawful Detainer.—See on this subject, monographic note on "Unlawful Detainer" appended to Dobson v. Culpepper, 23 Gratt. 352.

A party who is entitled to the possession of land as against the defendant, no matter how, or in what manner or mode he may have acquired such right, or whether he has ever been in possession or not, may bring an action of unlawful detainer for the recovery of the possession. Hawkins v. Wilson, 1 W. Va. 124, citing the principal case as authority for session, in certain cases, even where no force occurred.

Same—Tenant in Common—One tenant in common may have this remedy for the whole land, against any party having no right whatever, without joining his co-tenant.

The case was this. Gibson filed a complaint of unlawful detainer, under the act of Assembly of February 12, 1814, against Allen, for, that the defendant "unlawfully and against his consent, withholds from him the possession of two lots or parcels of ground lying and being in the city aforesaid, (the city of Richmond) on E street, commonly called the Brickrow, just below the United States Bank, one of which lots binds upon the said E street, and the other lies in the rear thereof, with all the houses thereon, and the appendages and appurtenances thereof, whereof he prays restitution of the possession." A justice issued his warrant to the sergeant of the city of Richmond, reciting the complaint in the same terms, and requiring him to summon the defendant Allen, and at least eighteen freeholders as jurors, to try the complaint aforesaid. The warrant also required the sergeant to give notice to at least two other justices of the peace for the said city, and to request their attendance, &c.

The jury so summoned were sworn "to try whether the defendant, against the consent of the plaintiff, holds possession of the tenements mentioned in the complaint filed in this cause; whether the said defendant hath so held possession thereof against the consent of the plaintiff, for three years next before the exhibition of the said complaint; and whether the plaintiff hath the right of possession in the tenements aforesaid?" The jury returned a verdict "that the defendant did, at 469 the time of the exhibition of *the complaint filed in this cause, hold possession of the tenements therein mentioned, against the consent of the plaintiff: that the said defendant hath not so held possession thereof, against the consent of the plaintiff, for three years next before the exhibition of said complaint; and that the plaintiff had the right of possession in the tenements aforesaid."

The Court gave judgment that the plaintiff recover against the defendant the possession of the tenements aforesaid, &c.

On the trial, the plaintiff offered in evidence in support of his action, a deed of mortgage executed by the defendant to the plaintiff and John Lesslie, on the 20th of April, 1816, reciting, that Lesslie had endorsed certain notes for Allen, which had come into the possession of Gibson, and Allen being desirous of securing the said Lesslie harmless from the effects of his said endorsements, conveyed to Gibson and Lesslie the lots in question with other property; but, if Allen should discharge the debts aforesaid, then the said Gibson and Lesslie should re-convey the said mortgaged premises.

To this evidence the defendant objected, as not being proper to sustain the right of possession of the plaintiff alone to the premises in the writ mentioned, as the said deed shewed a right also in another; but this objection was over-ruled by the Court, and the deed permitted to go to the jury as proper evidence, to have such influence with the jury as it might lawfully have. The defendant excepted.

The Court also gave the following opinions: 1. That it is competent to a mortgagee to eject a mortgagor (as in the present case) by this mode of proceeding, under the act of Assembly. 2. That to enable the plaintiff in this cause to recover against the defendant the premises in question, it is not necessary to prove that the said plaintiff ever did have the possession of the premises which he now claims.

3. That the pendency of a suit between the same parties and others, which is shewn at this time to exist in the Superior Court of Chancery, the object of which suit is to foreclose the said mortgage, is no bar or impediment to the complainant's proceeding in this form of action; although another suit is depending in the said Court of Chancery, between different parties, by which the property in question may be recovered; and in consequence of which, the proceedings in the first mentioned suit have been suspended.

To all these opinions, the defendant excepted.

Other exceptions were taken which are not important, as they are not noticed by the Court.

A writ of supersedeas was granted by the Superior Court, and the judgment was affirmed.

The cause was brought by supersedeas to this Court.

Nicholas, for the appellant.

Stanard, for the appellee.

It was contended for the appellant, First, That the proceeding in this case being in derogation of the common law, ought to be strictly followed; which was not done in these several particulars: 1. The complaint does not state the contents of the land in dispute. 2. The jury were sworn to try whether the plaintiff "hath" the right of possession referring to the time of trial, but they find that the plaintiff "had" the right of possession; referring to an uncertain antecedent period.

Secondly. The justices erred in their decisions mentioned in the bills of exceptions. 1. The right under the mortgage was a joint right and could not be severed. 2. The act of Assembly was intended to redress cases of a violent deprivation of possession, not to the case of a mortgagee, after forfeiture. 3. The pendency of the suits in Chancery rendered the procedure in this summary remedy, improper.

See the principal case also cited in Board of Education v. Crawford, 14 W. Va. 800; Railroad v. Harness, 24 W. Va. 516; Childs v. Hurd, 32 W. Va. 87, 9 S. E. Rep. 370.

Same—By Tenant in Common.—One joint tenant or tenant in common may, in an action of unlawful detainer, recover the possession of the whole land, without joining his cotenant in the action. Voss v. King, 33 W. Va. 242, 10 S. E. Rep. 404, citing the principal case as its authority.

Allen mortgaged the premises in dispute to Gibson and Lesslie, by a deed which conveyed a joint estate to the mortgagees. Lesslie died. The deed contained a covenant that the mortgagor should possess and enjoy the mortgage premises, until default should be made in the payment of the money. Default was made. Gibson, the surviving mortgagee, proceeded, under the act of February 12, 1814, (Rev. Code, 445, ch. 115,) to recover possession of the mortgaged premises. Judgment was given for the plaintiff, and the case has come here by supersedeas. Several bills of exception were taken by the defendant.

The material questions in the case are, whether a mortgagee can, in any case, obtain the possession of the mortgaged premises by a proceeding under that act? And if he can, whether the surviving mortgagee can recover in his own name, without joining the heirs of the deceased mortgagee as a party in the proceeding?

The objection that the complaint omits to state the estimated quantity of the land, is, I think, entitled to no weight. The statute directs the complaint to be in the form prescribed, or to that effect. The only object of this direction was, to require a reasonably certain description of the property claimed. Such a description is found in the complaint upon which the proceedings in this case were founded. The property is in the city of Richmond, and described as lots bounded by a certain street, and adjoining the United States Bank.

By the common law, one who had a right or title to enter into land, had a right to enter and hold with force; and even since the statutes against forcible entries and detainers, a party having a right of entry is not responsible in a civil action, or in a common indictment for trespass, for 472 *a forcible entry or detainer. Hawkins, P. C. 140, ch. 64, sec. 1. By the statute of 5 Rich. 2, Stat. 1, ch. 8, forcible entries and detainers were made a public offence; and upon conviction, the party evicted was restored to the possession, as a consequence of the conviction, unless the wrong-doer had 3 years possession before the institution of the prosecution.

The substance of the British statutes on this subject, was enacted in Virginia in 1789. 13 Hen. St. at Lar. p. 5. That act provided, "that none shall make any entry into any lands or tenements, or other possessions whatever, but in case where entry is given by law; and in such case, not with strong hand, nor with a multitude of people, but only in a peaceable and easy manner; and that none who shall have entered into the same in a peaceable manner, shall hold the same afterwards with force;" and if any should do the contrary, it directs an enquiry by a justice of the peace through a jury, and if any be found guilty of a violation of the act, that restitution be made to the party so put out, unless the wrong-doer has had possession for three years. A party who entered, or held by force after a peaceable entry, fell within the provisions of this act, whether he had or had not a right of entry or possession.

This act was re-modelled by the act of 1814, so as to make it a civil remedy for the immediate recovery of the possession, in certain cases, even where no force occurred. It provides, first, that "none shall enter into any lands or tenements, but in case where entry is given by law; and in such case, not with strong hand, nor multitude of people, but only in a peaceable and easy manner. None who shall have entered in a peaceable manner, shall hold the same against the consent of the party entitled to the possession thereof." Secondly, "If any shall enter, or shall have entered, into any lands or tenements, in case where entry is not given by law, or, if any shall enter, or shall have entered, into any lands or tenements, with strong hand, or with multitude of people, even in 473 case *where entry is given by law, the party turned out of possession, by such unlawful, or by such forcible entry, by whatever right or title he held such possession, or whatever estate he held or claimed in the lands or tenements of which he was so dispossessed, shall, at any time within three years thereafter, be entitled to the summary remedy herein provided." Thirdly, "If any shall enter, or shall have entered, in a peaceable manner, into any lands or tenements, in a case where such entry is lawful, and after the expiration of his right, shall continue to hold the same against the consent of the party entitled to the possession, the party so entitled, as tenant of the freehold, tenant for years, or otherwise, shall be entitled to the like summary remedy, at any time within three years after the possession shall have been so withheld from him against his consent."

The first section only prohibits unlawful entries, and forcible entry where the entry is lawful; but does not prohibit a person who is entitled to the possession, from holding with force, if he has entered peaceably.

The second section gives a remedy to a party turned out of possession, by another entering where no entry is given him by law, or entering by force. The case of a mortgagee never in possession, claiming against a mortgagor who never entered upon the mortgage, nor turned him out of possession, certainly does not fall within the provision of this section. If a mortgagee who has never been in possession, can avail himself of this summary remedy, it must be by force of the third section.

There is considerable difficulty in determining the effect of this third section; and, in order to understand it, it will be necessary to look to other provisions of the statute, which seem to have a bearing upon it. The act, in prescribing the forms of proceeding in enforcing this summary remedy, proceeds: "The party so turned out of possession, or so held out of possession, may exhibit his complaint, &c. in the following form, or to the following 474 *effect." The form prescribed for the complaint of a person held out of possession, is, "A. B. complains that C. D. unlawfully, and against his consent, withholds from him the possession of a certain tenement, &c. whereof he prays restitution of the possession." The Justice's warrant recites this complaint and prayer verbatim. The charge to be given to the jury is, "You shall well and truly try, whether the defendant, C. D. against the consent of the plaintiff, holds possession of the tenement mentioned in the complaint filed in this cause; whether the said defendant hath so held the possession thereof, against the consent of the plaintiff, for three years next before the exhibition of the said complaint; and, whether the plaintiff hath the right of possession in the tenement aforesaid." The form of the verdict, as prescribed by the act, is, "We, the jury, find that the defendant did, (or did not,) at the time of the exhibition of the complaint filed in this cause, hold possession of the tenement therein mentioned, against the consent of the plaintiff: that the defendant hath (or hath not) so held possession thereof against the consent of the plaintiff, for three years next before the exhibition of the said complaint; and that the plaintiff hath (or hath not) the right of possession in the tenement aforesaid." The act then directs, that if the jury shall find that at the exhibition of the complaint, the defendant held possession of the tenement against the consent of the plaintiff, and that the defendant had not so held it against the plaintiff's consent, for three years next before the exhibition of the complaint, and that the plaintiff hath the right of possession, the justices shall render judgment in favor of the plaintiff, that he recover possession of the tenement aforesaid, with full costs, and shall award a writ of abere facias possessionem.

The terms of the third section, in their literal import, can be applied only to the cases of persons originally entering by a title which gives a temporary, or defeasible estate, or to the representatives 475 of the first taker of such *an estate; and the expressions of the complaint seem to have contemplated only such cases, in which the complainant, or some one under whom he claims, (other than the person in possession,) once had the possession, the restitution of which he prays. This expression only applies to the return of possession from one who received it, or took it, from another, to that other, or to some one claiming under him. It does not, in strictness, apply to a delivery of possession by a vendor to a vendee, or a mortgagor to a mortgagee. Such a delivery could not properly be called a restitution. If this distinction between one entitled in reversion or remainder after a temporary or defeasible estate, and a purchaser from the party in possession, was in the mind of the Legislature, when these clauses were penned, (as I do not think was the fact,) the distinction was completely discarded in the after clauses of the law, which give the summary remedy to any one entitled to the possession, if he pursues it within three years of the period at which his right to possession accrued. The charge to the jury and the prescribed form of the verdict, preclude all other enquiries, but whether the defendant held against the consent of the plaintiff, when he exhibited his complaint; whether he had or had not so held for three years; and whether the plaintiff hath the right of possession; and if the jury find these fact for the plaintiff, which they must do, if they appear, no matter under what circumstances the defendant entered, or when; and no matter how the plaintiff's right of possession arose, the statute peremptorily directs that judgment be given for the plaintiff, not to be restored to the possession of the tenement, but to recover the possession of it; and that a writ of possession, not of restitution, be awarded. Upon such a charge to the jury, which, in effect, stand in the place of an issue between the parties, the question, whether the plaintiff is or is not entitled to the possession, is fully open to all sorts of evidence. But, I do not see that it would be possible for the jury to find against 476 him, if he had a *right to possession, because he had acquired the right in a particular way. A mortgagee, after the mortgage is forfeited, has a right to the possession of the mortgaged premises, and may enter thereon, or maintain an ejectment; and the assertion of this right may be necessary to secure the payment of the debt. The value of the property may not be sufficient to pay the debt, with the accumulated interest during the pendency of an ejectment, or a bill to foreclose, (in which cases arbitrary appeals are permitted,) unless the rents and profits can be reached to keep down the interest; and they cannot be reached in the case of a first mortgagee, (unless under peculiar circumstances,) but by his getting the possession of the land.

The policy of the statute, upon this construction, was strongly objected to, as subjecting the party in a summary way, upon a short notice, and before two Magistrates only, to be turned out of possession; and it was insisted, that being in derogation of the common law, it should be construed strictly. I do not see the force of this objection. The Justices may adjourn from time to time, as the justice of the case may require, so as to enable the party to make a full defence, and to produce all his evidence. The party may have the assistance of counsel, as in any other Court; may save all questions of law by exceptions; and is entitled for any apparent error, to a writ of error or supersedeas, though not to an arbitrary appeal, as in ejectment. He cannot, therefore, be turned out of possession, by any erroneous proceeding. At the same time, he cannot delay the plaintiff in the pursuit of his rights, at pleasure, by arbitrary appeals; nor does this proceeding affect his right in any other controversy on the same subject, in any other form. As, therefore, the defendant can in no case be turned out of possession, unless it is apparent that he ought to surrender the possession of the demand of the plaintiff, and to retain it would be unjust, I cannot see any objection to giving his statute a liberal construction, as a remedial statute, 477 *even if the question under consideration, were, upon the words of the statute, more doubtful than I think it is.

The next enquiry is, whether this proceeding can be maintained by one of several tenants in common. This proceeding involves no question of title. The only question is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to possession as against the defendant. For the purpose of determining his question, the title may be given in evidence. As against all others than his companions, a joint-tenant, tenant in common, or coparcener, is entitled to the possession of the whole. One parcener or tenant in common may enter for all; and if he enters generally, it is in point of law an entry for all. 9 Vin. Abr. 456; Entry, F. pl. 1, 2, 3; and one parcener could, in assise, recover the whole against an abator; for she had right against all who had no right. Ibid. pl. 2, note. So one joint-tenant or tenant in common might maintain a warrant of forcible entry and detainer against his companion. 13 Vin. Abr. 381, pl. 14. In assise for the whole land, if it appear that the plaintiff is entitled to one moiety, and the defendant to the other, the judgment should be only for a moiety. 3 Vin. Abr. 233; B. 6, pl. 1. In a writ of right, and other real actions, the mere right is involved, and the proceeding and recovery must be according to the title; and in ejectment, nothing can be recovered but that for which the lessor of the plaintiff can make a valid lease. One joint tenant, coparcener, or tenant in common, although he has a right to the possession of the whole against strangers, cannot make a valid lease for more than his own part of the land; and therefore, no more can be recovered in ejectment than the part to which the lessor, who is a joint tenant, tenant in common, or parcener, is entitled.

I think, therefore, that one tenant in common can pursue this remedy for the whole land, against any person having no right whatever.

Judgment affirmed.

sale of real property, made by Nelson to the plaintiff. The whole subject is so fully explained in the following opinion, that no other report is necessary.

Scott, for the appellant.
W. F. Wickham, for the appellee.

October 29. JUDGE GREEN.

Nelson, professing to act as attorney in fact for D. Diggs, administrator of A. Smith, sold at public sale a house and lot at York Town. The advertisement exhibited by the crier at the sale, stated that the property belonged to the heirs of Doctor Augustine Smith, and would be sold upon a credit of one, two, and three years; the purchaser giving bond with approved security, and a deed of trust on the property; and that possession would be given on the first day of January then next. Nothing was said as to the time when a conveyance was to be made. The sale was on the 15th of December, 1817. The appellant became the purchaser, and executed his bonds according to the terms of the advertisement. He entered into the possession of the property, and held it until 1821. In the mean time, early in 1819, one of the houses on the lot, 479 *and the most valuable, was consumed by fire. No demand was made by the purchaser for a conveyance, until after this event; and when it was made, it was made upon Nelson, who says that he refused to make a conveyance, having no authority to do so; but informed the appellant that Diggs, the administrator, and his wife, late the widow of Augustine Smith, and such of the children as were of age, would convey as soon as the first payment was made. Thereupon, the appellant, in June, 1819, filed his bill seeking to vacate the contract, and to have the bond surrendered, upon the ground that the vendor, at the time of the sale, had no title; and that in consequence of the infancy of some of the heirs of A. Smith, at the time of the sale, no complete title could be made; and that the impediment still existed as to some of the heirs. The family of A. Smith, (who died intestate,) entitled to this property, were his widow, who intermarried with Diggs, who administered on his estate, and five children, one only of whom was of age when the sale was made. All were made defendants in this cause, by an amended bill. The son of A. Smith, who was of age at the time of the able time to remove it, or acquires his knowledge after his purchase, and acquiesces in the delay, or proceeds with knowledge of the defect, in the execution of the contract, he has no ground of complaint, the principal case is cited in Goddin v. Vaughan, 14 Gratt. 125; Rader v. Neal, 13 W. Va. 388; Johnston v. Jarrett, 14 W. Va. 237; Dodson v. Hays, 29 W. Va. 593, 2 S. E. Rep. 425; in Broyles v. Bee, 18 W. Va. 520, it is said: "It is true, as they claim, that a contract to sell a fee-simple estate implies in the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary, that the estate is unincumbered, and that the vendor has good title, and that there are no incumbrances on the land, that may in any manner embarrass the purchaser in the full and quiet enjoyment of his purchase. Christian v. Cabell, 22 Gratt. 82; Garnett v. Macon, 6 Call 309. But if the vendor does not affect to have a perfect title, and expressly sells such as he has with a special warranty, he is entitled to specific execution without being first required to show a clear title. Bailey v. James, 11 Gratt. 468; Goddin v. Vaughan, 14 Gratt. 124; Vail v. Nelson, 4 Rand. 478; Sutton v. Sutton, 7 Gratt. 234."

sale, answered that the sale was made with his privity and consent; and that he was willing to convey his interest to the purchaser. All the other children answering after they came of age, agree to confirm the sale, and to convey to the purchaser. Two of these did not attain their age until after July, 1821. No written contract was entered into, shewing the terms of the agreement. Nelson filed the power of attorney from Diggs, authorising him to sell the property.

It might be inferred from the advertisement, stating that a deed of trust was to be given by the purchaser, that a good title was to be immediately made to him. The complainant alleges that such were the terms of the sale; and that it was publicly proclaimed, and understood by him and the by-standers generally, that a title would be made to the purchaser, upon the terms of the sale being complied 480 *with; and that, accordingly, upon the execution of the bonds, he demanded a conveyance from Nelson; when, to his astonishment, Nelson told him he was not authorised to make a deed. Two witnesses, Gibbs the crier, and Wynne, state, "that it was understood at the sale, and stated in the advertisement, that when the terms of the sale were complied with, a title would be made." On the other hand, Nelson denies that there was any such stipulation. The advertisement is produced, with a memorandum of the sale, endorsed at the time of the sale, by Gibbs the crier, and proved by him. It is proved, that the advertisement was read by the crier, before the biddings; and there is no stipulation in the advertisement as to the time when the title should be conveyed. Nelson denies that any application was made by complainant for a title, until after the burning of the house in 1819. It is proved, that the purchaser had said that he knew that the title was in part in infants, and could not be conveyed until they came of age; and he entered into the possession, and retained possession of the property for nearly four years, never claiming a conveyance until after the house was burned.

Upon these facts, it is impossible to resist the conclusion, that the purchaser knew perfectly the state of the title, when he purchased, and that no title could be made until the infants came of age; and that he neither demanded nor expected a title to be made until then.

The Chancellor thought that the contract ought to be executed, and decreed accordingly.

How far time is material in a Court of Equity, upon the question of enforcing the execution of a contract, depends upon the particular circumstances of each case, and the conduct of the parties. The authorities upon this subject are collected in Sugden's Law of Vendors and Purchasers; and in the judgment of Chief Justice Marshall in Garnett v. Macon.

481 *In general, the contract will not be enforced by a Court of Equity, if the party asking the execution of the contract has been in default, and the other party will thereby suffer a serious loss, if compelled to carry the contract into effect. But, if the purchaser knew, when he made his contract, that there was a defect in the title, and that it would take a considerable time to remove it, or acquires this knowledge after his purchase, and acquiesces in the delay, or proceeds, with knowledge of the defect, in the execution of the contract; he cannot complain. Pincke v. Curtis, 4 Bro. Ch. Cas. 329.

In this case, the purchaser knew that no conveyance could be immediately made; and that there was no possible means of removing the impediment, but the efflux of time; yet, with this knowledge, he made the purchase, and proceeded to carry it into effect as far as under existing circumstances it could be done. And, indeed, there was no time stipulated for making the conveyance. The fair inference from the whole circumstances of the case, is, that the agreement was that the conveyance by the children should be procured, when they came of age; and if so, then the contract can now be executed literally, according to the intention of the parties.

The principle of the decree of the Court of Chancery is therefore right. But it is erroneous in this, that it dissolves the injunction unconditionally, and directs the defendants to convey to the plaintiff; whereas, the order for dissolving the injunction should have been upon the condition, that the defendants executed a deed to the plaintiff, with general warranty, and filed it, duly authenticated for record, with the clerk of the Court, for the use of the plaintiff. The reservation in the decree is proper.*

482 *The decree should therefore be reversed, and a decree entered according to the foregoing principles; the appellees to recover their costs, being the parties substantially prevailing.

The other Judges concurred.†

Commonwealth v. M'Clanschan's Executors.

October, 1826.

Sale of Real Estate—Defect of Title—Liability of Vendor.—The vendor of real estate is not responsible for any defects of title, unless he has bound himself by some covenant or warranty to protect the vendee, or unless he has been guilty of some fraud or concealment.

Same—Sale by Commonwealth—Caveat Emptor.—When the Commonwealth sells the lands of a public debtor, and the purchaser is afterwards evicted by title paramount, the purchaser has no redress against the Commonwealth: as the law only authorises a sale of all the estate and interest of the debtor. The rule caveat emptor applies in such cases.

*This reservation was, that the defendants should have liberty to apply to the Court for an order directing the sale of the premises, for the payment of the purchase money. If they should be advised so to do.—Note in Original Edition.

†JUDGE CALVERT absent.

Sale of Real Estate—Defect of Title—Liability of Vendor.—In a sale of real estate no warranty of title is implied, and, in the absence of fraud or concealment, by the vendor, he cannot be visited with losses arising from defects of title, except so far as he has bound himself by covenant or warranty to protect his vendee against them. Price v. Ayres, 10 Gratt. 578, citing Com. v. M'Clanschan as its authority. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Johnston v. Mendenhall, 9 W. Va. 119; McFarland v. Douglass, 11 W. Va. 652; Johnston v. Jarrett, 14 W. Va. 236; Worthington v. Staunton, 16 W. Va. 242. The principal case is also cited in Brown v. Armistead, 6 Rand. 602.

The executors of William M'Clanachan, deceased, presented a petition to the Auditor for the sum of $400, with interest thereon from the 10th of May, 1802. The claim was founded on a purchase made by M'Clanachan of a tract of land, sold by the Commonwealth as the property of William O. Winton; but of which land M'Clanachan's representatives had been evicted, and for which they claim of the Commonwealth the purchase money with interest as aforesaid. The Auditor rejected the petition, and the executors obtained an appeal from the Chancellor of the Richmond District.

The circumstances of the case are stated in the following opinion, so far as they are necessary to this report. The material question was, whether the Commonwealth was bound to make a good title to lands sold by her, for a public debt; or in other words, whether she was bound to 483 *make compensation to the purchaser, in case of an eviction by title paramount?

The Chancellor decreed that the Auditor should issue a warrant on the Treasurer for payment to the petitioners of $400 with interest from the 10th day of May, until paid; and the Attorney General, on behalf of the Commonwealth, appealed.

Attorney General, for the appellant, insisted that the rule caveat emptor applied in all cases of the sale of real property, and that unless there was something peculiar in the case of the Commonwealth, the general rule must prevail. Sugd. 346. That the Commonwealth is not bound to warrant the title to a purchaser, is proved by 2 Rev. Code, 52, sec. 12. If it be said that the land sold shall be the debtor's land, the obvious meaning of that expression is, that the land seized in execution shall be sold as the debtor's.

Leigh, for the appellees.

The sheriff conveyed, not Winston's title, but the land itself. The rule caveat emptor does not apply to this case, because the Commonwealth professes, by her deed, to sell the lands of the debtor; and if it should turn out that the land sold was not the debtor's, it follows that the Commonwealth has conveyed, and the purchaser bought, a subject which does not exist.

October 31. JUDGE CARR delivered the opinion of the Court.*

By the laws of Virginia, the land of public defaulters, (against whom the State has obtained judgment,) is subjected to be taken in execution, and sold by the sheriff.

484 *Under this law, an execution issued from the General Court against the lands, &c. of William O. Winton, to the sheriff of Botetourt county. Lands were taken and not sold for want of time. A venditioni exponas followed; and under it the land was sold. Price, the public agent, made the bid; but, permitted M'Clanachan to become the purchaser; who paid the money, and received from the sheriff a deed. The sale took place in May, 1802, and the deed of the sheriff is dated March, 1803. This same land M'Clanachan had sold in 1790, to one Meaux of Kentucky. In 1794, Richard Littlepage, as attorney in fact for Meaux, had sold and conveyed it to William O. Winston and Robert Page; which deed was recorded in the county of Botetourt, the place of M'Clanachan's residence; and at the time of the sale of the land under execution, there was, it seems, a suit depending in the High Court of Chancery by Meaux, to set aside the sale and conveyance by Littlepage to Winston and Page, as fraudulent. In 1823, a decree was given in that suit, pronouncing the sale fraudulent, and decreeing the land to Meaux. Under this decree M'Clanachan's representatives have suffered an eviction; and, on that ground, have petitioned the Auditor for the return of the purchase money, with interest. The petition was refused; an appeal granted by the Chancellor; the cause heard; and a decree against the Commonwealth for the purchase money and interest. We are to enquire, whether this decree be correct.

In every transaction of purchase and sale, it is the contract of the parties which fixes the terms and the responsibility, which shews what the one intended to buy, and the other to sell. Where there is no fraud, the contract is the law of the parties; and no tribunal can change, alter or modify it in any manner. To do so, would be to make contracts for men. When a man buys land, he has, or may and ought to have, all the deeds, the whole chain of title, before him. This title it is his duty to look into and to take such covenants and warranty in his deed, as 485 *will protect him; and where there is no fraud or concealment, he can only look to the covenants and warranty, in case of eviction, and will have no claim, either at law or in equity, further than they give it to him. If he has bought with covenants against the acts of the vendor and his heirs only, and he is evicted by title paramount, he has no claim against the vendor. If he has bought without any covenant at all, he has no claim against any body. It is his folly to have made such a contract; and the law will not give him an action, who has not provided one for himself. The books teem with cases in support of these positions.

In Roswell v. Vaughan, Cro. Jac. 196, it is said, that if a man sell another's estate, without covenant or warranty, it is at the peril of the buyer; because the thing being in the realty, he might have looked into the title.

In Medina v. Stoughton, 1 Salk. 211; Per Lord Holt: "Where the seller (of a personal chattel) is out of possession, there may be room to question his title, and caveat emptor, in such case, to have either an express warranty or a good title. So it is in the case of lands, whether the seller be in or out of possession; for the seller cannot have them without title, and the buyer is, at his peril, to see it."

In Goodittle v. Morgan, 1 Term. Rep. 762; Per Ashhurst, Justice: "No man ought to be so absurd as to make a purchase, without looking at the title deeds; and if he is, he must take the consequence of his own negligence."

In Johnson v. Johnson, 3 Bos. & Pull.

*JUDGE COALTER, absent.

170; Per Lord Alvanley: "Every purchaser may protect his title by proper covenants. Where the vendor's title is actually conveyed to the purchaser, the rule caveat emptor applies."

Hiern v. Miller, 13 Ves. 121: The Lord Chancellor says, "No person in his senses would take an offer of a purchase from a man, merely because he stood upon the ground. It is not even prima facie evidence. He may be tenant by sufferance, or a trespasser. A purchaser must 486 *look to his title; and to neglect it, is crassa negligentia."

In Serjeant Maynard's Case, 2 Freem. 1, the Lord Chancellor said that "there being no fraud or surprise in the case, if the party was not aided by his covenants, he would not be helped in equity;" and yet there, the purchase money had been paid, and a third person had made title.

In Wakeman v. The Dutchess of Rutland, 3 Ves. 234, the Lord Chancellor says. "As to the extent of the covenant, there was a case about three years ago. An estate was bought. As to one moiety, there was a clear defect of title, which the counsel for the purchaser had overlooked. He was evicted of one moiety. He filed a bill, asserting a claim in equity to be re-paid a moiety of the purchase money. He had taken his conveyance with the common covenants. The eviction was not within his covenant. I felt the hardship, but thought I could not raise an equity, where there was no covenant to warrant the title."

Many more cases might be cited; but, perhaps, too much has already been said on a subject so long and so well settled.

Let us now look to the actual covenants in the deed before us. It is made by the sheriff. He sets out the executions under which he sold, and the whole proceeding; conveys the land to M'Clanachan, and concludes thus: and "he the said John Smyth, sheriff as aforesaid, doth by these presents warrant and defend the title to the aforesaid tracts of land, so far as by law he is bound, in his official acts, to warrant and defend the same, to the said William M'Clanachan, his heirs and assigns." In the Rev. Code, vol. 2, p. 52, § 12, it is said, "If the owner of the land, before or at the day of the sale, shall not make payment of the debt due to the public, the sheriff or officer shall proceed to sell the said lands and tenements, or such estate and interest as the party convict shall have therein," &c. In the 17th section of the same law, it is said,

487 *"In all sales of lands, by virtue of any execution, the sheriff or other officer shall convey the same to the purchaser or purchasers, his heirs or assigns, at his costs, by deed in writing, sealed and recorded as the laws direct for other conveyances of land; which deed shall recite the execution, purchase and consideration, and shall be effectual for passing to the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, all the estate and interest which the debtor or the Commonwealth had, and might lawfully part with, in the lands."

Here, then, we see the extent of the sheriff's authority, and the effect and nature of his deed. He is to sell the lands, or such estate and interest as the debtor shall have therein; and his deed shall pass to the purchaser, all the estate and interest which the debtor or the Commonwealth had, and might lawfully part with, in the lands. Surely his warranty could extend to nothing more than he sold and conveyed, the title of the debtor. It was the business of every one who meant to buy, to inspect the title deeds, and discover what that title was. It was never intended that the Commonwealth should be involved in controversies as to the title of her debtors' lands, sold under her execution. She sold their interest merely. The price would be more or less, as that interest should appear great or small, clear or doubtful. Every one was fairly put upon the examination of title. With M'Clanachan, this must have been an easy matter. He had sold the land to Meaux. The deed from the attorney in fact of Meaux, was recorded in his own county. The suit brought by Meaux to set aside the sale, was depending. With these facts, it was his business to be acquainted; and that he was so, there is every reason to believe, from the very small price of the land, compared with the former sales. He probably weighed the chances, and was willing to incur the risque, for the prospect of the gain. The hazard was a fair one; and if the result has disappointed his hope, he has no right to complain. He accepted the deed and paid the money, thereby executing the contract. By the covenants 488 *in the deed alone, can his right to redress be tested. No covenant in that deed has been broken, and he has no claim on the Commonwealth.

Decree reversed, and petition dismissed.

Misjoinder of Issue—Effect of Verdict.—The misjoinder of an issue is not fatal after a verdict, and it being stated in the record that issue was joined.

*For monographic note on Bill of Particulars, see end of case.

Misjoinder of Issue—Effect of Verdict.—In Huffman v. Alderson, 9 W. Va. 684, it is said: "The Virginia cases formerly held, that when there was a special replication containing new matter, there can be no issue thereon without a rejoinder, and that this objection is not obviated by the statement in the record, that the jury were sworn to try the issue, or rendered a verdict on the issues joined; but it was held otherwise in a more recent case of Moore v. Mauro, 4 Rand. 488, and this decision was approved in Southside R. Co. v. Daniel, 20 Gratt. 360. In that case, as in this, the record showed no issue made upon the special plea; one had been made upon the general issue, and the jury were sworn to try the issue, but, in their verdict, they state that they find for the plaintiffs on the issues joined. The court held that this was a misjoining of issue, cured by the statute of Jeoffails." And in Henry v. Ohio River R. Co., 40 W. Va. 239, 21 S. E. Rep. 885, it is said: "Some cases hold that even where there is a statement that issue is joined, though there is none that the plea or other pleading was filed, there is still no issue, and the defect is fatal. Wilkinson v. Bennett, 8 Munf. 314; Stevens v. Tallafarro, 1 Wash. 194; Lockridge v. Carlisle, 6 Rand. 20. Others hold, not that there is an issue in such case, but that it is merely misjoinder, and cured by statute of Jeoffails after verdict. Moore v. Mauro, 4 Rand. 488; Huffman v. Alderson, 9 W. Va. 616; Railroad Co. v. Daniel, 20 Gratt. 344. There is conflict in these cases. See 1 Bart. Law Prac. 482."

On this point the principal case is also cited in foot-note to Stevens v. Tallafarro, 1 Wash. 155; foot-note to Walden v. Payne, 2 Wash. 1; Southside R.

Statute of Limitations—Saving—Application of.—The saving in the 4th section of the Act of limitations, (1 Rev. Code, 488,) applies to the 7th section of the same Act; by which, an action between merchant and merchant is neither barred by one year, nor five years.

Statute—Proceedings in Civil Suit—Sufficiency of Account.—Under the 86th section of the Act concerning proceedings in civil suits, &c. (1 Rev. Code, 510,) an account filed in an action of indebitatus assumpsit, which gives notice of the character of a claim is sufficient, although it may be made up of various items of which no notice is given.

Assumpsit was brought in the Superior Court of Law for the county of Harrison, by Jonathan Mauro against Richard W. Moore. The declaration contained several counts. The first was indebitatus assumpsit "for divers goods, wares and merchandize," sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant. The second was on a quantum meruit. The third, on a quantum valebant. Another count was on an inisimul computassent.

The plaintiff filed two accounts with his declaration, stating the various items on which the claim arose.

The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and a special plea stating, that the action was founded on an account for goods, wares and merchandize sold and delivered, and that the said supposed causes of action did not accrue within one year next before the commencement of the action; and concludes with a verification.

489 *The plaintiff joined issue on the first plea; and to the special plea, he replied that at the time of the said sale of the goods, wares and merchandize aforesaid, he the plaintiff and the defendant were merchants, and the goods, &c. were sold and delivered by the plaintiff as such merchant, to the defendant as such merchant; and this he is ready to verify.

There is no rejoinder to this replication; but the record states that "issue is thereon joined."

The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, and judgment was given accordingly.

At the trial, the defendant filed a bill of exceptions, stating, that the plaintiff introduced two accounts, (which are the accounts filed with the declaration:) that he also introduced a witness to prove that the defendant had bought of him (the plaintiff,) on credit, sundry articles of groceries, and other different articles of merchandize, besides the coffee mentioned in the said accounts; which evidence the plaintiff offered under that part of one of the accounts, which charges the defendant with merchandize per bill, due 10th July, 1819, $480 60. The defendant objected to this evidence, but the objection was over-ruled; and the plaintiff was permitted to prove by the witness, under the charge aforesaid, that the plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant, on the day in the account mentioned, to the amount of the said sum of $480 60, and delivered therewith a bill of the particular merchandize, with the prices, to the defendant, other than the three bags of coffee charged in the same account as of the 22d of May, 1819. To this opinion, the defendant excepted.

The defendant appealed.

Wickham, for the appellant.

No Counsel, for the appellee.

The points made at the bar are fully stated in the opinion of the Court.
490 *November 1. The PRESIDENT delivered the opinion of the Court.||

This is an action of assumpsit for goods, wares and merchandize, sold and delivered. There are several counts in the declaration, and two accounts filed with it, in pursuance of the 86th section of the Act for limitation of actions, &c. 1 Rev. Code, 510. The defendant pleaded two pleas; non assumpsit, on which issue was joined; and also that the cause of action, for goods sold and delivered, did not accrue within one year next, &c.; to which the plaintiff replied, that at the time of the sale and delivery of the goods, &c. in the declaration mentioned, the plaintiff and defendant were merchants, and that the said goods, &c. were sold, &c. by the plaintiff as such merchant, and bought, &c. by the defendant as such merchant; on which, though there is no rejoinder in the record, it is stated that issue was joined, and a general verdict. At the trial, a bill of exceptions was filed, setting forth that the plaintiff offered two accounts, those filed with the declaration; and introduced a witness to prove, that the defendant bought of him sundry goods, included in the item dated 1819, April 10th, merchandise per bill, three months due, 10th of July, 1819, $480 60; and that a bill of particulars was delivered to the defendant with the articles; which proof was admitted by the Court to go to the jury.

Several objections were taken by the counsel for the defendant. The first was to the misjoining of the issue upon the plea of the act of limitations; there being no rejoinder to the replication. But that objection was admitted to be obviated by the act of Jeofails, it being stated in the record that issue was joined on it.

The next objection was to the replication itself, on the supposed ground that the saving in the 4th section of the act of limitations, (1 Rev. Code, 488,) does 491 not apply to the *7th section of the same act, which enacts, that actions founded on any account for goods, and on any article charged in a store account, shall be commenced, &c. within one year next, &c. and not after; but that it applies to the limitation of five years in the 4th section only.

It would be strange indeed, if this construction was to prevail; if an action of indebitatus assumpsit between merchant and merchant, is not to be barred by the saving in the act after five years, but is to be barred before, that is, after one year. This objection was not well considered, or it would not have been made. In Tomlin,

*Statute of Limitations.—See monographic note on "Limitation of Actions" appended to Herrington v. Harkins, 1 Rob. 691.

The principal case is cited on this subject in Wortham v. Smith, 15 Gratt. 493, 494. See principal case also cited in Campbell v. Angus, 91 Va. 441, 22 S. E. Rep. 167.

†Account.—Sufficiency.—See principal case cited with approval in Fitch v. Leitch, 11 Leigh 475.

&c. v. Kelly, 1 Wash. 190, it was decided by this Court, that the act of 1799 applied only to the store accounts of retail dealers.

A further objection to the replication was, that it applies as well to the insimul computassent charged in the declaration, as to the counts for goods, &c. sold and delivered; and the case of Webber v. Tivill, 2 Saund. 121, was relied on. But it has no application. In that case, the plea and replication were general, and applied to the insimul computassent as well as to the indebitatus assumpsit for goods, wares, &c. charged in the declaration. In this case, the plea expressly applies to the counts for goods, wares and merchandize only, and not to the insimul computassent. As to that count, the issue was joined on the plea of non assumpsit. But, if otherwise, in the case of Webber v. Tivill, there was a demurrer to the replication; in the case before the Court, issue was joined, on which there was a general verdict; after which no objection can be taken, either of form or substance, which might have been taken advantage of by a demurrer, and which shall not have been so taken advantage of. 1 Rev. Code, 512, sec. 103.

The last objection was to the admission of the proof set out in the bill of exceptions. The 86th section of the act aforesaid enacts, that in every action of indebitatus assumpsit, the plaintiff shall file with his declaration, an account stating distinctly the several items of his claim against the defendant; and that on failure thereof, he shall not be entitled to prove before the jury any item which is not so plainly and particularly described in the declaration, as to give the defendant full notice of the character thereof. The object of this section was to give the defendant full notice of any claim which might be insisted on before the jury, under the general counts in the declaration. The words of the section are, "full notice of the character thereof;" that is, whether the claim was for goods, wares and merchandize, for money laid out, &c. for money received to the use of the plaintiff, &c. &c. The item in the account, which is objected to, certainly gave this notice; and though upon the evidence to the jury, it was made up of many articles, the character of the claim is sufficiently designated; and the proof that the articles included in it were sold and delivered to the defendant by the plaintiff, was properly admitted by the Court to the jury.

The judgment is therefore to be affirmed.

Assumpsit, appended to Kennaird v. Jones, 9 Gratt. 183.

I. OFFICE OF THE BILL.

The office of a bill of particulars is not to set forth matters of evidence, but to inform the opposite party of the cause of action to be relied on at the trial, and which is not plainly set out in the pleadings. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Payne, 86 Va. 483, 10 S. E. Rep. 749.

And in Columbia Accident Ass'n v. Rockey, 93 Va. 678, 26 S. E. Rep. 1009, it is said that, the object of a bill of particulars is to give the opposing party more definite information of the character of the claim or defense than is generally disclosed by the declaration, notice or plea, and to prevent surprise. See Campbell Co. v. Angus Co., 91 Va. 438, 23 S. E. Rep. 167; Am. Hide & Leather Co. v. Chalkley (Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 706.

But a statement of the particulars cannot be required when the declaration sets out the grounds of action and particulars of claim, with sufficient definiteness to give the defendant notice thereof. It can be demanded only where the declaration is, allowably under the law, so general as not to apprise the defendant of the real cause of action. Clarke v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 732, 30 S. E. Rep. 696.

II. WHEN DEMANDED.

The object of a bill of particulars being to advise the defendant of the precise nature and extent of the demand against him, the usual and better practice is, to demand such bill before pleading to the merits. Am. Hide & Leather Co. v. Chalkley (Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 706.

III. ITS EFFECT.

If a declaration in assumpsit be filed against two defendants jointly containing the common counts, and a bill of particulars be filed purporting to be an account against both defendants jointly, but on the trial of the case on the plea of non assumpsit, the evidence shows only a part of the items in the bill of particulars are charged against the two defendants jointly, and that the other items are charged against one of the defendants individually, the jury can only find a verdict on the items in the account, which are charges against the two defendants jointly, and can render no verdict against one of the defendants severally on the items of the account, which are charges against him severally. Enos v. Stansbury, 18 W. Va. 477.

IV. WHEN ORDERED.

A. IN DISCRETION OF COURT.—It is, ordinarily, within the discretion of the court to order a bill of particulars, yet, the power is much less frequently exercised in actions of tort than in actions ex contractu, as the general rule in tort is, that if a pleading is not sufficiently specific the remedy is by demurrer. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Payne, 86 Va. 483, 10 S. E. Rep. 749.

1. WHEN, AND WHEN NOT, NECESSARY.—The common law principle that in an action of assumpsit, under the general issue, a general payment before suit brought may be proved without a bill of particulars, prevails in this state; but, if payment after suit brought is relied on, it must be pleaded; if a general payment, it may be proved without a bill of particulars, and, if specific, or partial, payments are relied on, they must be specified in a bill of particulars. Shanklin v. Crisamore, 4 W. Va. 136.

2. IN SUIT FOR RENT.—In a suit for rent due, the defendant may, at the trial, prove and have allowed against any such debt any payment or set-off which is so described in his plea, or in an account filed therewith as to give the plaintiff notice of its nature, but not otherwise. Arnold v. Cole, 42 W. Va. 663, 26 S. E. Rep. 813.

3. TO PUT ADVERSE PARTY ON NOTICE.—Where the pleading is allowably, under the law of pleading, general, so as not to fairly apprise the adverse party of what he has to meet, a bill of particulars may be demanded to amplify the pleadings, so as to more minutely specify the claim or defense and prevent surprise on the trial, but no call for a bill of particulars of evidence can be made. W. Va. Trans. Co. v. Standard Oil Co., 50 W. Va. 611, 40 S. E. Rep. 596.

4. SHALL BE FILED IN INDEBITATUS ASSUMPSIT.—In every action of indebitatus assumpsit the plaintiff shall file with his declaration an account, stating distinctly the several items of his claim against the defendant, and on failure thereof he shall not prove any item not so plainly and particularly described in his declaration as to give defendant full notice of its character. Fitch v. Leitch, 11 Leigh 473.

5. IN ACTIONS OTHER THAN ASSUMPSIT.—In actions other than assumpsit the plaintiff should be required to give the defendant full notice of the subject or character of his claim, and, if the declaration fails to do this, the plaintiff should, if called upon, file such statement of particulars as will put defendant upon notice. City of Richmond v. Leaker, 90 Va. 7, 37 S. E. Rep. 349.

6. WHERE NO SPECIFIC PAYMENT RELIED ON.—Where the defendant relies upon a specific payment or set-off by way of discount against a debt, an account stating distinctly the nature of such payment or set-off and the several items thereof, must be filed with the plea, though the defendant may rely upon the parol admissions of the plaintiff to prove such payment. But this is not necessary where no specific payment is relied on. Rice v. Annatt, 8 Gratt. 567.

7. IN ACTIONS FOR PERSONAL INJURIES.—In actions to recover damages for personal injury to plaintiff, resulting from failure on the part of defendant to furnish proper tools to do the work assigned, where the declaration avers it was the duty of defendant to furnish "suitable and reasonable tools," etc., "then well known to defendant and possessed and kept by it," with which to do the work, it is not necessary to furnish a bill of particulars thereof. Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. Rep. 509.

V. REQUISITES.

A. GENERALLY.—A bill of particulars should contain the grounds of action not evidence. Clarke v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 732, 30 S. E. Rep. 666.

And, in an action of assumpsit, if the plaintiff serves on the defendant a copy of the account sued on, it must be intelligible, and such as to inform him of the precise nature of the claim, and its extent. Burwell v. Burgess, 33 Gratt. 472. See Johnson v. Fry, 88 Va. 668, 12 S. E. Rep. 973; Fitch v. Leitch, 11 Leigh 475; Moore v. Mauro, 4 Rand. 488.

B. WHEN SUFFICIENT.

1. ACCOUNT OF STATEMENT RENDERED.—Where plaintiff in assumpsit filed with his declaration an account in these words, "1883, Jan'y 1. To balance due per account rendered, $1406.07." It was held a sufficient specification of plaintiff's claim. Fitch v. Leitch, 11 Leigh 471.

2. IF NOTICE OF SOME ITEMS NOT GIVEN.—An account filed in an action of indebitatus assumpsit which gives notice of the character of a claim is sufficient, although it may be made up of various items of which no notice is given. Moore v. Mauros, 4 Rand. 488. And see Fitch v. Leitch, 11 Leigh 474.

3. WHEN ACCOUNT NOT DATED.—When declaration in assumpsit states the date of the account filed, but which account was not dated, it was sufficient, it being presented as a debt due at the date of the suit. Kenefick v. Caulfield, 88 Va. 123, 13 S. E. Rep. 348.

4. ACCOUNT OF "PER ACCOUNT RENDERED," WITH PROOF.—An account filed with the declaration in assumpsit for goods sold, charging goods sold "per account rendered," with proof that the account was rendered, is sufficient. Robinson v. Burks, 13 Leigh 378.

5. FILING NOTE.—In an action of assumpsit, defendant pleads non assumpsit, and, with it, files affidavit of set off, and the set off, which is a note. This is a substantial compliance with the statute, the record showing that plaintiff had full notice of the character of the set off, and that he was not taken by surprise. Bell v. Crawford, 8 Gratt. 133.

C. WHEN NOT SUFFICIENT.

1. WHEN ITEMS NOT PLAINLY MENTIONED.—Where the declaration does not plainly describe the items, and the account filed therewith merely mentions the sums paid, without any information about them, the account is not sufficient. Johnson v. Fry, 88 Va. 668, 12 S. E. Rep. 973. See Burwell v. Burgess, 32 Gratt. 472.

2. ON DEMAND FOR STORE ACCOUNT, NOTE FILED.—An account, stating the several items of the claim in every action of assumpsit is required to be filed, and, if a bill of particulars is filed specifying only a note and no other claim, proof will not be received of any demand for a store account. Walsh v. Schilling, 33 W. Va. 106, 10 S. E. Rep. 55.

3. NOT PROPERLY DESIGNATING CREDITOR.—In an action of assumpsit by an administrator, the count is for money had and received, and the bill of particulars merely states an account in which the defendant is debtor to the administrator for a stated sum of money received. The count and the bill of particulars are not sufficient to admit of proof of an admission by the defendant that he had received from a third person certain money belonging to the estate of plaintiff's intestate. Minor v. Minor, 8 Gratt. 1. See Mann v. Perry, 3 W. Va. 581.

VI. AMENDMENTS.

A. WHEN ALLOWED.—If substantial justice require that the plaintiff be allowed to amend his bill of particulars, and if it be clear that such amendment cannot operate a surprise to the defendant, the cause ought not to be continued because of such amendment. Anderson v. Kanawha Coal Co., 12 W. Va. 534.

VII. OBJECTIONS TO.

A. GENERAL RULE.

1. DEMURRER INEFFECTUAL.—The bill of particulars is not a part of the pleading so as to be reached by demurrer. Clarke v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 782, 20 S. E. Rep. 696. See Abell v. P. M. Life Ins. Co., 18 W. Va. 400; Riley v. Jarvis, 43 W. Va. 43, 26 S. E. Rep. 366.

And so it was held in Booker v. Donohoe, 95 Va. 362, 38 S. E. Rep. 584, that, the account which the statute requires to be filed with an action of assumpsit, setting forth the items of the plaintiff's claim, is not a part of the declaration, so as to be subject to demurrer. See Campbell v. Angus, 91 Va. 438, 22 S. E. Rep. 167. Overruling Wright v. Smith, 81 Va. 779. See also, King v. N. & W. R. Co., 99 Va. 626, 39 S. E. Rep. 701; Sheppard v. Peabody Ins. Co., 31 W. Va. 368; Columbia Accident Ass'n v. Rockey, 93 Va. 683, 25 S. E. Rep. 1009.

B. EXCEPTION.—But the rule is otherwise, where the parties agree in writing that the case made by the declaration may be supplemented by the bill of particulars. King v. N. & W. R. Co., 99 Va. 625, 39 S. E. Rep. 701.

C. MUST BE RAISED IN TRIAL COURT.—In action for damages, defendant's motion that plaintiff be required to file bill of particulars is denied, but at the next term it is allowed, and plaintiff files bill, and trial proceeds without defendant asking for time to consider his defense. He cannot raise the objection in the appellate court. Cent. Lun. Asylum v. Flanagan, 80 Va. 114.

And in Varner v. Core, 20 W. Va. 479, it was held, that, if defendant fails, during trial, to ask the court to require plaintiff to file a statement setting out his objections to the settlement in controversy, he cannot be heard to complain in the appellate court.

493 Straughan & Others v. Wright & Others.

November, 1836.

Chancery Practice—Partition—When a Matter of Right.—A bill in equity for partition is a matter of right, if the title of the plaintiff is admitted or clear; but, if that be denied, and it depends on doubtful facts, or questions of law, a Court of Equity will either dismiss the bill, or retain it until the right is decided at law.

Same—Same—Twenty Years Adverse Possession.—In questions purely equitable, twenty years adverse possession will bar the remedy of the plaintiff; but, where the Court is only called upon to grant partition under a legal title, which is disputed, the proper course is to retain the cause until the title is decided at law.

Same—Assistance to Assert Legal Title.—Quære, whether a Court of Equity would refuse to assist a party to assert a legal title, when the right of entry is barred by twenty years adverse possession, by removing impediments to a fair trial at law?

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Fredericksburg, where William Wright and others filed their bill against Richard Wright and others, praying partition of a tract of land. The facts are set forth at large in the following opinion:

Stanard, for the appellants.

J. Mayo, for the appellees.

November 2. JUDGE GREEN delivered his opinion, in which the other Judges concurred.†

Richard Wright, by his will dated in 1740, devised to his son Francis, a tract of land in Lower Machodick, which had been given to the testator by his brother John Wright, and also, after the death of his wife, the tract of land on which the testator lived, to him and his heirs forever. Francis Wright was then, as appears by the will, under the age of eighteen. Francis made his will in December, 1775, and died before the 26th of March, 1776. By this will, he directed that the land he had purchased of John Rust, should be sold for the payment of his debts, and the

494 *surplus proceeds of the sale equally divided between his three sons, Benedict Wright, Johnson Wigginton Wright, and Wright Wright. (The testator had no son named Wright Wright, and no attempt is made to shew which of the sons was intended by this name.) He also gave to his wife the dwelling-house and one-third of the land adjoining it, for life; and also, one-third of his personal estate, for life; and after her death, to be equally divided amongst all his children; and directed that all the rest of his estate should be equally divided amongst all his children. On the 26th of March, 1776, the will was proved by three witnesses. The executors qualified; and John Rochester, who was chosen guardian of Presley Wright, the heir at law of Francis Wright, was directed to be summoned to contest the recording of the will. No step was taken on this order, so far as appears. But, on the 26th of March, 1793, the Court in which the will was recorded, made an order in these words: "On the motion of Francis Wright, it is ordered that this will be recorded, the heir at law consenting thereto." On the 13th of November, 1753, Gerard Davis and Thomas M'Farlane and Elizabeth his wife, conveyed 123 acres of land to Francis Wright, which does not appear to have lain adjoining any other land held by Francis Wright. Francis Wright left five children living at the time of his death, Presley, (the eldest son, and heir at law,) Benedict, William, Nancy, and Johnson W. Wright. Such of those children as were alive, and the representatives of one who was dead, filed their bill on the 12th of July, 1820, against the heirs of Presley Wright, who died in 1810, intestate; and afterwards against the purchasers claiming under some of the heirs of Presley Wright, claiming a partition of a tract of land described as containing acres, of which Francis Wright died seized and possessed, and which he was entitled to under the will of Richard Wright. They charge that soon after the death of Francis Wright, Presley Wright entered upon the whole of the said

495 tract of *land, and received the rents and profits thereof during his life, and that his heirs, and those claiming under them, have received the rents and profits since his death.

The answer of some of the defendants seems to consider the claim of the plaintiffs as applying to the tract of land of 123 acres, before mentioned, purchased by Francis Wright from Gerard Davis and others. These defendants rely upon the uninterrupted possession of the land mentioned in the bill, by Presley Wright, and those claiming under him, from the death of Francis Wright, until the exhibition of the bill, (a period of forty-five years,) without any claim set up, or made known, to the persons in possession, by the complainants, or those under whom some of them claim. They contest the sufficiency of the proof of the will, and state that the clerk's office of Westmoreland county, (in which the land lies,) was burnt, with many of its records; but at what time it was burned, they state that they know not. All the defendants who answered, contested the right of the plaintiff to any part of the land. The delay on the part of the plaintiffs to assert their title, is not attempted to be accounted for. The depositions of the witnesses are unimportant, and are not evidence against one of the parties, a purchaser of a moiety of the land, who was not made a party to the cause until after all the depositions were taken.

The Court of Chancery decreed partition according to the prayer of the bill; describing the land so to be divided as the tract of land mentioned in the bill.

The difficulties which present themselves, in the prosecution of writs of partition at law, have induced the Courts of Equity, upon one of their general principles, to assume a jurisdiction to decree partition; and it is now considered that an application to a Court of Equity for that purpose, is not addressed to the discretion of the Court, but is a matter of right if the title of the plaintiff is admitted or clear. But, if that be denied, and it depends on doubtful facts, or on doubtful questions of law, a Court of 496 Equity *will either dismiss the bill as unfit for its jurisdiction, or, retaining the bill, refuse relief until the plaintiff shall have established his right at law. If the Court of Equity should undertake to decide upon the validity of the plaintiff's title in either of these cases, they would, in the one case, invade the province of a jury, and in the other, of a Court of Law; and in either case, violate the rule that equity cannot take jurisdiction of questions involving the legal title to lands; especially when the title can be asserted without any impediment in a Court of Law. Agar v. Fairfax, 17 Ves. 552. Calmady v. Calmady, 2 Ves. jr. 570. Baring v. Nash, 1 Ves. & Beam. 556. Cartwright v. Pulteney, 2 Atk. 380. Wilkin v. Wilkin, 1 Johns. Ch. Cas. Phips v. Green, 3 Johns. Ch. Cas. 300. Wiseley v. Findlay, 3 Rand. 361.

In this case, the validity of the probat of the will, under which the plaintiffs claim, is contested. There is no proof of the execution of the will, so as to pass real property, but the order of Court in 1793, ordering the will to be recorded, upon the motion of Francis Wright, (who does not appear, from any thing in the record, to have had any interest in the will;) and with the consent of the heir, who is not named in the order; and the order of Court in 1776, stating that the will was proved by three witnesses, and directing the heir at law, by name, to be summoned to contest the will by his guardian; an order upon which no further proceedings appear to have been had. Whether these orders were sufficient proofs of the due execution of the will to pass real estate, was a question emphatically proper for a Court of Law.

The defendants also rely upon an adversary possession of upward of forty-five years. Whether this possession was adversary or not, was proper for the decision of a jury in an action at law; and if adversary, whether the right of the plaintiffs was or was not barred by the statute of limitations, presented many questions purely legal, and involved other questions of fact, particularly as to the ages of the children of the testator, which do not appear in the record.

497 *The defendants rely upon the presumptions arising from the great lapse of time, connected with the other circumstances of the case, as a bar to the plaintiffs' demand, independent of the statute of limitations; either that Presley Wright, under whom they claim, had some title paramount the will of his father, or that satisfaction had been made to the plaintiffs in the assignment of other portions of the estate of the testator to them, or otherwise. These also were questions proper to be discussed and settled only in a Court of Law. The Court of Chancery should not have undertaken to settle the question of title, depending upon such and so many questions of law and fact; but should have left the plaintiffs to assert their title at law.

The decree must therefore be reversed; and the only question which remains, is, whether the bill should be dismissed or retained for a reasonable time, to enable the plaintiffs to establish their title at law if they can, and to allow them, in that event, to resort again to the Court of Chancery, for a decree for partition in this suit? The defendants insist that the bill should be dismissed, because as they allege, a Court of Equity will not assist a party after an adverse possession of twenty years, which would be sufficient to bar an ejectment at law. This is certainly now the settled rule, when the plaintiff asserts a purely equitable title, upon which, if it were a legal title, the right of entry at law would be barred. This is established by the cases of Cholmondely v. Clinton, 2 Jac. & Walk. 138; and Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. 152, cited in the argument of this case. Whether a Court of Equity would refuse to assist a party to assert a legal title, when the right of entry was barred by twenty years adversary possession, by removing impediments to a fair trial at law, it is unnecessary to determine. In this case, the plaintiffs claim partition under a legal title. They ask no assistance of the Court to enable them to assert that title; nor can we say confidently on the matter in this record, that their right of entry was barred by an adverse possession of twenty 498 years, under *such circumstances as would constitute a bar to an action of ejectment at law, or that they would be barred of their writ of right. If the Court of Equity refused to entertain the bill for partition, they might still sue for their undivided portion of the property by ejectment or writ of right; and if they recovered and were put into possession, according to the judgment, the Court of Equity could not then refuse a decree for partition, whether the recovery was in ejectment or in a writ of right.

I think, therefore, that the bill should be retained a reasonable time, to be fixed by the Court of Chancery, that the plaintiffs may prosecute such action at law as they may be advised to institute, for the establishment of their title, with liberty to the plaintiffs, if they should succeed at law, to resort to the Court of Chancery for a decree for partition in this suit.

Gilliam v. Allen.

November, 1826.

Bail—Advantage Gained by Plaintiff against.—It is a general rule, liable to very few exceptions, that no tribunal can take from a plaintiff a legal advantage which he has gained against bail, if such advantage happens, without any participation or agency of the plaintiff.

Special bail—Entry at Clerk's Table—When Allowable.—Special bail cannot be entered at the clerk's table, unless it is directed by the Court, or assented to by the plaintiff's counsel; even where the appearance bail is offered as special bail.

This was a bill filed by R. C. Gilliam in the Richmond Chancery Court, against William F. Allen. The bill states that Gilliam was appearance bail for Reuben Johnson, in a suit brought by Allen, assignee of J. I. Johnson, and that a judgment was obtained against him by the misprision of the clerk, in not having entered him special bail, *when he had taken the proper steps to have the entry made. An injunction was prayed for and obtained.

The answer of the defendant denies that the plaintiff ever did enter himself special bail, or ever directed it to be done.

It appeared by the record in the common law suit, that a plea was entered for the appearance bail, and a verdict rendered on that plea. It also appeared that another person was appearance bail together with Gilliam.

The deputy clerk of the Superior Court deposed, that no special bail was entered in the suit in question; and that he has no recollection that any directions were given to that effect: that if such directions had been given at a proper time, he thinks they would have been attended to, &c.

Reuben Johnson proved, that he went with Gilliam to the Court, for the purpose of the said Gilliam entering himself special bail: that they went to the clerk's table, and informed the deputy clerk of their business, who answered that it should be attended to.

The injunction was dissolved by the Chancellor; and a motion to reinstate being refused by him, it was reinstated by the Court of Appeals. The injunction was dissolved and the bill dismissed on a hearing.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed.

M. Robinson and S. Taylor, for the appellant.

Daniel, for the appellee.

November 2. JUDGE CARR, delivered his opinion.

The bill in this case seems to have been carelessly and inaccurately drawn. It states, that Allen had gotten a judgment at law, against Reuben Johnson and Gilliam, his appearance bail; whereas the judgment, as the record shews, was against R. Johnson and John I. Johnson and R. C. Gilliam, sureties for the defendant's appearance.

500 *This will be found a difference not without its influence on the case.

Again. The plaintiff Gilliam states, that he did enter himself at the proper period as special bail, in Court, when in session; and that the judgment against him is a misprision of the clerk. The record shews, that the suit was tried on a plea for the appearance bail; and the clerk swears, that there is no entry of special bail on the record. Indeed the evidence adduced by the plaintiff Gilliam, is not to prove (as stated in his bill,) that he did enter himself special bail; but that he told the clerk to enter him. These, I have no doubt, are inaccuracies resulting from carelessness and not design.

Upon the case made by the record, I do not think equity can interfere, without overstepping the proper line of its jurisdiction, and doing much mischief. The laws of the land give the plaintiff a right in his suit at law, to require bail in such actions as this; and by the regular operation of law, unless the bail takes the proper steps to relieve himself, he becomes bound for the debt. If this happens without any agency or participation of the plaintiff, I hold it to be the general rule, liable to very few exceptions, that no tribunal has a right to take from him his advantage; and this has been the language of this Court.

In Croughton v. Duval, 3 Call, 69, they say that though sureties are favoured in equity, fair creditors are favourites also, and will not be deprived of their legal rights without some fraud or neglect. Here the creditor has gotten a legal right, without the least shadow of fraud; and as to negligence, it is all on the other side.

In Anderson v. Anderson, 2 Call, 198, a marriage settlement was not recorded, and equity was asked to interfere, upon the ground that the failure to record was through the fraud of the husband, and ought not to prejudice the rights of the feme covert. The Court said, that equity would not interpose in such a case, though the recording were prevented by accident, or unavoidable necessity, or even fraud, if the creditors were neither parties nor 501 privies *to the fraud. And this is the true equitable doctrine, to be traced through the whole system. Unless you can attach some equity upon the conscience of a party, you never can take from him a legal advantage. A. sells land to B. for $10,000, who pays down the whole sum. Equity would compel a conveyance. But, if A. should sell this land to C. who should pay the purchase money and receive a deed, before notice of B's equity, C. will hold the land; because he has the advantage of the law, and you can attach no equity upon his conscience; he has done nothing unfair. Even in relieving against forfeitures and penalties, equity requires that the accident which incurred them, should have been unavoidable, and mingled with no neglect of the party; and that the case should lie completely in compensation:

that the Court should be able to place the parties precisely where they stood before the accident. Here the accident was neither unavoidable, nor can you replace the parties. To replace them, the Court would have to set aside the judgment, and reinstate the cause upon the law docket, just as it stood before the office-judgment was set aside. Can the Court do this? We have laid it down in many cases, that this Court cannot correct the errors of Courts of Law. Much less, I presume, can we set aside their judgments in this way. But, if the Court could do this, can it call back time? And do we not know that a man who was perfectly good five years past, may be insolvent now? The only way in which the Court could interfere, I apprehend, would be by injoining the judgment as to the bail; and this unquestionably would not replace the parties where they stood.

But, the bail here has been guilty of negligence. Taking his evidence in its utmost latitude, and giving it full faith and credit, it proves only this: that Gilliam went to the clerk's table, during the session of the Court, and told the clerk that he had come for the purpose of entering himself special bail in the suit of

Allen v. Johnson, and the clerk said it should be attended to. Now, this was

502 no entry of "bail. But it was said, that it was all that the plaintiff was bound to do; because, being appearance bail, he had a right to enter himself special bail, without a motion to the Court. To this position, I can by no means assent. The requiring and receiving bail, is a judicial act. The clerk has no power to make the entry, unless directed by the Court, or assented to by the plaintiff's counsel. "Every judgment," (says the law) "entered in the office against defendant and bail, or defendant and sheriff, shall be set aside, if the defendant, &c. shall be allowed to appear without bail, put in good bail being ruled so to do, or surrender himself in custody, and plead to issue immediately." Again, "If the defendant shall fail to appear, or shall not give special bail, being ruled thereto by the Court, the bail for appearance may defend," &c. These clauses shew, that it is the Court, and not the clerk, who are to act in this matter. The mere entry of special bail, though the defendant immediately confess judgment, discharges the common bail; and that, whether the common bail enter himself special bail, or some other person be entered. (See Grays v. Hines, 4 Munf. 437. Fisher v. Riddle, 1 Hen. & Munf. 330.) Could it be supposed that the clerk, without the interference of the Court, would have power to take a step which operated so materially on the interest of the plaintiff? In Bartle v. Coleman, 6 Wheat. 475, Ch. J. Marshall, speaking of our decisions on this subject, says, "It has not only been determined that the defendant may enter special bail and defend the suit, at any time before final judgment, but also, that if he appears and pleads without giving special bail, or appears and confesses judgment, the appearance bail is discharged. It is also (he adds,) well known to be the settled practice of Virginia, if special bail be given, to discharge the appearance bail, although the defendant should not appear, but the judgment should become final, either on his default or on the execution of the writ of enquiry."

I hold it most clear, therefore, that in no case can the clerk, of his own 503 mere motion, receive "special bail.

I have thought it well to observe thus much, because it was said at the bar to be the practice in the country for common bail to be entered special bail, without a motion to the Court; a practice, (as it was also said,) growing out of the case of Dunlops v. Laporte, 1 Hen. & Munf. 22. That was a motion in open Court for a supersedeas. One of the objections taken, was, that the appearance bail was permitted to be entered special bail, without proof of his sufficiency, though the plaintiff objected; the Court below over-ruling the objection, on the ground that the plaintiff not having excepted to him as appearance bail, had admitted his goodness. The supersedeas was refused by this Court "without difficulty," as the Reporter states; but the Court do not state their reasons. It seems a necessary consequence of their refusal, however, that they considered a failure to except to appearance bail, an admission of his sufficiency; at least so far as to relieve the party offering him as special bail, from any further proof of his sufficiency. But I question whether this Court intended to go so far as to say, that the plaintiff was bound, under all circumstances, to accept him. Suppose he could produce unquestionable evidence that he was not good. Suppose that after he had been received as appearance bail, he had taken the insolvent debtor's oath. Would the plaintiff be precluded from shewing this? I should think not. However this may be, there is no question with me, that in all cases the motion must be to the Court, unless the opposite counsel assent to the entry.

But the case before us could not come within Dunlops v. Laporte, taken in its utmost extent. Here there were two persons taken as appearance bail, John I. Johnson and Gilliam; and though it should be said, that by failing to except, the sufficiency of these two, as special bail, is admitted, it cannot follow that the sufficiency of one of them is admitted. By the same rule it might be said, that if twenty persons were taken as appearance bail, a failure to except to the whole would be 504 an admission that any one* of the twenty was good bail. Gilliam, therefore, in merely speaking to the clerk, came far short of what was necessary to entitle him to enter himself special bail. He should have spoken to his counsel, submitted the motion to the Court, and shewn, (if required,) his sufficiency; and upon this ground alone, if there were none other, he has no claim to the aid of equity. In the case of Dickinson v. Sizer, ante, 113, I stated at large my general views on this subject, and the authorities relied on for their support. To that case I refer.

I think the decree must be affirmed.

The other Judges concurred, and the decree was affirmed.*

New Trial;—Venire De Novo.§—Difference between a new trial and a venire de novo. By CARR, Judge.

This was an action on the case brought in the Superior Court of Henrico County, by Ralston & Pleasants against Brown & Rives. The action was founded on a charter party not under seal, by which it was agreed, that a certain brig called the Commerce, belonging to the plain-505 tiffs, *should take a cargo of tobacco and four for the defendants, from Richmond to Cadiz. The jury found a special verdict, which is set forth at large in the opinion of Judge Carr. The Court gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendants appealed to this Court.

Call and Wickham, for the appellants.

Leigh, for the appellees.

November 6. JUDGE CARR, delivered his opinion.

This is an action of assumpsit on a charter party not under seal. The jury have found a special verdict, setting out the charter party, and stating various other facts, leaving the law to the Court. There is also an agreement of the parties making the bills of lading part of the record. The charter party is not drawn out at length, in the usual form, but considerably abridged. By it, the plaintiffs engage the brig Commerce, commanded by Dixon Brown, to take a cargo of tobacco and flour for the defendants, from Richmond to Cadiz direct, at 5l. per hogshead, and 11s. 3d. per barrel, freight, with 5 per cent. primage; "the concerned understanding that twenty running days shall be allowed for unloading the vessel after she arrives at Cadiz, and the master gives notice to the consignee that he is ready to unload; and for every additional day's detention, the shippers shall pay $50 demurrage, quarantine always excepted, provided it is enforced with such rigor as to prevent vessels from discharging and landing their cargoes, and not otherwise." The jury also find, that in pursuance of the charter party, the plaintiffs shipped on board the said brig, 100 hogsheads of tobacco, and 750 barrels of flour, and addressed the ship and cargo to James C. Wardrop, at Cadiz, their agent and consignee: that the brig arrived in safety at Cadiz, on the 19th of January, 1810, and the captain immediately reported his 506 arrival *to Hackley, acting consul of the United States, and agent for Wardrop, as to the flour, and notified him of his readiness to deliver the cargo according to the charter party: that according to the course and usage of trade at Cadiz, vessels arriving with cargoes are anchored in the bay, which is spacious, and the cargoes are deliverable along-side to lighters sent by the agents or consignees; and it is not the duty of masters to land their cargoes: that Wardrop was absent from Cadiz when the vessel arrived, and did not return until July 1810: that Hackley sent on the letters to Wardrop, which the vessel brought, with the knowledge of the master; and in about ten days, received instructions from Wardrop, relative to the tobacco part of the cargo, and undertook the agency as to it; of which he gave notice to Brown; but he gave him no directions at any time, touching the tobacco, nor did the master apply for any such directions: that between the 19th of January, 1810, and the first of March, inclusive, Hackley received 741 barrels of the flour, and paid the freight thereon: that about the time of the arrival of the vessel, or a little after, there being war between Spain and France, a French army had invaded Spain and were marching towards Cadiz, a strong place of war open to the sea, its port and anchorage safe from sudden attacks from land, and the British then the allies of Spain, having command of the sea: that on the approach of the French, great numbers of the Spanish army and other subjects, came to Cadiz; and all the lighters and boats usually employed in taking goods from the ships to the town, were subjected to impressment, and most of them were actually impressed by the government: that owing to this, many vessels remained unloaded in the harbour, from the 28th of January, 1810, (when the French were marching to, and threatening Cadiz,) to the 7th of March following; it being with the greatest difficulty that boats and lighters could be procured, and when procured, they were constantly liable to be impressed: that the 100 hogsheads of 507 tobacco and 9 barrels *of flour remained on board until the 7th of March, when by a violent gale of wind, and without any fault of master or mariners, the vessel was driven from her moorings upon a part of the neighbouring coast of Spain then in possession of the French, by whom the vessel and cargo were burned: that when the brig arrived at Cadiz, there was no market for tobacco, nor was it the intention of Wardrop or Hackley to sell it there, unless for a price for which it would not sell, but to re-ship it and send it to England. The jury conclude by finding for the defendants, if the Court shall be of opinion, upon the facts found, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover. If the Court shall be of opinion, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover for demurrage only, then they find for the plaintiffs $1050 with interest. If the Court shall be of opinion, that the plaintiffs ought to recover freight and primage only, they find for the plaintiffs $2209 64, with interest. And if the Court shall be of opinion, that they ought to recover freight, primage and demurrage, they find for the plaintiffs, $3259 64, with interest. The Court decided, that the plaintiffs were entitled to freight, primage and demurrage, and rendered judgment accordingly; from which the appeal is taken.

Cases of commercial and maritime law, are of very rare occurrence in this agricultural land. I have found but one case in all our books of Reports, which touches the question of freight; nor does that involve any of the points raised here. Indeed, I have been able to find no case in any book, deciding those points directly. I must therefore consider them pretty much on general principles.

It may perhaps conduce to clearness, to give a distinct and separate examination to the question of freight and demurrage.

1. As to freight. The vessel which undertakes to carry goods from one port to another for hire, has a duty to perform before she can claim her reward. That duty is the safe transportation of the goods to the destined port, *and their delivery there, to the shipper or his consignee. It is a general rule, therefore, that a plaintiff who sues for freight, must, to sustain his action, shew a carriage and delivery of the goods; but if the plaintiff can shew, that he has performed all the stipulations of his contract, so far as the defendant would permit; and that the carriage or delivery of the goods was prevented by the act or default of the shipper; he will be just as much entitled to his reward, as if the goods had been carried and delivered; and this, under the operation of a principle quite as well settled, as that which, in the first place, holds a part to the performance of that duty, for which he claims a reward. On this principle, it has been decided, that if goods are taken on board, and the ship has broken ground, and the shipper unload them, having changed his mind as to the adventure, freight is due. Beaw. lex merc. 130. So, if a ship is freighted to go to any port to load, and on her arrival the freighter or his agent will furnish no load, the master having waited the proper time, she is entitled to full freight. These are cases where the ship has been prevented from carriage of the goods, and is yet entitled to freight. The following shews, that the failure to deliver, if caused by the freighter, will not deprive the owner of his freight. A merchant insured his goods to a port abroad, there to be landed. The factor, after their arrival, sells the cargo aboard, without unloading the ship, and the buyer contracts for the freight of them to some other port; but, before the ship broke ground, she was, by some accident, destroyed. Held, that the property of the merchandize being changed, and freight contracted de novo, amounts to as much as if the goods had been landed, so as to give the ship a perfect claim for her first freight. The construction of charter parties should be liberal, agreeable to the real intention of the parties, and conformable to the usage of trade in general, and of the particular trade to which the contract relates. Abb. 203. The jury have found, that the master arrived safely at Cadiz with the goods: that he *gave immediate notice of his arrival and readiness to deliver the cargo to Hackley, who was the agent for the flour, and the only agent, (the consignee being absent;) and they find also, that according to the usage of trade at Cadiz, it is not the duty of the master to land the cargo, but of the consignee to send lighters along-side the vessel to receive it. Here then are all the facts found, which it was necessary for the owners to prove, in order to make out their claim to freight; the safe carriage, the offer to deliver, and the usage of the port.

There is no imperfection, no uncertainty in the verdict, thus far. The case for the plaintiffs being thus prima facie made out, we must look to the verdict for matter of defence; for, unless the finding state enough to destroy the plaintiffs' case, there must (it seems to me) be a recovery.

It devolves on the defendants to shew that the failure to unload the vessel proceeded from no default of theirs. They have attempted this, first, by shewing from the charter party that they had the right to convert the vessel into a store-ship, and keep the goods on board as long as they chose to pay the demurrage. Secondly, by shewing from the circumstances of the case, that they could not get the lighters to take the cargo from the ship. Thirdly, that from the master's having made no protest against the delay, it is evident that he assented to it.

1. As to the right of the defendants to convert the vessel into a store-ship. The claim is founded on that part of the contract, which says, "twenty running days shall be allowed for unloading the vessel, and for every additional day's detention, the shippers shall pay $50 demurrage." Without looking to the books or the usage, it would seem to me, that upon the face of the contract, and the reason of the thing, this pretension must be pronounced unfounded. The business of the ship was the carriage of goods for freight. The purpose of this contract was the transportation of the flour and tobacco to Cadiz, and their delivery at that port. The parties considered that the cargo may be *discharged in twenty days. They therefore give the shipper this term for that purpose. Can any one look at this charter party, and not see that it is a part of the contract that the ship shall be unloaded in twenty days? For what other possible purpose, could this term have been introduced into the contract? We cannot suppose that the parties meant nothing by it. But the shipper might fail in his undertaking. The vessel might not be unloaded within twenty days; and to secure himself in that event, the owner has it stipulated, that for every day's detention afterwards, he shall receive $50 demurrage. Can we suppose that by this stipulation, intended for his own benefit merely, the owner meant to give to the shipper a right to detain the ship ad libitum; to convert her into a store-ship; to suspend the claim of freight for an indefinite space; and during the whole time of suspension, to throw upon the owner the risk of the cargo, so far as his freight was concerned? If there were no authorities upon the subject, I could never believe this to be the contract of the parties. But the usages of trade, and the definition of demurrage given by all the books, contradict the idea. They tell us that "demurrage is an allowance made to the master of a ship by his freighters, for staying longer in a place than the time first appointed for his departure, or his staying at the delivering ports." Beaw. lex. merc. 142. In Abbott on Shipping, also, p. 191, 192, it is said, "The merchant usually covenants to load and unload the ship, within a limited number of days, after she is ready to receive the cargo, and after arrival at the destined port. Frequently, also, it is stipulated that the ship shall, if required, wait a further time to load and unload, or to sail with convoy, for which the merchant covenants to pay a daily sum. This delay, and the payment to be made for it, are both called demurrage." Upon reason and authority, therefore, this ground of defence fails.

2. The second ground of defence is, that the circumstances of the case put it out of the power of the shippers
511 *to unload the vessel, and therefore that they are in no default, and so not liable for freight. I am by no means satisfied, that if the finding of the jury supported this ground, it would be a good defence against the claim of freight, where the loss of the cargo (as in this case,) happened after the expiration of the lay days. The parties have made a positive contract; the owner to allow twenty days for unloading the vessel; and the shipper that he will unload her in twenty days. Suppose the ship arrived at her destined port; no impediment in the way; and that the shipper might unload her in two days. The master gives notice, and presses the immediate delivery of the cargo. The shipper may say, "No: I will not unload you one hour sooner than the expiration of the twenty days;" and if after this, and within the twenty days, the cargo is lost, though by inevitable accident, the owner loses his freight. Why is this? Because by the contract the shipper had twenty days to unload. If, then, the law of the contract is equally binding on both parties, how is it that the shipper is not liable for the freight, after the twenty days, though he were prevented by uncontrollable circumstances from unloading? He has positively contracted to unload within that time, making no provision for accidents or circumstances. That he might bind himself in this manner, I suppose there can be no doubt; not that a party would be held to do an impossible thing; but surely the owner and shipper might agree, the one that he would hold his claim for freight, subject to the accidents which might happen within the twenty days; the other, that after the twenty days, the claim to freight should be complete, and he would take all subsequent risk.

In Hadley v. Clarke, &c. 8 Term Rep. 259, a ship had taken goods to carry from Liverpool to Leghorn. When she arrived at Falmouth, on her way, an embargo was laid, which continued two years. During all this time, the master kept the goods on board. At length, he returned to Liverpool, and the plaintiff received his 512 goods, by agreement "that such receipt should not prejudice his action. He sued the owner for breach of his contract, in not carrying the goods, and recovered 297l. 18, in damages, that being the amount he had paid for insurance on the goods. The verdict was subject to the opinion of the Court on the case stated. The Court were unanimous in favor of the plaintiff. Justice Lawrence says, "It was incumbent on these defendants, when they entered into this contract, so specify the terms and conditions on which they would engage to carry the plaintiff's goods to Leghorn. They accordingly did express the terms, and absolutely engaged to carry the goods, the dangers of the seas only excepted. That, therefore is the only excuse they can make for not performing the contract. If they intended that they should be excused for any other cause, they should have introduced such an exception into their contract; and he cites a case from Alleyne, 27."

In Touteng v. Hubbard, 3 Bos. & Pull. 291, Lord Alvanley, delivering the opinion of the Court, approves of the doctrine in Hadley v. Clarke. He says, "The case of Paradine v. Jane, Alleyne, 27, which was cited by Mr. Justice Lawrence, in Hadley v. Clarke, appears to me to be founded on much good sense. The third resolution is, that were the law creates a duty or charge, and the party is disabled to perform it, without any act in him, and hath no remedy over, there the law will excuse him; but where a party, by his own contract, creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity; because he might have provided against it by his contract."

Leer v. Yates, 3 Taunt. Rep. 386. Same v. Cowell, and Same v. Gorst. The plaintiff, in these causes, declared in assumpsit against each defendant, for detaining the ship Marianna, of which he was master, on demurrage, with certain goods on board, for a long time. Upon the trial it appeared, that the master of the vessel, which was a general ship, having a British license, had taken on board at Bourdeaux, 513 *the goods consigned to the several defendants, and also the goods for many other consignees, and had signed and delivered to each of the shippers a bill of lading, whereby he acknowledged "the shipping on board the Marianna of the goods (describing them,) to be taken out in twenty days after arrival, or to pay 4l. per day demurrage." The Marianna arrived in the London docks on the 17th of June. Certain of the consignees choosing to have their goods bonded, the vessel could not, from the crowded state of the dock, make her delivery, until 46 days after the 20 days. Some of the goods of other shippers were over those of the defendants, so that the defendants' goods could not be got at in the ordinary courts of delivering the ship, until those above them were removed. The defendant Cowell had bonded his goods as early as the 22d of August, and had made frequent demands of them; but they could not be delivered, because of the goods of others that were above them. Neither of the three defendants had paid, or offered to pay, the duties. The jury found against each defendant 1841. damages, being the amount of demurrage at 41. per day for 46 days. The Judge reserved liberty to the defendants to move to reduce the verdict. Lens Serjeant obtained rules to set the verdicts aside and enter nonsuits. He moved upon the ground that a general claim for demurrage arises only in the case, where the delay, whether caused by the act of the defendant or not, has been beneficial to, and occasioned in the service of the defendant. But here, it had arisen from the extent of the commerce of the country, co-operating with the law restricting the delivery of these goods to the London docks; a misfortune which fell with equal hardship on the plaintiff and the defendant, and could not render the defendant answerable for the consequences. Serjeants Sheppard and Best shewed cause. The plaintiff (they said) does not found this action upon any mis-feasance or non-feasance of the defendant. The bill of lading contains evidence of a contract to pay demurrage, if the ship be detained

514 beyond a certain *number of days, from what cause soever that detention may arise. and of the rate at which that demurrage is to be compensated. There is nothing illegal in making such a contract, and the Court cannot enquire into the prudence or imprudence of it. Ch. J. Mansfield delivered the opinion of the Court. He said, "It is impossible to decide these three very singular causes, without being struck with the enormous gain which the owner may get by this bill of lading, and which may possibly much exceed what in justice and conscience he ought to receive. This is a general ship. Thirty or forty persons may have goods on board, and for every one of them the owner may have his 41. per day. I was struck very much with the argument, that it was not the fault of the defendant, but the fault of the plaintiff himself, that these goods could not be got out till the others which were above them were delivered. But it is not, in truth, the fault either of the plaintiff or defendant, that the goods could not be taken out. There can be only so many goods at the top of a vessel as the proper stowage of the goods will allow. Therefore, all the others must be at the bottom; and as this is a general ship, and the goods do not all belong to one consignee, the goods of some of the consignees must be undermost. If this argument would avail, therefore, that the captain is not entitled to demurrage for the goods which were not uppermost, it would restrain the contract for demurrage to the few persons whose goods were at the top; but that construction would be contrary to the positive contract; for it is impossible to get out of this bill of lading, which, though it is a singular species of contract to bind a consignee, by an instrument signed not by himself, but by the captain; yet, as the consignors delivered the goods on board, under that bill, and the defendants accepted that bill of lading, it is binding on them; and therefore this action may be sustained on the general count for demurrage. Rule discharged." I consider this case as deciding a principle very like that which I have advanced.

515 *I have stated these ideas and cases, to shew the ground of my doubt, whether this defence, if sustained, would be good. But grant that it would be good; that if the defendants were prevented by the vis major, ice, storms, &c. from unloading, they would be excused.

Yet it must be admitted, that this being matter of defence, it devolved on them to prove that it was impossible to unload before the destruction of the vessel. Have the jury found this? So far from it, that, as it seems to me, they have found what amounts to the contrary. The vessel arrived at Cadiz on the 19th of January, 1810. The jury find that there was war between France and Spain; and that from the 28th of January, (ten days after the arrival of the ship,) to the 7th of March, (when she was lost,) there was the greatest difficulty in procuring lighters; because the French army being on their march, and threatening Cadiz, many Spanish soldiers and subjects flocked thither, and the lighters were all subjected to impressment, and most of them were impressed by the government. Now, when the jury say there was the greatest difficulty in getting lighters, they do not mean that it was impossible to get them. On the contrary, I understand them to mean that it was possible, though very difficult. They find other facts, which go strongly to shew, that with diligence and activity, there might have been a delivery of the cargo. For ten days after the arrival of the vessel, there was no difficulty, that we hear of, in getting lighters; for it was not until the 28th of January, that the government began to impress them. Of the 750 barrels of flour, 741 were delivered, leaving only 9, and those probably for the consumption of the crew. This shews what the consignee could do, where interest prompted. Flour, no doubt, sold high in a besieged city. Why was not the tobacco delivered also? In the first place, there was no agent at Cadiz, authorised to attend to it, for ten days after the ship arrived; and secondly, the jury find that there was no market for tobacco at Cadiz, and that neither Wardrop nor Hackley intended it should remain there, 516 *(as they could not get the price they asked;) but meant to send it to England. This throws a strong light upon the probable cause of the tobacco's remaining on board. There was no stimulus to excite the activity of the shipper. On the contrary, it was best for him that it should remain in the ship; for, if landed, the French might take it. These are but inferences, to be sure, and would not be relied on as establishing any fact; yet they go strongly to corroborate what I consider the actual finding of the jury, that it was possible to have unloaded the vessel. This second ground of defence, therefore, seems to me as unsubstantial as the first.

3. The third is, that the master assented to the delay in unloading, and that this assent binds the owners. We must look again to the special verdict to see how this position is sustained. The jury find "that when Hackley received the agency as to the tobacco, he gave notice of it to Brown, but he gave him no directions at any time, touching the tobacco, nor did Brown apply for any such directions." This surely was no assent to the delay. The captain had given notice to Hackley of his readiness to deliver the cargo. He had no need of any directions from Hackley. He had nothing to do, until lighters should come along side for the tobacco; and he needed no directions to inform him, that whenever they should come, he must deliver it. But it is contended that his failure to protest against the delay, is proof of his assent. This seems to me a strange mode of treating a special verdict. The jury find no assent of the master. They say not one word about his having protested or not. We are forbidden to presume or infer any facts in special verdicts; and yet we are to say he assented.

But it is said that at least the failure to protest was evidence of assent: that the jury ought to have found the fact; and that on this ground, the verdict should be set aside, and the cause sent back for a more perfect finding. I cannot consider the subject in that light. For what 517 object *was a protest necessary? The parties had entered into a written contract, regulating the duties of each; the master to carry the goods and report himself; the shipper to unlade them within twenty days, and to pay $50 for every day's detention afterwards. The master had given due notice of his arrival and readiness to deliver. This was all he had to do, until the lighters should come along side. Could his protest have given the owners any new right? No; for the contract did not make it necessary to the claim of demurrage, nor to hasten the unloading of the vessel. The shippers bound themselves to unload in twenty days after notice of arrival, (not after protest) and to pay the demurrage. Was the protest necessary to furnish evidence? This is sometimes the case, and then it is said to be received, only from necessity. Boyer v. Moore, 2 Dall. Rep. 196. But here, it could not be wanting to prove any part of the plaintiffs' case; for the jury have, without it, found the facts necessary to their recovery. Can it be said that a protest was necessary, simply to prove that the master did not assent to the delay? This would seem to be inverting the order of things. The defendants rely, in their defence, on the assent of the master, and they insist that the absence of evidence that he did not assent, is proof that he did assent. I think no protest was necessary; nor do I think there are any defects or uncertainties in the verdict, which should induce us to send the case back. Enough is found to shew that the owners have complied with their contract, and ought to have their hire, as there is nothing found to protect the defendants from their claim. That more is not found in favor of the defendants, we must conclude, is, because there was no evidence to justify the jury in finding more.

On this point of a venire de novo, I will say a few words more, from the high respect I feel for the opinions of my brethren who differ with me in this particular.

Witham v. Lewis, 1 Wils. Rep. 54, 55, "a venire facias de novo and a new 518 trial are very different things, *though alike in some points. They agree in this; that a new trial takes place in both, and that the Court may or may not grant either. They differ in this; that the venire facias is the ancient proceeding of the common law, the new trial a modern invention to mitigate the severity of the proceeding by attain. New trials are generally granted where a general verdict is found; a venire de novo, upon a special verdict. The most material difference between them is, that a venire must be granted upon matter appearing upon the record; but a new trial may be granted upon things out of it; as, if the verdict be contrary to the evidence, or the Judge has given wrong instructions. But a venire can only be granted in one of two cases. 1. If it appear upon the face of the verdict, that it is so imperfect that no judgment can be given upon it. 2. Where it appears that the jury ought to have found other facts differently. An example of the first, is the case of Chatie v. Harwell, a prosecution for selling wine by retail. Venire de novo, because of the imperfection of the verdict; the Act of Parliament having particularly mentioned retail measure, as quart, gallon, &c. and the verdict only found that he sold wine by bottles, without taking notice of the measures in the Statute. As to the second head, where it appears on the record that the jury ought to have found otherwise; "in an action of trover, if the jury, in a special verdict, find that the plaintiff demanded goods of the defendant, and he refused to deliver them, a venire de novo ought to go; because the jury have found only evidence of a conversion, instead of finding the conversion itself." This is a decision of high authority, being upon error from a judgment of the King's Bench, and tried by all the Judges, Chancellor Hardwicke among them, and they were unanimous. The above is extracted from the opinion of Ch. J. Willes, delivering the opinion of the Court.

Try our case by the rules here laid down as to a venire facias de novo. The verdict must be, first, so imperfect that no judgment can be given; or secondly, it 519 must appear *on the record, that the jury had evidence before them sufficient to authorise them to find facts which they have not found.

1. Is there not enough found here to justify judgment for the plaintiffs; the safe carriage of the cargo to the port; notice of readiness to deliver; and the custom of the port, that it is the shipper's duty to take the goods from the ship, not the duty of the master to land them? Is not this enough to make out the plaintiffs' claim, unless contradicted by some other finding, or something found to excuse the defendant? And is any such thing found?

2. What evidence is there in the finding, which shews that the jury ought to have found facts which they have not found?

They find, that all the boats and lighters were subject to impressment by the government, and most of them were impressed. Can we say from this, that it was impossible for the defendants to unload the vessel? Or that they have deduced the fact improperly, when they say that from this cause, it was "with the greatest difficulty," that boats and lighters could be gotten? Again. The jury find, that the master did not apply to Hackley for directions as to the tobacco. Does this shew that they ought to have found that he assented to the delay? I cannot think so. They find no protest; and I agree, that we must take it there was none. Does this prove that they had evidence before them, which justified their finding the master's assent to the delay? Clearly not; for the protest could have answered no purpose. Every thing was fixed by the contract, and the master had performed his part. If he did assent, it must have been by some positive word or deed, and this the defendants should have proved. The record gives us no vestige of such proof. I cannot therefore see that there is any ground for a venire de novo. I conclude that the plaintiffs ought to recover the freight.

As to the demurrage, the principles which I have attempted to elucidate, if they be correct, decide that point without difficulty. The contract binds the defendants to *pay the demurrage for every day after the expiration of the lay days. If they would be excused from this by proving that it was impossible to unload within the twenty days, they have not proved it; the jury have not found it; and they remain bound according to the charter party.

I have said nothing of the primage. It follows the freight of course. Upon the whole, I am for affirming the judgment of the Court below.

JUDGE GREEN.

It is admitted by the counsel on both sides, that there is no precedent to be found in the books of maritime law, deciding whether freight is due or not, when the vessel and cargo have safely reached the destined port, the stipulated lay days for unloading, have expired before the vessel is unloaded and discharged, and the cargo afterwards lost by the perils of the sea or other inevitable accident; and that this question must be determined upon general principles.

On the part of the appellants it is insisted, that it is a general rule that freight is not due until the goods are delivered to the consignee, at the port of delivery. And this is true, when there is a stipulation to deliver, upon a principle of universal law, applicable to all contracts, that one who stipulates to do any thing for a reward, cannot be entitled to the stipulated compensation, until the thing is done, for the doing of which the reward is to be paid; so that, if the performance of the thing stipulated, is prevented by any means, without the default of the other party, no compensation is due. It is however a principle as universal as that above stated, that if the party, who is to do something as a condition precedent to the compensation to be paid for the doing of it, is ready, able, and willing to do it according to his contract, and offers to do it, and the performance is prevented by the act or default of the other party, the party so offering to perform has the same *rights, as if he had actually performed his undertaking. Thus; "If goods are fully laden on board, and the ship hath broke ground, and the merchant, on consideration, determine again to unload them and not to prosecute the adventure, by the maritime law the freight is due." Beaw. Lex Merc. 130. So, if a ship is freighted to go to any place to load, and on arrival there the factor cannot, or will not, put any thing on board her after the master has staid the days agreed upon by the charter party, and made his regular protests, he shall be paid, empty or full. Ibid. 131. So, if a ship is freighted out and home, and after having delivered her cargo at the place agreed on, there are no goods provided for her re-lading; the master must stay the days agreed on by the charter party, and make his regular protest for his freighter's non-compliance; who will, in that case, be obliged to pay him, empty or full; though, should the master not wait the time stipulated, or omit to make his protest, he will lose his freight. Ibid. 134. And upon this principle the case from Molloy, 243, cited in 16 Vin. 412, proceeded: "A merchant insured his goods to a port abroad, and there to be landed. The factor, after the arrival of the ship, sells the cargo aboard without ever unloading the ship; and the buyer of the goods contracts for the freight of them to some other port. But, before the ship breaks ground, she is, by some accident, destroyed. In this case, the assured and buyer are left without remedy; for, the property of the merchandize being changed, and freight contracted de novo, the same doth amount to as much as if the goods had been landed."

In the argument, some exceptions were mentioned to the general rule, that a delivery of the goods is necessary to entitle the ship to freight, unless the delivery is prevented by the default of the freighter. One of these cases is founded on an ordinance of Lewis the 14th, mentioned by Valin, authorising a demand for freight when the goods are carried to the destined port, and prohibited to be landed by the laws of the country. Another is the case of *capture by a belligerent, and the separation of the ship and cargo by the unlivery of the latter, and both ship and cargo released. In this case the English Court of Admiralty has allowed freight. These cases have no application to the case at bar; and whether they ought to be received as law here, it is unnecessary to determine. They are exceptions to a general rule, founded upon particular reasons applicable to those particular cases; and the exception proves the general rule.

Let us apply the general principles above stated, to the case at bar. The appellees contend, that the terms of the charter party did not bind them to deliver the cargo at the port of Cadiz, but only to carry it there. The contract must be reasonably construed. The nature of the transaction indicates irresistibly, that the sole purpose of employing the vessel, was to deliver her cargo at Cadiz, or any other port, to which she might be ordered, in the event provided for in the agreement. It surely could not be said, that the owners had earned their freight by carrying the cargo to the port of Cadiz, giving notice that it was there, refusing to deliver it, and bringing it back immediately. The days allowed for unloading, decisively prove, that she was there to be unloaded, and the goods delivered to the shippers or their consignee or assigns. The mode of delivery, whether to lighters along-side the ship furnished by the consignee, or on the wharf, or at the ware-house, depended upon the mercantile custom at the city of Cadiz; and according to this custom, as found by the jury, the consignee was bound to furnish lighters along-side the ship; and a safe delivery to them would have discharged the owners of the ship from any further care of responsibility for the goods. The construction of charter parties must be liberal, agreeable to the intention of the parties, the usage of trade in general, and of the particular trade to which the contract relates. Abbott on Shipping, 203, 246. The manner of delivering the goods, and consequently, the period when the responsibility of the master and owner

523 *will cease, depends upon the custom of particular places, and the usage of particular trades. Abbott on Shipping, 246 & sequ. The general rule, therefore, applies to this case. The vessel and cargo arrived at the port of Cadiz in safety. The master gave immediate notice of his arrival and readiness to deliver the cargo. This was all that he was bound to do at any time; and certainly he could do no more, until the expiration of the stipulated lay days. The lighters were not furnished by the consignee or his agent to receive that part of the cargo which was finally lost, either within the agreed lay days or after; and upon the principles before stated, the defendants were bound to pay freight and primage according to their contract, unless they were under no obligation to receive the cargo until they chose to receive it; or unless they were prevented from receiving it, by circumstances which made it impossible for them to unload the vessel before she was lost.

The appellants contend, that by the terms of the charter party, they were under no obligation to unload the goods until they chose to do so; and that they had a right to detain the vessel as long as they pleased, paying the stipulated demurrage; and therefore, the non-delivery of the cargo cannot be attributable to any culpable laches on their part, of which the appellees can rightfully complain. They argue, that the lay days were compensated for in the freight to be paid upon the delivery of the cargo; that any additional delay was compensated for by the stipulated demurrage; and that so long as they were willing to pay the demurrage, the master was bound to suspend the delivery of the cargo, retaining it on board the vessel, at the peril of losing the freight if the cargo should be lost and never delivered.

The best examination and consideration which I have been enabled to give to the subject, have led me to a different conclusion. The very contract to carry for freight, implies in its nature, on the one hand, that the master shall submit to any delay arising from necessity, and not 524 from *the default of the merchant; and on the other, that the merchant shall discharge the vessel with all the dispatch possible, under existing circumstances: that, if there were no stipulation for lay days, and the landing of the cargo were prevented for any length of time by an uncontrollable necessity, the vis major, such as storms, ice, or the orders of the government, the master would not only be entitled to no damages for the delay, but if the cargo were in the mean time lost, he would not be entitled to freight, any more than if it had been lost in the midst of the voyage; whilst if the delivery of the cargo were delayed by the default of the merchant, and without necessity, the master would not only be entitled to damages for such unnecessary delay, but to the stipulated freight, even if the cargo were lost in consequence of such delay. He might land the cargo, and store it at the expense of the merchant, retaining a lien upon it for his freight. Without a stipulation as to the time to be allowed for unloading and receiving the cargo, each case might give occasion to a contest between the parties, whether the merchant had used due diligence in discharging the ship, and whether he was liable for damages for delay in unloading; and in case of the loss of the cargo by such delay, whether the captain was entitled to freight. To avoid such controversies, charter parties usually contain a stipulation for lay days, prescribing a time within which, if the ship is discharged, no laches can be imputed to the merchant, and if the cargo is lost, no damages nor freight claimed. But, this stipulation has no further effect upon the obligations of the parties, resulting as before said, from the nature of the contract, so that if, by the default of the merchant, the vessel were not discharged within the stipulated lay days, the parties would be in the same situation as to all subsequent delay, as if there had been no lay days agreed upon. If by the merchant's default, the vessel was not discharged within the lay days, the captain would be entitled to damages and freight, and might land 525 the cargo as aforesaid. *But, if the unloading were, during the lay days, prevented by an irresistible necessity, and that impediment continued after the expiration of the lay days, the master would be bound to wait until the impediment was removed, if it were in its nature temporary; and until the vessel, with due diligence, could be unloaded, without any right to damages for the delay, beyond the lay days. In case of loss of the cargo, during the impediment, or before it could be unloaded after the impediment removed, he would lose his freight. This, it seems to me, would be the effect of a contract containing no stipulation for demurrage after the expiration of the lay days.

In such cases, two questions would arise; first, whether the delay beyond the lay days, proceeded from the default of the merchant; and if so, secondly, what was the amount of the damage sustained by the master, for which the merchant would be responsible.

The first of those questions is incapable, in its nature, of being solved by any previous stipulation between the parties. The second may be adjusted by agreement between the parties, before as well as after it arises. Accordingly, there is usually found in every charter party, a stipulation to pay demurrage for delay; sometimes after the expiration of the lay days, sometimes without any stipulation as to lay days; as is the form of a charter party given by Beawes in his Lex Mercatoria, page 135. The natural office of a stipulation to pay an ascertained sum for demurrage, seems to be only to liquidate beforehand, the damages which the master may be entitled to claim, for a delay occasioned by the default of the merchant. The contract of the master to deliver the cargo, necessarily implies a stipulation to submit to the delay necessary for discharging the ship, in consideration of the freight agreed to be paid. To say that in case of a stipulation to pay demurrage without any lay days being agreed on, the demurrage would be payable from the moment that the ship arrived at her port of destination and notice thereof, *even during the time necessary for unloading, when no impediment exists, would be to contradict the implied stipulation of the master aforesaid, and to render the terms of the contract inconsistent with each other. The literal meaning of the word demurrage seems to be, a delay occasioned by the default of the merchant. The forms of charter parties, as given in Beawes' Lex Merc. 134, 135, contain stipulations, (not to pay demurrage for delay, but) to pay for demurrage so much per day.

These consequences, deduced from the nature of the contract, may be controlled at the pleasure of the parties, according to their agreement. Are they controlled or affected by the stipulations of the parties in this case? The charter party in this case, seems to be nothing more than an abridgment of a charter party in its usual form. I have already noticed, that there is no stipulation for the delivery of the cargo. That is necessarily implied from the nature of the contract, and from its other terms. The engagement of the owners is to take a cargo to Cadiz, without the usual exception of the dangers of the seas. Yet that exception is implied from the nature of the contract, and the owners would not have been responsible for the loss of the cargo, if it had been lost by the perils of the sea. Neither is there a stipulation as usual, that the ship shall be staunch, well manned, and provided. Yet there was an obligation on the owners, that she should be so, implied from the nature of the contract. In the clause concerning demurrage, the usual stipulation to pay demurrage, ("if any shall be by the default of the shipper,") is omitted. But, that condition seems to me to be implied from the general agreement to pay demurrage, which is for delay occasioned by the default of the freighter.

But, since the parties may, by express contract, vary the consequences which result from the nature of the contract, and the merchant might bind himself to pay demurrage, no matter what was the cause of the delay, it may be argued, that the words "quarantine always excepted," provided *it is enforced with such rigor as to prevent vessels from discharging and landing their cargoes during its continuance, and not otherwise," found in this charter party, have the effect of excepting this case from the general rule; since it excuses the freighter from paying demurrage in a specified case, in which he would not have been liable under the general rule, and there was no necessity for this exception, unless he was to be liable in all other events. I think this is one of the cases, to which the maxim "expressio eorum quae tacite insunt nihil operatur" applies, Abbott on Shipping, 242, 243; as the exception of the danger of the seas does not deprive the owner of his right to be exempted from responsibility for the goods if lost by the act of God, as by lightning; Abbott on Shipping, 295, or by pirates; Ibid. 292.

Some of the cases which have led me to this view of the effect of the contract to pay demurrage, are the following: Jamieson & Co. v. Laurie, 6 Bro. Parl. Cas. 474, (2d edition.) There the stipulation was to load the ship by an appointed day, and no provision for demurrage. The ship was delayed at the request of the freighter's agent, and compensation in the nature of demurrage allowed for the delay.

In Stuck v. Tenant, Abbott, 233, the running days for receiving and delivering the cargo were fixed by the charter party at 50 days, with permission to the freighter to keep her a further time upon payment of 5l. per day. Upon a suit for twenty days' demurrage, the defence was, that the freighter, intending to bond and warehouse the goods, had done all that was necessary on his part for that purpose, and that the dock company had delayed to land and warehouse them. Held, that the freighter was answerable for the delay, as it would not have happened, if he had thought fit to discharge the duties, instead of giving security for the payment; and the Chief Justice thought that the freighter would have been liable, if the company had improperly refused or delayed to unload the vessel. *I suppose that by this was meant, that if they could have been landed not otherwise than by the company, the freighter would have been liable for their default; because the company would have been liable over to him for the damages sustained. But, if the failure to unload had proceeded from the act of God, or the government, against which the freighter could have no redress, the case implies that he would have been excused; as a carrier is excused for loss by the act of God, or public enemies, but not by the act of any one responsible for his acts.

So, in a case (stated in Jacobson's Sea

Laws, 250,) of a charter party stipulating for lay days and demurrage, and an action for demurrage, the defence was that the unloading was prevented by ice. The decree was, "that the freighter was liable for the demurrage, unless he could prove that the discharge of the vessel was impossible;" and of course, upon such proof, he would not be liable.

I have already observed, that the legal effect of a contract simply to carry and receive a cargo, in which either party would be excused from responsibility, if prevented from performing his undertaking by an irresistible necessity against which he could have no redress (as the master, by the destruction of the cargo by tempest or lightning before it was possible to carry and deliver it, or the owner, by the destruction of it before it was possible to receive it,) may be controlled by the contract of the parties. The master may bind himself, at all events, to deliver the cargo safely, and so to insure against all accidents; or the merchant may bind himself, at all events, to unload the vessel in a given time, or to answer for the consequences, if that is not done from any cause. In each particular case, the question whether either party intends so to bind himself, depend upon the particular covenants which he has stipulated to perform.

Thus, in Hadley v. Clarke, the embargo of two years, which prevented the master from carrying the goods, according to his contract during that time, did not 529 make it "impossible to do it, whenever the embargo was taken off; and an embargo is always, in such cases, considered as a temporary impediment, which both parties are bound to submit to, without either being responsible to the other; but it never dissolves the contract. If the goods had been destroyed without the default of the master, and so that he would have had no remedy over, or if the carrying of the goods had been peremptorily prohibited by the government, the master would not have been responsible.

In the three cases in 3 Taunt. 386, the contract was, that the "goods were to be taken out in twenty days after arrival, or each of the shippers to pay 4l. per day demurrage." The goods were by law required to be landed at a particular dock; a regulation presumed to be known to the contracting parties, when they fixed upon twenty days, within which the parties stipulated to unload the vessel. The delay in taking out the goods arose, not from accidental and unforeseen causes, but from the nature of the trade. The law required all goods of that description to be landed at a particular place; and so many vessels were there to be unloaded, that the plaintiffs' vessel could not be unloaded within the twenty days. The hazard of this delay, arising out of a known and usual state of things, was the very hazard contracted for. The hazard of the delay of the first twenty days, the ship-owner took upon himself; and of all beyond that, the shippers took upon themselves. If, after the twenty days, the vessel had foundered in port from a storm, and the goods been lost, although the shippers would have been liable upon this construction of the contract for the demurrage, I incline to think they would not have been liable for the freight.

The case of Paradine v. Jane, cited in Hadley v. Clarke, was this: To an action of debt for rent upon a lease for years, the tenant pleaded, that "Prince Rupert, an alien and enemy, invaded the country with an army, and turned and kept him out of the tenement leased," &c. The Court decided, that he was, notwithstanding, 530 bound by *his covenant to pay the rent, as he would have been if the land had been surrounded by water. The Judges, in discussing this case, laid down some rules, and stated some cases, by way of exemplifying them; the substance of which was, that when the law creates a duty or charge, and the party is disabled to perform it without any default in him, and has no remedy over, there the law will excuse him; as in case of waste, if a house be destroyed by tempest or enemies. But, when a party, by his own contract, creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good, if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity; as if a tenant covenants to repair, and the house be destroyed by lightning or enemies, he is bound to repair. And it was added, as a reason for the principal judgment, that as the tenant was entitled to the casual profits, he ought to bear the casual loss.

This case, and the principles laid down in it, seem to me to have no bearing upon the case at bar. In all the cases specified, the accident did not make it impossible for the party to do what he contracted to do. The tenant, in the one case, might pay the rent, notwithstanding the invasion of Prince Rupert; and in the other, might rebuild the house, notwithstanding the destruction, by lightning or enemies. But, in the latter case, if the land had been overwhelmed by the sea, or sunk by an earthquake, or condemned for the public use, then the tenant would be prevented by the vis major, from doing the thing contracted for, in any possible way. He could not build, repair or re-build; and the question would be in that case, whether he was responsible for damages for not performing his covenant? I think not; and this is our case.

By a simple contract to carry, I do not think the master of a ship covenants against all accidents, or makes himself answerable for the loss of the goods by shipwreck, a public enemy, or any other unavoidable accident; although there is in his contract no exception of the perils of the sea or any other, as in this case.
531 It becomes impossible, *without his default, to do what he has undertaken. He cannot carry what no longer exists. Nor do I think it can be inferred from a mutual agreement to allow a given time for unloading, that the party covenants to unload at all events, within that time, even if it became impossible to do so, by the state of the elements, or the destruction of the property without the default of the owner, or by the acts of those who cannot be made responsible to him.

I conclude, therefore, that if it was impossible to unload the vessel before she was lost with the residue of the cargo, the plaintiffs are neither entitled to demurrage nor to freight upon the tobacco lost. But, if the vessel could have been unloaded and discharged within the lay days, or thereafter, before she was lost, and the failure to unload her proceeded from the default of the defendants or their agents, the freight was due from the moment that default incurred; and demurrage also was due from that time, or from the expiration of the lay days, if the default happened within the lay days. And although it might have been possible to unload the vessel within the lay days, or before she was lost; yet, if the delay in unloading her was with the assent of the master, then the defendants would not have been in default, nor have been answerable, either for freight or demurrage. Volenti non fit injuria. The facts upon which the rights of the plaintiffs, and responsibility of the defendants depend, are, whether it was, under existing circumstances, impossible to unload the vessel or not; if not impossible, at what time she might have been unloaded; and if it were possible to unload her, whether the obligation of the defendants to unload her, was waived by the master, and the delay consented to by him: In short, whether the defendants or their agents were in default or not.

If these conclusions are just, then the special verdict does not find sufficient matter to enable us to give judgment upon it either way. It does not find an impossibility to discharge the vessel; but 532 it finds facts upon which an inference as to that fact, might be made either way; an inference which it belongs exclusively to a jury to make. It finds facts, from which it might be inferred, that Hackley purposely left the tobacco on board, until he made up his mind what to do with it. It finds facts, from which it might be inferred or not, that the captain consented to the delay in discharging the cargo: that he not only did not call upon Hackley to discharge the cargo, after he was informed he had authority to receive and dispose of the tobacco, but failed to make his protest against the delay. Whether these circumstances amounted to proof of assent by the captain to the delay, was a matter exclusively for the jury, and would depend upon the custom of merchants and ship-owners, in respect to such protests, and the effect of a failure to protest; which would depend upon evidence as to the custom, to be given to the jury.

These facts are not ascertained by the verdict, which must therefore be set aside, and a new trial awarded.

The PRESIDENT.

The contract on which this action is founded, though not under seal, is in the nature of a charter party. It contains the usual stipulations in such instruments, and subjects the parties to like obligations. The delivery of the cargo at the port of delivery, is a precedent condition, and must be performed to entitle the plaintiffs to freight, under the contract itself. This obligation on the part of the ship-owners, is implied in the stipulation in the contract to carry the cargo from Richmond in Virginia, to Cadiz in Spain; and by the bills of lading, which are made a part of the special verdict, they expressly engage to deliver the cargo to James C. Wardrop, consignee of the defendants at that port. Hence it is a general principle, that freight is never due, till it is earned by a right-ful delivery of the cargo. In an action on the charter party alone, there is no exception to this rule; because, on general 533 principles, "the party who is to perform a precedent condition, must shew that he has performed it, to entitle him to his action, if he relies solely on the contract. If he is prevented from performing it by the acts or omissions of the other party, or by any thing else that will excuse him, the ground of his action is changed, and that ground must be set out in the pleadings. It is so set out in the declaration in this case. The ground is, that the defendants failed in providing, and having ready at the port of delivery, a consignee or agent to receive the cargo; in consequence of which, the vessel was delayed and lost before the cargo could be delivered; and on this ground, and not on the ground that the plaintiffs had performed their contract, must they rely. The special verdict and case agreed, have application to this case, and no other. If it were a demurrer to evidence, instead of a special verdict, I should incline to the opinion, upon the facts stated in the special verdict, that if there was default any where, it was in the plaintiffs and not in the defendants. I should rather infer from the facts and circumstances stated, that the cargo remained on board with the assent of the master and agent of the consignee, until it was lost. But, on a special verdict, no fact is to be inferred by the Court; and the enquiry is, is the verdict sufficiently certain to found a judgment upon, either for plaintiffs or defendants? My own impression is, that it is not. The gist of the action on the special counts in the declaration is, that the defendants failed in providing and having ready at the port of Cadiz, a consignee to receive the cargo. The findings of the jury which apply to this charge, are, that the master, on his arrival on the 19th of January, 1810, at the port of Cadiz, reported his arrival to Richard S. Hackley, vice consul for the United States at that place, and also agent for the consignee Wardrop as to the flour, but not as to the tobacco part of the cargo; and notified him that he was then and there ready to deliver the cargo, according to the contract: that the said Wardrop, the consignee, was at that time absent 534 from Cadiz at Valencia, and "so remained until July, 1810; to whom the said Hackley transmitted the letters of the defendants, which had been delivered to him by the master; of which the master had notice: that about ten days from the arrival of the vessel and cargo at Cadiz, the said Hackley did receive instructions from the said Wardrop, relative to the tobacco part of the cargo, and undertook to act as agent of the defendants concerning the same, and gave notice thereof to the master; but gave no directions whatever, at any time, touching that part of the cargo; nor did the master apply for any: that between the 19th day of January, 1810, and the 1st of March following, inclusive, the said Hackley received from on board the vessel, 741 barrels of flour, and paid the freight. So far then, the facts do not support the charge in the declaration to which they apply. In ten days from the arrival of the vessel, the defendants had an agent at the port of delivery, as to the whole cargo, and cannot be said to have failed in providing and having ready, at the port of delivery, a consignee to receive the cargo, in consequence of which, the vessel was delayed and lost; as is charged in the declaration. Ten days were not an unreasonable delay after the arrival of the vessel in another quarter of the globe; and the notice from Hackley, that he was the agent of the consignee after that time, as to the tobacco also, was notice that he was ready to receive it, according to the usage of the port, which is found by the jury; though he gave no directions to the master respecting it. The running days to be paid for in the freight had not expired; ten days of them remained, and the vessel was not lost until the 9th of March following. The delay charged in the declaration refers to the failure to have a consignee ready to receive the cargo, on its arrival at the port of delivery. But suppose it to refer to the time which elapsed after notice to the master that Hackley was agent as to the tobacco part of the cargo. It is expressly found by the jury, that after that notice, the master did not apply for directions as to that part of the cargo; nor 535 is it *found that he made his protest, as is the usage on the failure of the consignee to receive the cargo. To dispense with this, there is no finding of the jury of any readiness on the part of master, to deliver the tobacco; unless the finding of the jury, that between the 19th of January, 1810, and the 1st of March following, Hackley received the flour, is to be considered as sufficient. But, this is too uncertain. If Hackley received the flour, before he was agent for the tobacco, when he informed the master of that fact, it was the duty of the master to give him notice, that he was ready to deliver it also, though he (Hackley,) had given no directions respecting it. The general notice given by the master of his arrival, &c. applied to the flour; as to which, Hackley was their agent, and not to the tobacco, as to which there was no agent at the time. If, on the contrary, the flour was received by Hackley after he was agent for the tobacco, the general notice might be made to apply to both. But, the jury have not so found it; nor can the Court infer the fact either way.

The verdict is uncertain in another respect. If, owing to the state of things found by the jury, at the port of Cadiz, it was impracticable to land the cargo (according to the usage of the port, which is found by the jury,) it would repel the allegation of delay charged in the declaration, taking it in its broadest sense, and making it apply to the time, after which there was an agent to receive the whole cargo. The finding of the jury, that all the boats and lighters were subject to impressment by the Spanish government: that many of them were impressed; and also that many vessels remained in the port unloaded; are facts from which it might have been inferred by the jury, in connection with other facts found, that it was either impracticable or not, to land the cargo. But, the verdict has done neither. The finding that it was difficult to procure boats and lighters, and that when procured, they were liable to impressment, is only evidence one way or the other. Upon a demurrer to evidence, the Court might 536 do it; but not *on a special verdict.

But, there are other facts found by the jury, that leave the mind in some uncertainty as to the cause of delay. The jury find that it was not the intention of the shippers of the cargo to land it at Cadiz, unless a certain price could be gotten for it. The contract stipulates for twenty lay days, which must be paid for in the freight, and an indefinite demurrage after the expiration of the lay days at $50 per diem. They might have inferred from these facts, and from the disturbed state of thing at the port, that the cargo remained on board with the assent of the master and the agent; and if so, there was no default in the agent.

I think, therefore, that the verdict is imperfect in several respects: that it is uncertain as to the fact of notice from the master, that he was ready to deliver the tobacco, after the agent notified him that he was agent as to that part of the cargo; and defective in not finding the fact one way or the other, deducible from the evidence in relation to the practicability of landing the cargo, under the circumstances of the case.

On these grounds, I think the judgment ought to be reversed, the verdict set aside for uncertainty, and a venire de novo awarded."

Chancery Practice—Defence Available in a Court of Law.—It is a general rule, that a Court of Equity will not allow a man to make a defence which he might have made in a Court of law, unless he shews some good reason why he did not make that defence in the Court of Law.

Same—Same.—But, if the defendant in Equity does not insist upon that objection, but voluntarily goes into the merits of the case, and in his answer admits facts, which, if they had appeared to the Court of Law, would have produced there a different result, a Court of Equity ought to grant relief.

Vanlew filed a bill in the Richmond Chancery Court, stating the following case: that a certain John P. Shields, executed his note in favor of Samuel G. Adams and the complainant, then merchants and partners, trading under the firm of Adams & Vanlew, for the sum of $106 87: that after the said firm was dissolved, the said note was transferred to Bohannon in blank, in the name of Adams & Vanlew, by the said Adams: that it was understood and agreed between Bohannan, Adams and Vanlew, that the said note was taken by Bohannan for as much as it was worth, and that he was not to consider Adams and Vanlew responsible to him, if the money could not be recovered of Shields: that suit was instituted by Bohannan, as assignee of Adams & Vanlew, against Shields, and judgment obtained; upon which judgment a Ca. Sa. issued, and the defendant took the oath of insolvency: that the said note was passed to Greenhow, and came to the hands of Diddep, without any endorsement by Greenhow: that suit was brought on the said note against the complainant, as surviving partner of the firm of Adams & Vanlew, upon the endorsement by Bohannan, for the benefit of the said Diddep: that no defence was made at law, in consequence of the absence of a witness who had left Richmond, without his residence being known: that when the cause was tried, neither the complainant nor his counsel was present, to move for a continuance, on account of the absence of the said witness. He therefore prayed for an injunction to the said judgment.

538 *The injunction was awarded.

The answer of Bohannan and Diddep admits, that the note in question was assigned after the dissolution of the partnership of Adams & Vanlew; the said Adams then acting with full authority, as the agent of his co-partner, Vanlew: that it is not true, that it was expressly agreed and understood between Bohannan and Adams, that the former was to take the note without any liability on the part of Vanlew, if Shields should prove unable to pay it: that the note was assigned to Bohannan, by Adams, in part payment of a debt due by him to Bohannan, who did not consider Vanlew as bound for the payment, at the time of the assignment: that before the note was transferred to Diddep, he applied to Vanlew, who did not then deny his liability; and, although he afterwards refused to pay it, he never alleged that the note was assigned without recourse to him. As to the surprise alleged, in the trial at law, the defendants call for proof of the allegation, &c.

The injunction was dissolved, and an appeal was allowed by a Judge of this Court.

J. Myers, and the Attorney General, for the appellant.

Scott, for the appellees.

The counsel for the appellant made four objections to the decree:

1. That the note was endorsed to Bohannan by Adams, as agent of the firm of Adams & Vanlew, subsequent to the dissolution of the partnership, and for the payment of Adams' individual debt, which was known to the said Bohannan, at the time of the transfer of the said note.

2. That the note was endorsed long after its maturity, and consequently, subject, in the hands of the subsequent holders, to all the equity of the complainant against the said Bohannan.

539 *3. That if endorsed before its maturity, Vanlew was exonerated, by reason of the failure to place the note, (which was a negotiable note,) in bank, and to protest the same.

4. That the judgment at law, was obtained by surprise against the complainant.

For the appellees, it was contended, that a judgment having been obtained at law, and no sufficient excuse being offered why the defence was not made there, (the matter of defence being purely legal,) a Court of Equity cannot now grant relief, according to established principles.

November 9. JUDGE CABELL delivered the opinion of the Court.*

John P. Shields, being indebted to Samuel G. Adams and John Vanlew, merchants and partners, trading under the firm of Adams & Vanlew, executed his note to the said Adams & Vanlew, for the sum of $106 87, on the day of in the year 1816. The said note was, some time thereafter, and after the expiration of the partnership of Adams & Vanlew, transferred by the said Samuel G. Adams, in the name of Adams & Vanlew, to a certain Thomas Bohannan, in payment of an individual debt, due from the said Samuel G. Adams to the said Bohannan. The said note was transferred by the said Bohannan, but without his endorsing the same, to George Greenhow, and afterwards came into the hands of Thomas Diddep, without any other endorsement than that of Adams & Vanlew to Bohannan. Suit was brought on the said note, in the name of Bohannan, assignee of Adams & Vanlew, against John P. Shields, who took the benefit of the insolvent laws. It being thus ascertained that nothing was to be made from Shields, an action was instituted in the name of Thomas Bohannan, for the benefit of Thomas Diddep, against John 540 Vanlew, surviving partner of Adams & Vanlew, for the purpose of subjecting him to the payment of the said note, in consequence of the endorsement aforesaid, by Samuel G. Adams, in the name of Adams & Vanlew; and a judgment was obtained for $116 89. The object of the bill is to be relieved against this judgment.

It is incontrovertible, that if the facts above stated, had been exhibited at the trial at law, no judgment could have been obtained against Vanlew. But as that defence was not made in the Court of law, the question is, whether a Court of Equity can grant the relief now sought.

The rule has been long established, that a Court of Chancery will not entertain a bill for the purpose of allowing a man to make a defence, which he might have made in the Court of law; unless he shews some good reason why he did not avail himself of that defence in the Court of law. This rule is founded on the principle, that there ought to be an end of litigation; and that, consequently, where a matter has been once fairly investigated and decided in one forum, it shall not again become the subject of controversy in another. It was intended as a shield for the party who had prevailed at law. But, if he does not choose to avail himself of its benefit, if he voluntarily goes into the merits of the case, and in his answer, admits facts, which, if they had appeared to the Court of Law, would have there produced a different result, neither the rule, nor the principle of the rule, is violated by pronouncing a decree, justified by his own admissions.

This view of the subject, is decisive of the case before us, and supersedes the necessity of determining whether Vanlew has proved a sufficient excuse for not having defended himself at law. The plaintiff, in the judgment at law, has admitted in his answer, that the note due to Adams & Vanlew, was assigned to him by Adams, for an individual debt due to him by Adams, and that at the time of the assignment, he did not consider Vanlew bound. *This unauthorised and improper act of Adams, could not impose any obligation on Vanlew.

The order of the Chancellor, dissolving the injunction, should be reversed, and the injunction perpetuated.

Shields v. The Commonwealth.

November, 1826.

Contract with Executive—Refusal of Executive to Give Orders under—Remedy.—A contract is made with the Executive, under an authority given them by law: which directs, that the Auditor shall issue warrants upon the orders of the Executive. The Executive refuse to give such order. The party aggrieved may resort to the Courts, by original petition, and have his rights enforced by their judgment.

Same—Same—Same—Equity Jurisdiction.—It seems, that in such cases, the party may obtain redress either in Courts of Law or Equity, as the circumstances of the case may give jurisdiction to either tribunal. Per GREEN, Judge.

Equity Jurisdiction—Lost Instrument.*—Equity has jurisdiction wherever a lost instrument is to be set up, notwithstanding that the Courts of Law now exercise jurisdiction in the same cases.

This was an appeal from the Richmond Chancery Court. The case was submitted in this Court without argument; and the following opinion gives a complete history of it.

November 13. JUDGE GREEN delivered the opinion of the Court.†

The act of February 28, 1816, enacted, "that the Executive be, and they are hereby authorised to contract with some person or persons, for regulating the surface of the public square, in the city of Richmond, and for enclosing, planting, and improving the same," &c. The second section, authorises the Executive to sell certain public property; and the third section, constituted the proceeds of 542 *the sales, a fund for defraying the expenses authorised by the first section of the act, as far as the same may be necessary, and directed the disposition of the balance. The act did not direct how these expenses should be liquidated and paid; leaving those matters to be disposed of according to the general laws.

At the instance of the Executive, a Mr. Godefroy prepared a plan, for regulating and improving the public square, and on the 13th day of September, 1816, a contract, between the then Governor and Thomas Strode, was entered into, which was afterwards approved and adopted by order of the Executive Council, by which Strode, for the consideration of $24,000, agreed to execute a specified portion of Godefroy's plan. It seems that this plan, required a ravine between the Capitol and Governor's house, to be in part filled up; and that the hands of the city of Richmond, and some at work on the Governor's yard, were throwing dirt into that ravine.

The second article of the contract stipulated, "that the parties agree, that if the corporation of the said city of Richmond, and the hands now at work on the Governor's yard, fill more than half the bottom below the Capitol and the Governor's house, according to the said design or plan of the said Godefroy, the said Strode is to be paid in proportion for the said deficiency." It is difficult to understand the effect of this article. It seems, however, to have been understood, that there might be some deficiency in work, to be done by others; for doing which, Strode was to be compensated; and the work so to be done by others, seems to have been filling half the bottom.

The appellant in his petition alledges, that in 1817, he purchased from Strode a portion of his contract, with the assent of the Executive, and was formally substituted by Strode by a written agreement entered into between him and the then Governor of Virginia, which was lodged with the Executive; but which, as he is informed, cannot now be found. That 543 there was some such supplemental contract, "appears from two orders of Council; one of June 13, 1820, directing the Attorney General to sue both on Strode's and Shield's contracts; and another of May 4, 1820, in which they state, that the contracts made with them by T. Strode and J. P. Shields, have not been complied with; and in that of June 13, 1820, they request the opinion of the Attorney General, whether the execution and acceptance of Shields' contract, impairs or destroys the liability of T. Strode and his sureties. The purport of this contract, as stated by Shields in his petition, was, that he should complete the graduation of the ground: that he should turf certain parts of it; and plant certain trees, according to a plan specified; for which he was to receive $17,000 in instalments; payments to be made by order of the Executive, who were to superintend the work, and direct the payments. Shields proceeded to execute his contract, under the superintendence of Orris Payne, A. S. Brockenbrough, and Wilson Bryan, who were successively appointed by the Executive to superintend the execution of the improvements on the Capitol square. Shields alleges, that he has executed his contract, and that $400 of the $17,000 remain due to him; and that under the di-

It is said: "It is well established that 'equity has jurisdiction whenever a lost instrument is to be set up, notwithstanding that the courts of law now exercise jurisdiction in the same cases.' Shields v. Com., 4 Rand. 541, and the facts of the case may be ascertained by reference to a commissioner, or by issues to be tried by a jury, according to the common course of the court: Idem, 546, opinion by GREEN, J." rections of the several superintendents, he did a great deal of extra work not in the contract; of which he exhibits an account, as to some of which there are proofs of particular prices agreed on, and as to other parts, there appears to have been no agreement as to price. He particularly charges a very large sum for filling up the gully mentioned in the second article of Strode's contract, estimating the work at 42,591 cubic yards; of which he states, that the corporation finished 13,666, leaving 29,225 cubic yards, for which he charges.

If the effect of the contract is such as I have supposed, and this were a true account of the quantity of the work, then he should have charged only the half of 42,591 yards less, 13,666, viz. 7,629½ yards. Of this and many other items, proofs were offered by Shields. No proof is offered 544 *on the part of the Commonwealth, except the report of a committee of the Executive, who say that the work contracted for was not properly done. These details are not referred to, for the purpose of giving any opinion on the merits, but for the purpose of ascertaining the nature of the case; as the question of jurisdiction may be affected by them.

Shields, having applied to the Executive for an order to the Auditor to issue a warrant according to his account, which was refused, presented the account to the Auditor, who refused to issue a warrant; and Shields thereupon filed in the Chancery Court, his petition, which was both an original petition, and an appeal from the decision of the Auditor. The Attorney General, in his answer states, that a suit is brought against Shields, to recover damages for the non-performance of his contract, which, in effect, puts in issue the matters stated in his petition, when they can be tried by a jury, the proper tribunal; and he objects to the jurisdiction of the Court.

The pendency of this suit at law against Shields, is no impediment to the remedy he is pursuing. No one matter which is the subject of his petition, can be decided in that suit, except the question whether he has completely performed his contract, or not; and whether he has, or not, he can neither recover nor discount in that suit, the $400 which he alleges to be unpaid, of the contract price of $17,000; nor can his claim under the second article of Strode's contract, or for the work not embraced in the original contract, be discussed or settled in that suit.

The only questions are, whether this is such a case as entitles the petitioner to prosecute his claim, either in the Court of Chancery, or the Superior Court of Law held at Richmond; and if it is, in which of those Courts he ought to have proceeded?

In the case of the Commonwealth v. Pierce's adm'r ante 432, it was held that the petitioner was entitled to no relief, because he had no claim upon the Commonwealth, *but for what the Executive should allow; the law, under which he claimed, giving him a right only to what the Executive, in their discretion, should deem just and necessary; and, if he claimed independent of that act, that there was no law, or resolution of the Assembly, which authorised such a claim against the Commonwealth.

This case is not like that. The act of 1816, authorised the Executive to contract for all the work which was done; made an appropriation for the payment of the expense, and prescribed no mode of adjustment and payment, but that prescribed by the general laws for liquidating and recovering all other legal claims against the State. The contract, as it is said, provided that the warrants for the payments, should issue upon the orders of the Executive. The Auditor could not, therefore, lawfully issue a warrant without such order. But upon the refusal of such order, if, in justice, it ought to have been given, the party might resort to the Courts by original petition, under that clause of the general law, prescribing the duties of the Auditor, which allows such a petition, in case where the party has a claim, in law or equity, against the public, which is not proper to be presented to the Auditor. The refusal of the Executive to give orders for payment, did not destroy Shields's legal right, if he was entitled to claim under his contract or contracts, since they had no discretion to determine, finally, the extent of his rights, as they had in the case before mentioned.

Although the statute is in general terms, and seems to give an election to the party in all cases, to petition either the Chancery or Superior Court, (and I believe it has been the practice to exercise that discretion without objection,) I should incline to think, that the effect of the statute was, to refer cases, which, if they concerned individuals, would be most proper for a Court of Law or of Equity, according to their circumstances, either to the one or the other, as might be most proper upon that principle. It is, however, unnecessary in this case, to decide that question; 546 *since, if this case were, from its general character, most proper for a Court of Law, there are circumstances in it, which make it proper for a Court of Equity.

The contract upon which Shields must have proceeded in a Court of Law, for a part of his demand, was either lost, or not in his power; and, although a party may now proceed on a lost deed, at law, that does not impair the original Chancery jurisdiction in such cases. The Court of Chancery, therefore, had jurisdiction, and the facts of the case might have been ascertained by reference to a commissioner, or by issues to be tried by a jury, according to the common course of the Court. The Attorney General, in his answer, suggests a doubt, whether the extra work ordered and contracted for by the superintendents, was duly authorised. Whether these superintendents were, or were not, authorised by the Executive to contract for this part of the work, was a fit enquiry to be made in the Court of Chancery. The Court does not appear to have decided upon the merits, but to have dismissed the bill for the want of jurisdiction.

The decree should be reversed, and the cause remanded, to be proceeded in upon the merits.

*Riddick v. Cohoon.

November, 1826.

Limitations over—When Too Remote.—A limitation over after an indefinite failure of issue in the first taker, is too remote and void.

Will—Devise with Power of Disposition—Effect.—Where an estate is given by will to A. and his heirs, and if he should die without issue living at his death, then so much of the estate as may remain undisposed of by A. to B.; the limitation over is void for uncertainty, and because the power to dispose of the property, gives A. an absolute estate.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Nansemond, where Cohoon brought an action of detinue against Riddick, for a slave. Upon the plea of non detinet, the jury found a special verdict, and the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant obtained an appeal. The points in controversy are fully set forth in the following opinion.

Wickham, for the appellant.

Scott, for the appellee.

November 16. JUDGE GREEN delivered the opinion of the Court.†

James Cole, in 1799, made his will, by which he gave several specific legacies to his three sisters, Christian Cole, Esther Cole, and Mary Cole, and to his daughter, Betsey Cole, he gave him manor plantation, and lands of all kinds, and four slaves, males and females, and the increase of the females, "to her, and her heirs and assigns,

Wills—Devise with Powers of Disposition—Effect.—It is settled that, if a testator gives property to a devisee or legatee, to use or dispose of at his pleasure, that is, to consume or spend, sell or give away, at his pleasure, such devisee or legatee has the fee simple or absolute property, even though his interest in it be called by the will a life estate, and there be a provision in the will whereby what may remain of the property at the death of the devisee or legatee, is given to another person. Milholten v. Rice, 13 W. Va. 519, citing the principal case as authority.

After an absolute property given to one, with an unlimited power to dispose of it, express or implied, a disposition by the donor of so much of the property as may not be disposed of by the donor or legatee to another is void, because of the inconsistency and the uncertainty as to what part of the property is intended to go over. Cole v. Cole, 79 Va. 253, citing the principal case as so holding. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Madden v. Madden, 2 Leigh 385; Elican v. Lancasterian School, 2 Pat. & H. 58; foot-note to Missionary Society of M. E. Church v. Calvert, 52 Gratt. 358; foot-note to May v. Joynes, 26 Gratt. 692; Carr v. Emfinger, 78 Va. 206; Hall v. Palmer, 37 Va. 356, 12 S. E. Rep. 618; Farish v. Wayman, 91 Va. 485, 21 S. E. Rep. 810; Wilmoth v. Wilmoth, 84 W. Va. 482, 12 S. E. Rep. 733.

In Johns v. Johns, 86 Va. 333, 10 S. E. Rep. 2, the will read: "I will and desire that my wife Rebecca, shall have and hold all my estate during her natural life, for the benefit of herself and children, to be used as she may think proper." The testator left surviving him, his wife and eight children. He left no real estate but a small personal estate. The court held that the wife took a life estate, with remainder to her children free from her debts. The court, at p. 336, said: "In the case of Randolph v. Wright, 81 Va. JUDGE LACY says that the case of May v. Joynes, is authority for itself alone, and commenting upon the cases of Riddick v. Cohoon, 4 Rand. 547; Burwell v. Anderson, 3 Leigh 348; Melson v. Cooper, 4 Leigh 408; Brown v. George, 6 Gratt. 424; Cole v. Cole, 79 Va. 253; Carr v. Emfinger, 78 Va. 147, he shows that in all these cases, either expressly or by necessary implication, authority was conferred on the first taker of the estate to consume it or dispose of it absolutely; but in the case under consideration, the words, 'to be used as she thinks proper,' are only apt and proper words to describe the use of the life estate given to Mrs. Johns by the clause of which they are a part." †The President and JUDGE CABELL, absent.

forever." He then directed all the residue of his property to be sold, and after the payment of his debts, he gave all the balance of the money arising from the sales, to his daughter Betsey, her heirs and assigns. He devised, that the surplus money should remain in his executor's hands, and not be put to interest, until his daughter came to lawful age to receive it: 548 and then proceeds: "Item. It is my will and desire, that if my aforesaid daughter, Betsey Cole, shall die without lawful heir or issue of her own body, that then, all the lands, and all the other estate, I have herein given to my said daughter, Betsey, that shall be left remaining at her death, be equally divided to and between my aforesaid three sisters, namely, Christian Cole, Mary Cole, and Esther Cole, to them, and their heirs and assigns, forever." Betsey Cole died without issue, never having been married; and the slaves bequeathed to her, and the increase of the females of them, were divided among the three sisters of the testator, before there was any administration on her estate. The appellee afterwards took administration on her estate, and brought an action of detinue against the appellant, for the recovery of one of the said slaves, purchased by the defendant from John Mahan, the husband of Esther, the testator's sister; and recovered a judgment for the slave, from which judgment this appeal is taken.

The question is, whether the limitation over to the testator's sisters is good, as an executory devise?

It is clear, and admitted, that such a limitation, after a general failure of the issue of the first taker, is void, and can only be made good by some expression or provision of the will, or some circumstance shewing that the intention of the testator was to give the property over, only in the event of the first taker dying without issue living at the time of her death. In respect to such limitations of personal property, the Courts have been always anxious, and even astute, to find expressions in the will, or circumstances in the case, to have that effect; for otherwise, the intention of the testator, towards those who are intended to be substituted to the first taker, would be unavailing. This anxiety, however, ought not to induce us to resort to any forced construction of the will. If, upon a fair construction of the instrument, it is found that the testator, in reality, designed that the substitution should take place, whether the event, upon which the 549 limitation was to take effect, *happened within the period allowed for executory devises, or afterwards, that intent being contrary to law, the Court cannot afford any relief, upon the supposition, that if the testator had known the law, he would have limited the contingency to the allowed period.

In this case, the property being given to the daughter absolutely, and in the strongest terms, and to the sisters and their heirs and assigns, if the daughter should die without lawful heir or issue of her own body, there is nothing to restrain the generality of the expressions to a dying without issue living at the death of the daughter, or in the life-time of the sisters, or any of them, unless the expression, "that shall be left remaining at her death," can have that effect. What did the testator mean by these words? Did he mean that all the property given to his daughter, which did not perish in her life-time, should immediately upon her death, go over, if she had no issue then living? Or, did he mean that all the property which she had not previously disposed of, should go over upon the failure of her issue, whenever that event might happen? The first is the construction insisted on by the appellant; the latter, I think, is the true construction. The property given to the daughter, was land, slaves, and money. The expression, "that shall be left," &c. applies to all the property. The land and money must be left at her death, unless disposed of and alienated during her life. As to these, the expression used, can only refer to that part not disposed of by her. The slaves might have perished; but it would have been perfectly idle to except such as had perished, from the operation of the devise over. That which does not exist, cannot pass. The testator had given to his daughter, and her heirs and assigns, forever, an absolute estate, and intended, not to restrain the unlimited power of alienation, incident to that estate, but to control the future disposition of so much of the property, as she might not dispose of in her life-time; and that it should go to her issue, if she had any, as long as 550 they existed, and *upon the failure of issue, to his sisters or their representatives.

If, however, the conclusion last stated is not correct, and the testator intended to give over the property left, only in the event of his daughter's dying without issue living at the time of her death, it is clear, that he intended to give to his daughter an absolute power of alienation; and in that case, could not control the property not disposed of by her, as such control would be inconsistent with the nature of the estate given to her, and the limitation void, for uncertainty as to what property was to go over.

The case of Guy v. Montague, decided by Lord Chancellor Northington, in 1764, and his decree affirmed in Parliament, in 1770. 3 Bro. Parl. Cas. 314, is in point. In that case, Elizabeth Rogers having a power to dispose of 3000l. by her will, and having an only son her heir at law, and whom she appointed her executor, devised as follows: "I do hereby appoint and order, that upon the death of my said son without issue, or in case my said son does not dispose (of the said sum of 3000l.) either by deed or will, which shall first happen, that the sum of 500l., part thereof, be paid to my nephew, J. C. for his own use, and 500l. to A. G. for her own use, and 900l. to A. C. to her own use, and to E. P. 300l., to her own use, and E. P. 100l.; to four Churches, 100l. each; 50l. to the parish of N.; to the poor of E. 100l.; and the remaining 150l. among my son's servants, according to their deserts." The son died without issue living at his death, and made no disposition of the 3000l. by deed or will. The legatees over filed their bill against the son's representatives, claiming the 3000l. under the limitation, as a valid executory devise; and the bill was dismissed.

This case was much stronger in favor of the claimants under the limitation over, than the case at bar. The fact whether the son disposed of the fund by deed or will, was necessarily to be ascertained at the time of his death. The limitations over, were to sundry persons, without any 551 *words of inheritance, and for their own use; and a part was limited to the son's deserving servants. But all these circumstances, which tended to shew an intent to give over the property upon the death of the son without issue then living, or in the life-time of those to whom it was limited, could not prevail against an estate in him, to go over only on a general failure of issue, coupled with an absolute power of disposition. If he had had no estate, and only a naked power of disposition, it might have been otherwise.

There are other cases to shew that after an absolute property given to one, with an unlimited power to dispose of it, express or implied, a disposition by the donor of so much of the property as may not be disposed of by the donee or legatee to another, is void, because of the inconsistency, and the uncertainty as to what part of the property is intended to go over.

In Pushman v. Filliter, 3 Ves. 7, the bequest was, "Lastly, all my household goods and furniture, plate, linen and china, ready money and securities for money, stock in trade, together with the residue and remainder of my personal estate, I give, &c. to my wife Mary Pushman, desiring her to provide for my daughter Ann out of the same, as long as she my said wife shall live; and at her decease to dispose of what shall be left among my children, in such manner as she shall judge proper." The children claimed after the wife's death the property so devised to her against her executor. The Master of the Rolls dismissed the bill, upon the ground that it was an absolute gift to the wife of the whole property, to any use she might think fit; so that she might have made a valid disposition in her life-time, of all, leaving nothing to pass by the devise over; and no valid limitation could be made after such an absolute power to dispose, coupled with an interest. This I take to be the effect of that case.

Again, in Bull v. Kingston, 1 Meriv. 314, the effect of a confused will is stated by the Master of the Rolls, to be this: "I give to Charlotte 552 Williams the residue of *my estate, together with the right of disposing of the same by will, except to E. P.; and if she dies without a will, then I give whatever may remain at her death, to William Ashby." The Master of the Rolls proceeds: "This makes the whole intelligible and consistent. She, the testatrix, gives to Charlotte Williams, as a married woman, the right of disposing by will, of the property vested in her, independently of the control of her husband, and she intended, at the same time, that if any thing was left undisposed of by her, it should go to William Ashby. But this is an intention which must fail, on account of its uncertainty. Charlotte, therefore, took the absolute interest in the property, which, as to all the parts which were not specifically disposed of by her will, passed to her husband, and from him to the present plaintiff, his personal representative." The contest was between the husband's personal representative and William Ashby, as to a part of the property not disposed of by the will of Charlotte Williams.

Other cases to the same effect are to be found. The Attorney General v. Hall, 8 Vin. Abr. 103, pl. 50; where the devise of real and personal estate was, in effect, to A. and the heirs of his body, and if he should die leaving no heirs of his body living, then so much of my real and personal estate as my said son shall be possessed of at his death, to the Goldsmith's Company. Here the limitation as to the personal property was expressly to take effect within the term allowed by law for executory devises. But it was held to be void, on account of the power to the first taker to dispose of the whole, so as to leave nothing to go over certainly, if the contemplated event happened. This case is cited and approved by Lord Hardwicke, in Flanders v. Clarke, 1 Ves. 9; which case was decided on the same principles.

The same doctrine is asserted in the case of Miller v. Moor, 8 Vin. Abr. 248, pl. 21; where a devise was to three daughters and their heirs and assigns forever; and 553 if "they should happen to die, and leave no issue of their bodies to inherit such estate, or not be of age, or make no other disposal thereof, then to S. B. and his heirs and assigns, forever. This was held to give a fee simple to the daughters. This would have been a fee tail in the daughters, but for the expression, "or make no other disposal thereof."

The judgment should be affirmed.

Farmers' Bank, &c. v. Vanmeter.

November, 1826.

Equity Practice—Injunction to Judgment—Mistake.*

—A Court of Equity will never injoin a judgment at law, on the ground that it would have been reversible if the proper steps had been taken in the Court of Law, but by mistake, a confession of judgment had been entered.

Bills of Exchange—Fraud—Arrangement with Endorsers.—It is no fraud in the holder of a bill of exchange, to make an arrangement with one of Equity Practice—Injunction to Judgment—Judgment Stands as Security.—Where a party is proceeding at law to get a judgment for more than is due, and the defendant appeals to the court of chancery for relief by way of injunction, the settled rule is, that it will only be granted on terms of confessing a judgment and executing a release of errors at law. And a judgment is always suffered to stand as a security for what may be really due, though obtained by fraud, accident or surprise. And although what may be due be the whole or a part only of the debt recovered. Bank of Washington v. Hupp, 10 Gratt. 33, citing opinion of JUDGE GREEN in the principal case as authority.

And in Grafton, etc., R. Co. v. Davisson, 45 W. Va. 17, 29 S. E. Rep. 1030, it is said: "The court must not at once set aside the judgment, and grant a new trial, when it determines that a retrial should be had, but must await its result, as the judgment ought to stand as security until it is finally determined whether it shall be perpetually enjoined or not. Knifong v. Hendricks, 2 Gratt. 213; Bank v.

the endorsers, by which it is agreed that the whole burthen shall be thrown upon the other endorsers, and that the endorser first mentioned, is to be liable only in case they should be unable to pay.

Same—Refusal to Accept—Notice to Endorser.—Where a bill of exchange is presented to the drawee, who refuses to accept or to pay, notice need not be given to the endorser, if the bill was drawn and endorsed for the accommodation of the drawer, with the knowledge of the endorser, and there was no expectation that bill would be paid by the drawee.

Same—Endorsers—Contribution—Right to.—One endorser has no right to contribution against the other endorsers, where the several endorsements were made for the accommodation of the drawer, unless there is a stipulation to that effect.

Appeal from the Staunton Chancery Court. The case was this:

William Lane, drew three drafts on Bryan Hampson & Co. and prevailed on William Vanmeter, James Marshall, and W. H. Triplett to endorse the same, in the order in which their names are here set down. These drafts so endorsed, were discounted at the Bank, and they 554 *were presented to Bryan Hampson & Co., noted for non-acceptance, and protested for non-payment.

The Bank brought suits against the drawer and endorsers, and took judgment

Hupp, 10 Gratt. 33; Wynne v. Newman, 75 Va. 811; Bart. Ch. Prac. 58; 2 Story Eq. Jur. § 1574. The judgment ought to be allowed to stand as security until the final decree, as its lien is good for what may be found to be really due, though obtained by fraud, accident or surprise, and though what may be due be the whole or only part of the debt recovered (Bank v. Vanmeter, 4 Rand. 553, JUDGE GREEN'S opinion; JUDGE LEE'S opinion, Bank v. Hupp, 10 Gratt. 33); just as a judgment reversed in part is all the while a lien (2 Bart. Ch. Prac. § 236; Moss v. Moorman, 24 Gratt. 97). There are cases where at once the judgment was set aside and a new trial granted; but it is improper, as cases above show." To the same point the principal case is cited in Smith v. McClain, 11 W. Va. 672.

See further, monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425; monographic note on "Injunctions" appended to Clayton v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518.

†Bills of Exchange—Nonacceptance—Notice to Indorser—Necessity of.—The drawer of a bill of exchange, or order, is not directly liable to the payee or indorser, but his implied obligation or contract is to pay, in the event the amount is not paid by drawee. And the general rule is well established, that the drawers and indorsers are entitled to prompt notice of the nonacceptance or nonpayment in order that the former may look after his funds and withdraw or secure the same, and that the latter may take the necessary steps to secure himself; and that upon the failure to receive such notice they are discharged from liability; and the bill or order, as between the drawer and payee or indorser, will be considered paid. Ford v. McClung, 5 W. Va. 166, citing principal case as authority. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in McClain v. Lowther, 35 W. Va. 299, 18 S. E. Rep. 1003. Each of these cases say that there are well defined and numerous exceptions to this rule.

In the principal case, the indorser was not released because he could not possibly suffer any damage by failure to give him notice; since the only purpose of notice would be to inform him of the necessity of resorting to the drawer for indemnity, which, in this case, is unnecessary, as he already has indemnity in his hands. Turner v. Stewart, 51 W. Va. 498, 41 S. E. Rep. 927.

†Negotiable Paper—Successive Indorsements—Effect.—The legal effect of several successive indorsements is, that each indorser has a right to look for indemnity to all the indorsers who precede him, whether they indorse for accommodation of the drawer or for value received; unless there be an agreement alibi, different from that evidenced by the indorsements. Bank of United States v. Beirne, 1 Gratt. 265, citing the principal case as its authority. Again in Willis v. Willis, 42 W. Va. 524, 26 S. E. Rep. 515, it is said: "1 Daniel Neg. Inst. § 703, says: 'When several persons indorse a bill or negotiable note in succession, the legal effect is to subject them, as to each other, in the order they indorse. The indorsement imports a several and against Lane and Vanmeter by confession. Lane proved insolvent, and Vanmeter filed a bill to injoin the said judgments. The Bank, Isaac Baker the Cashier, James M. Marshall and William H. Triplett, were made defendants.

The bill states four grounds of relief: 1. That the drafts were drawn and endorsed, purely for the accommodation of Lane, and for the purpose of raising money by discounting them at Bank; and therefore, all the endorsers are jointly bound to contribute their proportion in the event of Lane's insolvency. 2. That the Bank had made a fraudulent agreement with Marshall, one of the endorsers, to proceed against Vanmeter alone, upon the assurance of the said Marshall, that he would ultimately see the money paid, if it could not be obtained from Vanmeter. 3. That the judgments were entered by confession, without any authority given by Vanmeter for that purpose; and if they had not been so entered, he could have defeated the plaintiff at law. 4. That notice of protest was not given to Vanmeter or any of the endorsers.

The Cashier of the Bank answered, denying that the judgments were confessed without authority, &c.

Marshall averred in his answer that he had no suspicion, when he endorsed the bills, that it was not intended that they should be paid when at maturity, and that he was assured, that Lane had flour in Alexandria, or on the road, amply sufficient to discharge the said bills: that he would not have endorsed them, if he had not believed that they would be paid when due, inevitable accidents only excepted. As to the charge of collusion, he admits the statement in the bill, to be substantially true, and denies that there is anything illegal in it.

555 *The injunction was granted; and at a subsequent day, on a motion to dissolve, the Court over-ruled the motion, and the defendants appealed.

Nicholas, for the appellants.

No Counsel, for the appellee.

Nicholas, having stated the case, was stopped by the Court, and informed that successive, not a joint, obligation, whether the indorsements be made for accommodation, or for value received, unless there be an agreement alimunde different from that evidenced by the indorsements. When the successive indorsements are for accommodation of other parties, the indorsers for accommodation may make an agreement to be jointly and equally bound, but whoever asserts such agreement must prove it. In cases, therefore, in which no such agreement is proved, the indorsers are not bound to contribution amongst themselves, but each and all are liable to those who succeed them." This clear statement is sustained by authority in almost all quarters, including authority binding us. Hogue v. Davis, 8 Gratt. 4; Bank v. Belrne, 1 Gratt. 265; Bank v. Vanmeter, 4 Rand. 558; Shields v. Reynolds, pt. 2, 9 W. Va. 483; Hoge v. Vintroux, 21 W. Va. 1, pt. 2. It would be different in the case of an ordinary surety on nonnegotiable paper. But while an indorser on negotiable paper is, in a sense, surety, as regards payee and maker, he is not as to a prior indorser, for the benefit of that indorser. Edmiston's opinion. Shields v. Reynolds, 9 W. Va. 487; Ross v. Jones, 22 Wall. 576." To the same effect the principal case is cited in Bank of United States v. Jackson, 9 Leigh 289; Faulkner v. Thomas, 48 W. Va. 148, 35 S. no argument was required on that side of the question.

November 28. JUDGE GREEN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The object of this suit was to injoin three judgments recovered by Baker for the use of the Farmers' Bank, against the plaintiff and Lane. These judgments were entered as confessed by those defendants, and were so entered by some mistake; Vanmeter never having employed counsel, or authorised the confession of judgments.

There are several grounds for relief asserted by the appellee. The first is, that such judgments could not have been had, or if had, would have been erroneous and reversible, if they had not been entered as by confession; the actions being joint against the drawer and endorsers of an inland bill of exchange, not upon its face negotiable at any of the chartered Banks of Virginia. This objection to the form of the actions, and the fact that the judgments would have been erroneous and reversible, if they had not been entered by mistake, as confessed, can have no weight in a Court of Equity. There the rule is, that whosoever asks equity must do it, as a condition of relief; and a judgment at law, however obtained, no matter by what fraud, accident or surprise, is allowed to stand as a security for what is justly due, whether that be a part or the whole of the debt recovered. The enquiry in a 556 Court of Equity is never, "whether the judgment is erroneous or unduly obtained; but whether it be for a debt justly due or not. If Vanmeter was responsible for these debts, in actions brought against him individually, he cannot complain in a Court of Equity, that he is injured by judgments rendered against him jointly with another.

The next objection taken to these judgments, is on the merits. The plaintiff alleges that the three endorsers, himself, Marshall and Triplett, were joint sureties, by virtue of their endorsement of the bills drawn by Lane, and discounted at the Bank for Lane's accommodation: that each was bound to bear a due proportion of the loss, Lane being insolvent; and that the Bank, who is not charged with notice of that fact, had concluded with Marshall to throw the whole burthen upon him, by dismissing the suit as to Marshall, upon his agreeing to hold himself bound for the debts, and to pay them immediately, if Lane and Vanmeter should be unable to pay.

If all this were true, and the endorsers were mutually bound to each other for contribution, and the officers of the Bank had full knowledge of the facts, they would have been guilty of no fraud or wrong to the plaintiff, by making such an arrangement with Marshall, and carrying it into effect. The drawer and endorsers were severally liable to the Bank for the whole amount of the bills in solido. The Bank had a right to pursue any one or more, or all, in several actions; and to have coerced the payment of the whole from either of them. The legal or equitable rights of securities to contribution among themselves, can never affect the rights of the creditor, or bind him to proceed against each for his proportion of the debt: unless, indeed, were the obligations of the parties are in the form of a joint contract, in which case, all must be sued together, but either may be compelled by execution to pay the whole.

The remaining objection is also on the merits.

The bills were presented before they were due, and the drawee refused to accept; and Vanmeter alleges that no 557 *notice was given to him, he being the first endorser, either of the non-acceptance, or non-payment. This is probably true, and in the present stage of the cause, must be taken to be so. If he was entitled to notice, he was not liable to the claim of the Bank, and would be entitled to relief; for, he was precluded from making this defence at law, by the mistaken entry of judgments by confession.

The facts, upon which the question, whether Vanmeter was or was not entitled to notice, are stated by himself in his bill. He says, that the bills were drawn and endorsed for the accommodation of Lane, the drawer; and for the purpose of getting them discounted at the Bank: that no consideration, whatever, passed between the parties, or any of them; and that there was no expectation that they would be paid by the drawee.

It is a general rule, that the drawer or endorser of a bill of exchange, is discharged from responsibility, unless he has due notice of the dishonor of the bill, by non-acceptance or non-payment. This notice was required originally, for the purpose of enabling the party to take promptly such measures for his security, as might be in his power; and it seems to have been originally required of him, if he complained of the want of notice, to prove, that for the want of it, he had suffered some injury. The modern doctrine, however, is perfectly well settled, that the law implies an injury, from a want of due notice; and this presumption is so strong, that in order to repel it, proof is required to shew that it was impossible for the party to suffer any damage or inconvenience. Thus, in the case of a drawer; if the bill be drawn without funds in the hands of the drawee, and the drawer had no reason to expect that the bill would be accepted; this is considered as a case in which it is shewn that no possible prejudice can result to the drawer from the want of notice; since he knew, when he drew the bill, that it would devolve on him to take it up, as well without as with notice of its dishonor; and having no reason to expect the bill to be ac-

558 cepted, it cannot be *supposed that he would make any arrangements for putting funds in the hands of the drawee to take it up. But, if the drawer, without funds in the hands of the drawee, has any just ground to believe that the bill will be accepted, he ought to have notice; for in that case, it is to be presumed that he will so arrange his funds as to place the means of paying the bill at maturity, in the hands of the drawee. Such arrangements, if unnecessary and fruitless, would be prejudicial to the party; and to enable him to avoid this mischief, immediate notice should be given.

The case of an indorser is still stronger than that of a drawer; for he has, in general, a right to resort to the drawer for indemnity, and to enable him to assert this right with the greatest possible effect, he ought to have immediate notice. But, even as to an endorser, a case may occur, in which it may be shewn to be impossible for him to suffer any inconvenience for the want of notice. As in the case of a note endorsed by the payee for the accommodation of the drawer, who should place in the hands of the endorser funds sufficient to discharge it. The latter would not be entitled to notice of the non-payment; because he could not possibly suffer any damage by the failure to give him notice, Carnay v. Da Costa, 1 Esp. Rep. 303; since the only purpose of a notice, would be, to inform him of the necessity of resorting to the drawer for indemnity, which, in this case, is unnecessary, as he already has that indemnity in his hands.

With the exception of the cases, in which it can be shewn, that they could not, by possibility, suffer an injury by the failure to give them notice, the drawer and endorser have in all cases a right to strict notice, unless they waive that right, or forfeit it by their own fraud. I do not find this ground of fraud, very distinctly laid down as a reason for dispensing with the necessity of notice. But, there are many cases in which it appears to have been the sole ground of the judgment, and in which, the principle is distinctly alluded to.

559 *In De Bert v. Atkinson, 2 H. Black. Rep. 336, the endorser of a note for the accommodation of the drawer, who knew that he was insolvent, was held not to be entitled to notice of non-payment. If this case proceeded upon the supposition, that the knowledge of the drawer's insolvency made it impossible that the endorser could suffer any injury for the want of notice, then it contradicted many other cases, in which it has been determined, that the insolvency of the acceptor, whether he accepted for the accommodation of the drawer or of himself, did not dispense with the necessity of notice; for, it is not impossible to procure payment from an insolvent man, through his friends or otherwise; and the drawer is entitled to notice, in order to enable him to take this chance. The drawer of the note in this case, was in the situation of an acceptor, for his own accommodation; and the endorser, in the situation of the drawer of the bill so accepted. If it was decided upon the ground of fraud, the decision was equally objectionable; for, no fraud or imposition was practised on the holder, since he got the security of the very names, which he expected to get when he contracted. This case has been virtually over-ruled in French's ex'r v. Bank of Columbia, 4 Cranch, 161. I mention it only to shew, that Lord Ellenborough considered it as decided on the ground of fraud; and upon the authority of that case, decided Sisson v. Thomlinson, Selw. N. P. 324, n. 31; in which he ruled, that when an endorser had not given any consideration for a bill, and knew at the time that the drawer had not any effects in the hands of the drawee, he was not entitled to notice of non-payment. In this case, the decision could not have been founded upon the principle that the endorser could not suffer any detriment for want of notice, since it was a bill accepted; and although none of the parties had given any value, and it was to all the parties an accommodation bill; yet the endorser had a right, if he paid it, to resort to the acceptor; a right, which might have been rendered of no avail, for *the want of timely notice of non-payment. The only ground, upon which this case was decided, was, the fraud upon the public, practised by the endorser, by endorsing a bill which he knew to be drawn without funds. This case was totally different from that of an insolvent's note, endorsed for his accommodation; the holder of which got all he contracted for. Every drawer of a bill, virtually represents to all dealing for it, that it is drawn upon sufficient funds. The holder deals upon the faith that he shall have the additional security of the drawer; and if he fails in this, he is disappointed by the fraud of the drawer; and if the endorser, with a knowledge of the facts, endorsed for the purpose of promoting the object of the drawer, he would be a participator in the fraud. If, therefore, in Sisson v. Thomlinson, the bill had not been accepted, there would have been better reason to hold, that the endorser was not entitled to notice; for, that would have corroborated the presumption, that the endorser knew that the bill was not only not drawn upon funds; but also, that it would not be accepted. So that the holder would be disappointed in the expectations raised by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the drawer and endorser. Neither would the endorser, in that case, have any acceptor to resort to; nor could he claim against any one but the drawer. If he knew that the bill would not be accepted, then he knew the necessity of looking to the drawer from the moment he endorsed; and therefore, wanted no notice to put him on his guard. The bill, however, being accepted, the holder got all he contracted for; and the fact of acceptance indicated, that although the endorser knew that the drawee had no funds of the drawer, he had reason to expect an acceptance, and would be entitled to notice. In such a case, the holder can hardly be said to be deceived or defrauded. The actual decision of this case cannot be supported, but upon the ground, that if the endorser acted in the beginning with an intent to deceive others, he cannot insist upon notice, even if no one be deceived.

561 *In Brown & al. v. Massey, 15 East. 216, it was held, that when a bill was drawn, accepted and endorsed by several, for the accommodation of the last endorser, and the acceptor had no effects of the drawer in his hands, but that fact was unknown to one of the endorsers, who was the defendant, he was entitled to notice of the non-payment, having a right to resort to the last endorser for indemnity. This case seems to turn upon the bona fides of the endorser. If he had known the fact that there were no funds in the hands of the drawee, he would probably have been considered as having participated in the fraud of putting a bill purely for accommodation, into circulation.

In Leach v. Hewitt, 4 Taunt. 731, the defendant had endorsed a bill for the accommodation of a third person, whose name was not on it. The bill purported to be drawn by one firm, which had no existence, and accepted by another fictitious firm; but this was unknown to the endorser. The instruction of Mansfield, Justice, to the jury, afterwards approved of by the Court, was, that the endorser was entitled to notice, if he was not privy to the fraud. If the endorser in that case, had been privy to the fraud, he would not have been entitled to notice. Not being privy, he was entitled to claim against the person, for whose accommodation he had endorsed; and the want of notice might have impaired his remedy.

These cases are referred to, for the purpose of shewing that an endorser, who unites with the drawer to deceive the holder, by representing a bill as one that will probably be accepted, with a knowledge that it will not, is guilty of a fraud, which deprives him of the right to insist upon notice. The principle, although perhaps pushed too far in its practical application in some of those cases, is just. If a bill were drawn upon a fictitious person, and was endorsed with a full knowledge of that fact, for the purpose of enabling the drawer to raise money by getting it discounted, it could not for a moment be doubted, that the holder could recover against the endorser, without giving 562 him notice *that he applied at the place to which the bill was directed, and found no person to present it to, answering the description of the bill. This would be a gross and palpable fraud, in both drawer and endorser. I can perceive no difference between that case, and one in which the bill was drawn and endorsed, with full knowledge on the part of the endorser, that the drawer not only had no funds in the hands of the drawee, but that he had no right to draw upon him, or reason to expect that he would accept; except that in one case, the non-existence of the nominal drawee would be complete proof of the fact, that there was no expectation, or ground for expectation, that the bill would be accepted; and in the other, it might be fairly inferred, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that the endorser, from the representations of the drawer or otherwise, did bona fide expect that the bill would be accepted; an inference which it might be difficult, and almost impossible, to disprove.

But, the case under consideration, is precisely the case last supposed, and the proof is full. Vanmeter, in his bill sworn to, states that the bills were drawn and endorsed for the accommodation of the maker, for the purpose of procuring a discount at the Bank; and that there was no expectation that they would be paid by the drawee; and the answer of the Bank, sworn to by the Cashier, states, that if the facts so stated by plaintiff, had been known to them, they would not have discounted these bills. I think this was a fraud upon the Bank, and that Vanmeter was therefore entitled to no notice.

It is not necessary to enquire whether, if Vanmeter would have had a right to claim contribution from the other endorsers, if they had had due notice of the non-acceptance or non-payment, he was therefore entitled to notice, in order that he might give them notice, and so secure his recourse against them. For, he had no right to claim contribution from them. There was no agreement amongst them, that each should bear a part of the loss as joint sureties, *either expressed or to be implied from the circumstances of the case, but the contrary. Each of the endorsers defendants, deny that there was any such agreement, and say, that although they endorsed for the accommodation of Lane, they did so under the full persuasion that the bill would be accepted and paid. I at one time doubted, whether several endorsing for the accommodation of another, ought not to be considered as joint sureties, and bound to contribution amongst themselves. But, I am satisfied, that this cannot be the effect of such a transaction, unless there be a stipulation to that effect. Sureties may bind themselves severally in succession; so that each may be a supplemental surety, in respect to another. Craythorne v. Swinburne, 14 Ves. 160. In this case, they have bound themselves by an instrument, the legal effect of which is to subject them, in respect to each other, in succession in the order in which they endorsed; and they must be taken to have intended to be bound according to the legal effect of the instrument, until the contrary appears. If several endorsers, in such circumstances, were liable to contribution as a matter of course, the books would have teemed with cases on the subject. But, I cannot find that the question has ever been raised.

The order refusing to dissolve the injunction upon the merits, must be reversed, and the injunction dissolved.

564 *M'Kay v. Hite's Executors.

November, 1826.

Appeal—Dissolution of Injunction—Appeal Bond.—A party appealing from an order dissolving an injunction can only be required to give security to perform the decree of the Inferior Court, and to pay the costs and damages awarded in the Appellate Court, if the decree shall be affirmed.

Same—Appeal Bond—Discharge of Surety.—Quære whether, where bond and security have been given to perform the decree of the Court below, and further security is required in the Appellate Court, which the party cannot give, the surety in the first bond is discharged?

This was an appeal from the Winchester Chancery Court, from an order dissolving an injunction. The appellant had obtained an injunction, which was afterwards dissolved, and appealed, giving an appeal bond in the penalty of $6000. The Court of Appeals, upon motion of the appellees, required further security, and in a larger sum.

Johnson, for the appellant, moved the Court to set aside their former order, and to permit the appellant to appeal, upon giving bond and security, in a sum sufficient to cover merely the costs and damages awarded here, and to perform the decree of the Court below.

November 29. JUDGE COALTER delivered his opinion, in which the other Judges concurred.

Since the order made in this cause at a former term, requiring the appellant to give better security than had before been given, to prosecute this appeal, and in a larger sum, which was made in haste, and in which the question was not made or considered, whether a party appealing from an order dissolving an injunction, was bound to give security for the payment of the debt, as on the grant of an original injunction, that question has been solemnly considered by the Court, and it has been decided that such an appeal must be allowed on the appellant giving security merely to perform the decree of the Inferior Court, and to pay costs and damages awarded here, if the decree shall be *affirmed.

This will be a small sum sufficient to cover the costs in the Court below.

In this case, the appellant had entered into bond with surety, in the penalty of $6000; perhaps ten times the sum necessary for that purpose, conditioned as above stated. It is possible the security originally given will not be objected to as sufficient for the purposes above. If it is, the Court will hear the appellants on that point. But the appellant petitioned to be permitted to appeal, on giving security for costs here, under the late Act of Assembly. This, it is presumed, he would not have done, but for the large sum, in which this Court, by mistake, required him to enter into bond. That order must, therefore, be set aside; so that the appeal will stand on the bond first given, unless that is now objected to as aforesaid.

That order must also be set aside for another reason. This Court is not perfectly satisfied, on re-consideration, that an appeal can be taken under the act aforesaid, after an appeal, on bond being given to perform the decree below, when further security is required here, which the party cannot give; in consequence of the possible effect, that in this way, even the security given may be discharged; a question, which this Court wishes to keep open for more deliberate consideration, whenever it shall arise.

December, 1826.

Power of Appointment—How Appointment to Be Made.—Where an appointment is made, in pursuance of a general power not prescribing the mode of appointment, it must be made in such a way as would pass the title, if the property belonged to the person making the appointment.

Executor's Right to Sell Testator's Effects. — An executor may make a valid sale of his testator's effects, whether they be necessary for the payment of debts or not, if there is no fraud or collusion in the purchaser.

This is the same case reported in Gilm. Rep. 27. The questions now made arose out of the interpretation of the decree rendered in that case, by the Chancellor. The particulars of that decree, and the relation of the several parties, may be found by referring to that report. They are not necessary here.

Leigh, for the appellant.

No Counsel, for the appellee.

December 5. JUDGE GREEN delivered his opinion.

The first objection taken to the decree appealed from is, that it affirms the appointment to Nancy H. Knight of four slaves, Ned, Matt, Belinda and her child, to be valid; and this objection is well founded. To the validity of an appointment in pursuance of a general power, not prescribing the mode of appointment, 567 it is necessary that it be "made in such a way, as would, if the property belonged to the person making the appointment, effectually pass his title. In this case, the only proof of the appointment is, that Nancy H. Knight, a married woman, separated from her husband, lived with Mrs. Walton, her grand-mother, before and after her divorce, and until her grand-mother's death: that when information of the divorce was received in 1812, Mrs. Walton observed to a witness, as he believes in the presence of Mrs. Knight, "that she had heretofore conveyed certain negroes, to wit: Belinda and her child, Matt, Elsey, and a boy named Ned, to trustees for the benefit of the said Nancy; but now, in consequence of the law aforesaid, I give them directly to Nancy. They are now hers." There was no delivery of possession to Mrs. Knight, nor does it appear that she ever exercised any act of ownership over the slaves; nor is there any further account given of the existence of the deed of trust spoken of. And in Mrs. Walton's will, whilst she gives to several of her descendants, property specified by name, and adds that it is the same before given to them, she gives these negroes to Nancy H. Knight, without intimating that she had given them to her before.

Independent of the Act of Assembly, I should think that such a transaction did not amount to a gift, but only to a declaration of an intention to give at a future period. The Act of Assembly, however, declares that no parol gift of slaves shall pass any estate in them, if the donor has continued in possession, or unless the slaves have come to the actual possession of, and remained with, the donee. This, if it was intended to be a gift or appointment, was therefore void.

Another objection taken to the decree is, that it does not conform to the former decree of the Court of Appeals, in respect to the manner in which the valid appointments made by Mrs. Walton, were to be accounted for by the appointees, if they claimed to participate in the subjects which were unappointed. The declaration 568 of the decree of the Court of Appeals on that point, was, that such parties, to whom valid appointments had been made, could not claim any part of the unappointed subject, "without bringing into account the subject so appointed;" equality being the rule adopted by the Court, in such cases. The Chancellor understood this part of the decree as directing that the parties liable to account, should account for the value of the property appointed, as it was at the time of the appointment; and in this I think he was right. If the Court of Appeals had intended to decide, that the appointee should be placed in the same situation as if he renounced the appointment altogether, so that the property was to be considered as always continuing a part of the estate, they would have directed that the property and its increase, remaining in kind, should be brought into the distribution, and the party held to account for what he had disposed of, so as that it could not be returned in kind. But they direct that the whole subject appointed should be accounted for, without regard to the circumstance whether it remained in kind or not. The Court did not intend to prescribe the manner of accounting, but to leave that to be done upon the ordinary principles applicable to such and analogous cases.

In cases of intestacy, when one of the children had been advanced, if he chooses to bring his advancement into hotchpot, he does not thereby renounce his title, but

*Advancements — Valuation — At What Time. — In Kyle v. Conrad, 25 W. Va. 780, it is said: "Unless under peculiar circumstances, as when perhaps the advancement is a remainder (see Chinn v. Murray, 4 Gratt. 379), the rule is established in Virginia as well as elsewhere, that all advancements are to be accounted for as of the value they bore when received, and that during the life of the intestate, rents, issues and profits should be charged against the heir or devisee. (Beckwith v. Butler, 1 Wash. 224; Hudson v. Hudson, 3 Rand. 120; Williams v. Stonestreet, 3 Rand. 559; Christian v. Coleman, 3 Leigh 30; Knight v. Oliver, 12 Gratt. 33; Purveyar v. Cabell, 24 Gratt. 260.) The reasons for valuing advancements as of the time they were received and not as of the time of the death of the intestate are several, first: Because from the time that the real or personal property is received as an advancement, it is the property of the party receiving it, and if it is lost in whole or in part by destruction or deterioration, it is the loss of the party by whom it is owned, and it is but fair, to compensate the party, to whom such property is advanced for this risk of loss, that, if the property is increased in value, he should have the benefit of the increase. (Beckwith v. Butler, 1 Wash. 225; Kean v. Welch, 1 Gratt. 406; Knight v. Yarbrough, 4 Rand. 569); second: Interest during the lifetime of the intestate ought not to be charged; for if charged it would defeat the main object of the statute requiring advancements to be brought into hotchpot, which is to produce equality among all the children of an intestate father. Advancements are generally made to enable the child to engage with advantage at the proper age in the occupation by which he expects to make his living. If each child is advanced at the same age to the same amount, each is advanced equally, although one be advanced twenty years before the other, each having the same capital advanced for his establishment in life." (Judge Green's opinion in Knight v. Yarbrough, 4 Rand. 569.) To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Chinn v. Murray, 4 Gratt. 379, 387; Kyle v. Conrad, 25 W. Va. 784; Hays v. Freshwater, 47 W. Va. 217, 84 S. E. Rep. 684.
 See further, monographic notes on Advancements" appended to Watkins v. Young, 31 Gratt. 84.

retains it, and is entitled to have so much of the intestate's estate as will, with what he has already received, make his part equal to that of the other children; and in such case, his advancement is valued at what it was worth at the time it was made; which value is added to the distributable fund, without interest or any account for profits. This was the rule adopted in Beckwith v. Butler, 1 Wash. 224, and has been adopted also in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania; and this seems to be the rule in England.

In Kircudbright v. Kircudbright, 8 Ves. 51, it was held that an annuity granted by the father to a son, was to 569 *be brought into hotchpot at its value at the time it was granted; or that the son, at his election, might account for the sums actually received under the grant; and I think these decisions are founded on the best reasons. By the advancement, the property vests in the donee, and it is afterwards at his risque. The profits and increase are the profits and increase of his own property; and the donor can only be considered as having parted with the real value of the thing when given. If the property perishes, or in any way depreciates in value, it is the loss of the donee. He accounts for the value when received, because he has taken so much out of the estate of the donor. The interest, profits and increase, never were a part of the estate of the donor. They are in all cases the fruits, in part at least, of the care and attention of the owner; and if any expense is incurred in securing them, it falls upon the owner of the property. It is a fundamental principle, that the person who has the title to property, bears the loss arising from its destruction or deterioration, and is entitled to its increase and profits. This rule, in cases of advancement and intestacy, and in all cases falling within the same reason, is just and equal. Advancements are generally made to enable the child to engage with advantage, at the proper age, in the occupation by which he expects to make his living. If each child is advanced at the same age, to the same amount, each is advanced equally, although one be advanced twenty years before the other; each having the same capital advanced for his establishment in life. If the eldest son, in such case, had to account to the youngest son, in the partition of the residue of their father's estate, for the interest, increase, and profits, of the money or property advanced to him, he would, in effect, be giving to his younger brother a moiety of the fruits of his care, labor and expense, in the management of the fund advanced to him. The general rule, although it does not give an equality in amount, at the time of the final distribution, if we take into the con-

570 sideration, the interest, profits, and increase *of the advancement; yet it gives, as nearly as any general rule can give, an equality of benefit, considering the circumstances of the parties. To attempt a more perfect equality, by taking into the estimate the interest, profits and increase of the property, in part or in whole, according to the circumstances of each particular case, would be attended with great difficulty and uncertainty, and be the source of infinite litigation. For this reason, by the custom of London, a daughter advanced in marriage, no matter to what amount, is considered as fully advanced, and barred from claiming any benefit of the orphanage part, unless the father declare, in writing, the amount of the advancement, so that it may appear what sum is to be brought into hotchpot. Civil v. Rich, Vern. 216.

It is said, however, that this is not like the case of advancement and intestacy, but rather like the case of a legacy to be equally divided among the legatees; the parties to whom valid appointments have been made, as well as the others, claiming under the will of Walton; and that in case of such a legacy, if the executor delivered to any one of the legatees any portion of the property, before a division was made, the property, and its increase and profits, must be brought into the division. This is true, because such a delivery by the executor could not give a title to the legatee, to the property so delivered. It would remain a part of the original fund, to which each legatee was equally entitled, and its profits, and increase, would, therefore, be a part of the common fund; and if it perished, it would be a loss to the joint fund, unless it perished by the default of the legatee to whom it was delivered.

But, in this case, the parties were not entitled to an equal partition, nor to have their proportions at the same time. Mrs. Walton was empowered to vest the legal title to any part of the property, in any one of the objects of appointment, at any time before her death, by an appointment at her pleasure, no matter how unequal, so that it did not exceed the bounds of a reasonable discretion. She was, in 571 *fact, put into the place of the testator, and authorised to make such advancement within reasonable limits, as he might have made if in life, and to have the same effect as if he had himself made them, to pass the legal title subject to account, in the same way as if they had been made by him, and he had died intestate, or had directed an equal division of the residue, those who had received advancements accounting for them, if they claimed to participate in the residue, as if he had died intestate. This case is, therefore, substantially the same as the case of advancements and intestacy.

Whilst the Court of Chancery rightly decided, that the parties to whom valid appointments were made, if they claimed to participate in the unappointed residuum, were bound to account for the value of the subject so appointed, as it was at the time of appointment, the decree is erroneous in not requiring them to account for interest on that value, from the death of Mrs. Walton. At that time, the rights of the parties to the unappropriated residuum, and an account of the subjects appointed, according to their value when appointed, accrued and vested. The appointees were then entitled, subject to such accountability, to a portion of that residuum, and are of course entitled to participate in the subsequent profits and increase of the property composing that residuum. They ought, therefore, to account for interest on the value of the subjects appointed, from that time. That value is to be considered as a part of the residuum, to be distributed at that period.

There is another error in the decree of the Court of Chancery, which may affect the interests of the parties very materially, in the distribution of the fund in question.

The effect of the original decree of the Court of Appeals, was, that any appointment made by Mrs. Walton, whenever made, or however unequal, was valid, if enough was left to give to every other object of appointment a reasonable share; a rule, which left a considerable latitude of discretion, as the testator intended, to 572 Mrs. Walton, both as *to the time and value of the appointments. This reasonable share was to be judged of, whether the appointment was made to a child or grand-child, by looking to the whole number of children to share in the fund, whether they were dead or alive at the time of the appointment; the grand-children representing their deceased parents, and entitled to such reasonable share, as their parents, if alive, would have been entitled to, to be reasonably divided amongst them, according to Mrs. Walton's discretion, fairly exercised. So that an appointment made to a grand-child, after the death of his parent, was not only to conform to this rule, as to its amount, in respect to what would be reasonable, in relation to his parent and the other children; but in respect to what would be reasonable in relation to the interest of the brothers and sisters of the appointee, in the division of the reasonable share of the parent amongst his or her children. Upon these principles, the question whether any appointment was valid or not, could only be determined by considering its value at the time it was made, in reference to the value of what remained to satisfy the reasonable share of all others entitled. If the appointment was upon these principles, good, when made, no subsequent increase in the value of the subject appointed, or diminution in the value of what remained, could affect the validity of the appointment, nor influence the subsequent distribution of the remaining subject, except so far as to consider so much as the value of the appointment when made, as appropriated to that child, if appointed to a child, or if appointed to a grand-child, then as so much advanced to the stock of that child's parent, and also to that child in respect to his brothers and sisters; and to be regarded and accounted for accordingly, in the distribution of what remained, either by Mrs. Walton exercising the discretion allowed to her, or of any residue not appointed, or not duly appointed, by her.

To illustrate and simplify this idea, let it be supposed that there had been only two children at the time of Walton's death, and one of those children should 573 have died *immediately after the death of the testator, leaving two children; and the property subject to appointment, upon the principles aforesaid, to have consisted of four young female slaves of equal value; and Mrs. Walton to have appointed one of these to the surviving child, and another to one of the grand-children. These appointments would be unquestionably good; for, as between the stocks, they would be perfectly equal, and enough would be left to provide for the other grand-child a reasonable share. Suppose Mrs. Walton to have made no other appointment, and after many years, to have died; one of the unappointed slaves having died, without any increase, in her life-time; the slave appointed to the grand-child having had a great increase, and that to the child, having had none; and the other having increase, which, together with the original slave, and the value of that appointed to the child, when appointed, were of the precise value of the slave and her increase, appointed to the grand-child. According to the principles above stated, if both the child and grand-child appointees come into the partition, accounting for the value of the subjects appointed to them, the subject to be divided would be the value of the appointments when made, with interest thereon from the death of Mrs. Walton; and the slave not appointed, and her increase, and their profits accruing after Mrs. Walton's death. The whole subject thus ascertained, would be divided into moieties, and the child would have so much in value of the unappointed property, as would, with the value of what was appointed to him and interest, make a moiety of the whole. The grand-child appointee would receive so much as, with the value of the subject appointed to her, with interest as aforesaid, would be equal in value to the fourth part of the whole subject. If the grand-child appointee claimed no part of the unappointed subject, the only difference would be, that whilst the child would get precisely the same proportion of the unappointed property, the other grand-574 child would get all the residue, which would *be greater or less than she would get in the other case, as it happened that the value of the unappointed slave and her increase was greater or less. On the other hand, if the increase of the slave appointed to the grand-child, were taken into the account for the purpose of ascertaining what proportion of the unappointed property was to go to the child, and what to the children of the deceased child, and the grand-child appointee claimed no part of the unappointed property, then the other grand-child would get nothing for the slave and her increase appointed to the grand-child; being of the full value of the unappointed slave and her increase, added to the value of the slave appointed to the child. That child would be entitled to the whole of the unappointed property, to make his share equal to that which has gone to his brother's or sister's family.

This consequence and inequality will occur, if the increase of the property appointed is brought into account, either for the purpose of ascertaining when the appointee disclaims any participation in the unappointed fund, the proportion to which the respective stocks are entitled in the unappointed property; or, for the purpose of ascertaining to what the appointee accounting is entitled, out of that fund. This is sufficient to shew, that such increase or additional value from any cause or profits, cannot be brought into account, without over-turning the whole scheme of the original decree of the Court of Appeals.

The decree of the Court of Chancery directs, for the purpose of ascertaining the funds to be divided amongst the stocks, (so as to shew to what proportion of the property not appointed, each stock is entitled,) that the property appointed, whether the appointee claims a portion of the unappointed property or not, shall be charged, with its increase, at its present value, to the stock of which the appointee is a member. This is done particularly as to the family of Susan, one of the children of the testator; to whose daughter Sally Moore, (who renounces all participation in the unappointed residue,) Mrs. Walton appointed 575 pointed *a slave named Dorcas. The decree directs, that this slave and her increase should be estimated at their present value, as a part of the fund devisable amongst the stocks, and should be thrown into one of the nine parts, into which the whole was to be divided; there being nine stocks to come into the division: that this share, including the value of Dorcas and her increase, should be assigned to the children of Susan Morton, one of whose children Sally Moore was; and that, in the division of that ninth part, amongst the children of Susan Morton, the value of Dorcas and her increase, should be left to Sally Moore, as in full satisfaction of her interest in the fund, and the balance of that share divided equally between the three other children of Susan Morton, the brothers and sisters of Sally Moore.

The principle of this part of the decree is clearly wrong, as it has the effect of diminishing the shares of the brothers and sisters of Sally Moore, by the amount of the value of the increase of Dorcas, since the appointment to Sally Moore, although they belong exclusively to her; and may have the effect of precluding them from any participation whatever in the fund.

This erroneous principle is applied to the slaves well appointed to Mrs. Dupuy, which are brought, with their increase, into the account, to the prejudice of Mrs. Dupuy. The errors of the first decree on this point, were probably intended to be corrected by the last.

There is, also a mistake in the decree, in stating that Polly Jenkins had admitted that two slaves had been advanced to her; and that she had, by her answer, agreed to come into the partition, accounting for this advancement. She admitted only one slave Tilla to have been appointed to her; and stating that the slave had two children, declares that she does not choose to bring those slaves into hotchpot. This refusal was probably owing to the belief, as the expression of the answer indicates, that she could only come into partition upon accounting for all the slaves, Tilla 576 and *her increase. She ought now, therefore, to have her election to come into the partition or not, upon the condition of accounting for the value of Tilla when appointed.

There is another error in the decree. Thomas Scott purchased a woman and child of the testator's estate from Mrs. Walton, the trustee and executrix, for $400, which he paid her. The increase of this sale is considerable; and the whole stock of negroes is declared to be a part of the subject to be distributed, upon the ground, that Mrs. Walton could not transfer a greater interest in the slaves, than for her life. That is true, if she had only been a trustee; but she was also executrix, with power to dispose of the property for the payment of debts. Whether it was necessary to sell those slaves for that purpose, does not appear. But, as no fraud or collusion is charged upon the purchaser, he is entitled to claim those slaves as a purchaser from the executrix.

The decrees, in these particulars, must be corrected.

JUDGE CARR, concurred.

JUDGE COALTER.

As to the principal question made in this case, to wit: whether, in cases of valid appointments, and where the subject is to be brought into account for any of the purposes mentioned in the decree, it is to be estimated at its value at the time of the appointment, or at the time of the division, I think the decree is correct in confining it to the value at the time of appointment. I am the more inclined to this opinion, because this Court would not have been without the support of British authority, had it directed the unappointed surplus to be equally divided amongst all the objects of the testator's bounty, without regard to appointments made, provided the dividend so to be made, would have given to each 577 *a share which, if it had been given by the trustee, could not have been declared void as illusory.

This Court seems to have proceeded with analogy to the Statute of distribution and hotchpot, and, taking equality as equity, may well be presumed to have intended that kind or rule of equality, which the Courts have adopted in cases of that kind, and which, if not fully effecting that object, comes nearer to it than any other rule that could be adopted. The parties benefited by this liberal extension to them of the principles governing in such cases, ought not to complain, especially as if the analogy could not hold throughout, the Courts, rather than encounter the difficulties, and perhaps great injustice, resulting from a contrary course, might be driven to the mode of division first above-mentioned.

On the other points I also agree with the Judge who has preceded me, and in the decree prepared to be entered.*

578 *Grays v. Turnpike Company.

December, 1886.

Corporations—Suits by—Proof of Incorporation.—When a corporation sues, they need not set forth in their declaration, by way of averment, how they were a corporation; but they must prove it on the trial.

Same—Same—Same.—This doctrine is equally applicable to motions by a corporation, as to suits brought by them.

Same—Corporate Existence—Evidence of.—What evidence will be sufficient to prove the existence of a corporation, and the regularity of their proceedings. The books of the corporation are proper evidence of that fact.

Same—Rights against Delinquent Subscribers.—If the law authorises a sale of the stock of delinquent subscribers, and if the sale shall not produce the sum due, then a motion against such subscriber for the deficiency; and under this power the corporation exposes the stock for sale, which is not sold for want of bidders; they may then maintain a motion against the delinquent subscriber, under the spirit of the law.

These were two appeals from the Superior Court of Bedford county. The two cases are essentially the same in principle; and the following opinion gives a full view of the questions arising out of them, and of the topics of argument.

Leigh, for the appellants.

Johnson, for the appellee.

December 8. JUDGE CARR.

These were motions made in the County Court of Bedford, by the Lynchburg and Salem Turnpike Company, against the Grays, for failing to pay three requisitions on their shares. The Court gave judgments on the motions for the plaintiffs; and the defendants stated all the evidence, and excepted to the opinion of the Court in giving judgments against them on this evidence.

The two cases were admitted in argument to be the same; except, that in the case against J. P. Gray, there was a motion for a continuance by the defendant, over-ruled, and an exception taken. This may be thrown at once out of the case, with this single remark, that Gray 579 *having had four continuances, and shewing no good ground for a fifth, the Court were perfectly right in ruling him to trial.

Many objections were taken in the argument to the judgment of the Court below. I will consider them in the order in which they were made.

1. It is said that there was no evidence in the record, that the Company was ever incorporated. I find, on examination, that it is laid down in many cases as settled law, that when a corporation sues, either on

Corporations—Suits by—Proof of Incorporation.—When a corporation sues, it is not necessary to set forth in the declaration how the company was incorporated, but it is sufficient for the plaintiffs, on the general issue, to prove their incorporation. Taylor v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Leigh 475, citing principal case as authority. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Jackson v. Bank of Marietta, 9 Leigh 240, 245, and foot-note: Hart v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 6 W. Va. 247, 350; Anderson v. Kanawha Coal Co., 12 W. Va. 587; Central Land Co. v. Calhoun, 16 W. Va. 875. But see Va. Code, 1887, § 3280; monographic note on "Corporations (Private)" appended to Slaughter v. Com., 18 Gratt. 167.

+Same—Corporate Existence—Evidence of.—The corporate existence of a corporation may be proved, by the introduction of its charter and of the minute book of the corporation showing organization under the charter. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Washington, etc., R. Co., 99 Va. 726.

a contract or to recover real property, they must, at the trial, under the general issue, prove that they are a corporation. Hob. 64, 211. 2 Ld. Raym. 1335. 1 Kyd on Corp. 292. Bull. N. P. 107. 8 Johns. Rep. 295. 14 Johns. 216. 10 Johns. 162. 19 Johns. 300. 2 Cow. Rep. 770. They need not indeed set forth in their declaration, by way of averment, how they were a corporation, but they must prove it on the trial; as it is considered a part of their case, to be made out by evidence to the jury. I have found no decisions, either in the English books or those of our sister States, arising on motions made by corporations; but this I presume, is because they have not there the privilege (given to some of them by us,) of recovering debts due them, by this summary remedy. The doctrines, however, which govern suits brought by them, will unquestionably apply as strongly, if not a fortiori, to motions. It is clear then, that to support their motion, it was incumbent on the plaintiffs below, to shew that they were a corporation; and we must examine the record to see, whether it contain such proof. In doing this, I consider the Court as occupying precisely the same ground they stand on, in considering a demurrer to evidence in common actions; and the reason is strong for going to the same extent in drawing all fair inferences. Indeed, there seems to be something of professional management, unfriendly to truth and justice, in counsel's standing by during the progress of the trial, making no specific objection for defect of evi-

580 dence as to "any particular point, (which, if objected to, could be supplied at once,) but excepting to the sufficiency of the whole evidence; and thus taking the chance of all defects or omissions, which forgetfulness or want of skill in the adversary, may present. I do not mean to say, that this is unfair practice; but that it is a course, which (as is said of demurrers to evidence,) ought to be discouraged; and in which, as the adjudged cases shew, Courts will be extremely liberal in supplying positive proof by intentment and inference. The corporation produced, first, the law creating them, which directed that books should be opened at certain towns, to receive subscriptions for making the contemplated road, to the amount of $100,000, and refers to the General Turnpike law, for the manner in which they shall proceed to organize themselves into a corporation. That law enacts, that the books shall remain open, until half of the capital stock be subscribed; public notice of which shall be given by any three of the commissioners, who shall have power at the same time, to call a general meeting of the subscribers, at such convenient place and time as they shall name in the notice. To constitute such meeting, a number of persons entitled to a majority of all the votes, which could be given on all the shares subscribed, shall be present, in person or by proxy; and if a sufficient number do not attend on that day, those who attend may adjourn from time to time, until a meeting is formed. If it shall appear to this meeting, that half the stock is subscribed, then the subscribers, from that time, shall be incorporated into a Company, with all privileges, &c., and shall elect officers, make by-laws, &c. To prove that they have pursued the course pointed out by this law, the plaintiffs produced a book, which J. Bonagh, the clerk of the corporation, proved to be the original corporation book. The book, thus authenticated, was no doubt proper evidence. This is laid down in many cases.

In Owings v. Speed, 5 Wheat. 420, Chief Justice Marshall, speaking on this subject, says, "The books of such 581 "a body are the best evidence of their acts, and ought to be admitted, whenever those acts are to be proved." This book states that, "at a meeting of the Lynchburg and Salem Turnpike Company, at the Franklin hotel in the town of Lynchburg, on Wednesday the 1st of July, 1818, the commissioners having produced the books of subscription for the towns of Lynchburg, New London and Liberty, and it appearing that 876 shares of stock, of $100 each, have been subscribed, amounting in the whole to the sum of $87,600; and it further appearing, that a majority of the stock-holders, either in person or by proxy, are present," &c. proceeding to elect officers, appoint a committee to prepare by-laws, &c.

It is objected, that this evidence does not prove a compliance with the requisitions of the Statute, first, because there is no proof of the notice of time and place of the meeting required by the act. I answer, that the sole end of this notice was to procure a meeting, and set the ball in motion. If this end has been attained, it is fair to presume, that the legal means were employed; and it would be very dangerous doctrine to the numerous corporations we are every day creating, to say, that at any distant period, they should be obliged, in any motion against a delinquent member, to produce the advertisement calling the meeting which organized them.

It is objected, secondly, that the entry in the book does not shew that the meeting consisted of "a number of persons, entitled to a majority of all the votes, which could be given on all the shares subscribed," which the law requires. The entry certainly has not followed the words of the law; and if it intended to express the same idea, it has done it a little awkwardly; yet that it did so intend, I am strongly inclined to think. It must have been apparent to every member, that the law required a majority of the stock to be represented in the first meeting; and to that end, directed that those who first met, should adjourn from 582 time to time, until such majority should attend. We can "conceive no motive for departing from the law.

The meeting consisted of partners in the firm, all interested in putting the institution legally into operation. They did organize it, and it has gone on ever since, without objection that we hear of. Under these circumstances, may we not fairly conclude, that the meeting was a legal one? That by the words "majority of the stock-holders," the clerk meant such a majority as the law required, to wit: holders of a majority of the stock? I think this by no means a strained inference.

It was next objected, that there is not sufficient evidence that the defendants were stock-holders. The original subscription books were produced in Court, with the names of the defendants thereto, the one, J. P. Gray, for ten shares; and he, in Court, acknowledged his hand-writing; the other, B. Gray, for five shares, and as to him, a witness proved, that the hand-writing was like his. It was further proved, that he had stated himself a subscriber for five shares; and in addition, a power of attorney, purporting to be executed by him, was produced, authorising Isaac St. Clair, as his proxy, to represent him in all future elections in the Lynchburg and Salem Turnpike Company. This power of attorney was attested by his brother, J. P. Gray, who testified that he executed it for B. Gray, being empowered by him to do so. This, I think, was abundant evidence to prove the defendants subscribers.

It is next objected, that the notices of the three requisitions, and of the sale of the stock, were not sufficiently proved: that the papers in which they were published, should have been before the Court. It seems to me, that the papers (some of them at least,) were before the Court. The notice is given verbatim, said to be, "in a Lynchburg paper called the Press, dated the 28th of August, 1818; another of the 4th of September; another of the 11th; and another of the 21st, containing the same advertisement." These are the words; and they convey to my 583 mind the idea, that the papers were in Court. Then *follows the evidence of Payne, who states that he saw the notice in these different papers. This evidence is as to the first requisition. As to the second and third, and the notice of the sale of the stock, these notices are first exhibited to the Court, and are spread verbatim on the record, and then Payne swears, that he had examined the file of newspapers, and saw each notice published there for the length of time required. This was, I think, proper evidence, and quite sufficient to satisfy us that the notices were correctly given.

The last objection which I shall examine, arises on the 6th section of the General Turnpike law. That section substantially enacts, that if a stock-holder shall fail to pay the sum required of him, the President and Directors may sell his stock at auction, and retaining the sum due, and all charges of sale, pay the overplus to the owner. And if the sale shall not produce the sum required to be advanced, with the incidental charges, then the President and Directors may recover the balance, of the stock-holder or his assignee, by motion and ten days notice.

The Grays failing to pay the requisitions, their stock was advertised, and cried by the auctioneer, but not sold, for want of bidders; and the question is, are they liable to a recovery by motion for the amount of the requisitions? This has been, to my mind, the most serious objection in the cause; and at one time, I doubted exceedingly whether it was not fatal to the motion; especially when we consider the strictness with which this Court has taken this summary remedy; but my brethren think differently, and further reflection has induced me to believe that they are right. The power to sell the stock of delinquents, was given to the Company, for their benefit. It was thought, no doubt, that this power would coerce the stockholders to punctuality in paying the calls; and if not, would secure to the Company the speedy receipt of the money, by sale of the stock. But, in case this sale should not raise the whole sum, a motion is given for the balance. Now, ought we 584 *to turn this power of sale, given for the safety of the Company, to their ruin? If the stock had sold for a single cent, there can be no doubt that this motion would have been sustained for the whole sum required, even for more than is now required; for the sum given, (a cent,) would not have paid the costs of sale, and the motion would have been for the sum required, with the addition of such costs. In such case, then, the stock-holder would have lost his stock entirely, and been subject, by motion, for the sum demanded; whereas, in the case before us, he is left in possession of his stock, and is only held to pay the sum required, which was certainly the meaning of the law. For it seems clear, that the intention was to give the motion to supply all deficiencies, which could not be answered by a sale of the stock.

The other Judges concurred, and the judgment was affirmed.

Citizenship—How Decided after Lapse of Time.*

—The question of citizenship may be decided, after a great lapse of time, by facts and circumstances leading to a presumption that a foreigner had actually become a citizen.

Wills—Probate—Lapse of Seven Years—Effect.—The probate of a will cannot be called in question, after the lapse of seven years, and no person appearing within that time to contest it.

Same—How It May Be Proved.—It seems, that a will of lands, where two of the three attesting witnesses reside out of the State, and cannot be procured by any legal means, may be proved by the remaining witness, he proving the attestation of the absent witnesses.

Same—Same—State—Effect.—The mode pointed out in the act, "prescribing the method of proving certain wills," 12 Hen. St. at Large, 502, gives an *Citizenship—How Proved.—On this subject the principal case is cited in Dryden v. Swinburne, 30 W. Va. 121, 123.

*Wills—Probate—Conclusiveness of.—It has been decided very frequently in Virginia that, if a court of competent jurisdiction shall admit a will to probate as a will of lands, which appears upon its face or upon the record of the probate, not to have been duly executed as a will of lands, still the sentence is binding upon all concerned in interest and upon all courts as long as the sentence remains in force. That such is the law is regarded as well settled. Ballow v. Hudson, 13 Gratt. 678, citing principal case as authority. A will admitted to probate by the proper court can only be contested by bill, and no party appearing within seven years to contest the will, the probate is forever binding. Vaughan v. Green, 1 Leigh 298, citing principal case as so holding. See further, monographic note on "Wills" appended to Hughes v. Hughes, 2 Munf. 209.

additional mode of proceeding, and does not deprive a party of any which he might have pursued before.

Officers—Powers of—How to Be Pursued.—Where a naked power is given by law to an officer or other person, that power must be strictly pursued, especially if such proceeding involve a forfeiture, and it devolves on him who claims a right under the exercise of such power, to shew that it was, in all respects, exactly pursued.

Tax Sales—What Purchasers Must Shew.—Therefore, where land is sold by a sheriff for non-payment of taxes, it is incumbent on the purchaser to shew that all the steps have been regularly taken, which the law requires in such cases. It seems that although the act of 1783 does not require four weeks advertisement in the papers, before land can be sold for non-payment of taxes, yet the act of 1781, is not repealed in this respect, which requires such a proceeding.

Same—Suit in Equity—Parties.—The parties that are necessary in a suit in equity, to remove the obstruction raised by a sheriff's sale for non-payment of taxes.

This was an appeal from the Richmond Chancery Court. The suit was brought by William Fenwick, surviving partner of Heathcote and Fenwick, against the representatives of Edward Rice, Joseph Strother and Francis Nalle. A complete view is given of the case in the opinion which follows, and of the points made in argument.

Standard, for the appellants.

W. Hay, for the appellee.

December 16. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

Doctor Savage, a resident of North Carolina, held a tract of 1500 acres of land in Culpeper county, by deed from 586 *the proprietor of the Northern Neck, bearing date in 1779. In 1784, Savage, by will, devised this land to Edward Rice, then also a resident of North Carolina. In 1787, 900 acres of this land were sold by the deputy sheriff of Culpeper, J. Strother, for non-payment of taxes due thereon, and bought by himself. He afterwards sold to Nalle, a purchaser with notice of the title which Strother held. After the death of Savage, (but at what particular period does not appear,) Edward Rice became an inhabitant of Virginia; and Tax Sale—What Purchaser Thereunder Must Shew.

—In Flanagan v. Grimmer, 10 Gratt. 425, ALLEN, J., who delivered the opinion of the court, in discussing the laws in regard to tax sales, said, "when the act of February 9th, 1814, was enacted, the legislature was fully aware of the construction which had uniformly been put on laws of this description. Few principles of law were more firmly settled, and from their influence on the transaction of others, more widely known, than that where the validity of a deed depends upon an act in pais, the party claiming under it is bound to prove the performance of the act that in the case of a naked power not coupled with an interest, the law requires that every prerequisite to the exercise of such power should precede it; that the claimant under a sale made to enforce a forfeiture, must show that the law has been strictly complied with; that the recitals in a deed of an officer selling for taxes, were not even prima facie evidence of the regularity of his proceedings; and that these facts must be proved by evidence aliunde. Yancey v. Hopkins, 1 Munf. 419; Christy v. Minor, 4 Munf. 431; Nalle v. Fenwick, 4 Rand. 585; Steed v. Course, 4 Cranch R. 408; Parker v. Rule's Lessee, 9 Cranch R. 64; Williams v. Peyton, 4 Wheat. R. 77; Allen v. Smith, 1 Leigh 281; Ronkendorf v. Taylor, 4 Peters' R. 349." And in Hutchings v. Gilmer, 1 Va. Dec. 501, it is said: "Before the statutes of 1809, 1814 and 1831, all of which have been substantially incorporated in the Code of 1860 and in the present Code, it was firmly established by numerous decisions of this court and of the supreme court of the United States, that a purchaser at a sale for delinquent taxes, in order to maintain his title, must prove affirmatively (himself and his brother Francis, being indebted by bond to Heathcote and Fenwick, 943l. 6s. 1d.) he entered into a contract to sell them his Culpeper land, according to the valuation of certain persons named. This contract was never executed. Heathcote and Fenwick sued the Rices, and obtained judgment. Edward died, without heirs who could inherit, and no will (if he left one) has ever been proved. Fenwick, surviving partner, filed this bill for a sale of the Culpeper land, under the agreement of E. Rice, or the lien of his judgment. Nalle, who bought of the sheriff, was made a party. He answered, died subsequently, and those who claim under him are before the Court upon answers.

The first point for discussion is, whether Rice had a good title; for if not, Fenwick can have no claim to a sale of the land. This point divides itself into two questions. 1. Had Rice a capacity to take and hold land? 2. Was the will of Savage so proved as to pass land? If these two questions be settled affirmatively, then a third will be, was the sale of the land for non-payment of taxes, a valid one?

1. As to the first, it is asserted, that Rice could not hold land, because he was an alien. That he was an Irishman by birth, is agreed on all hands. This throws on the plaintiff the burthen of proof. He must shew, either an actual qualification of Rice as a citizen; or such fact and circumstances, as, after this length of time, will authorize us to presume, that such qualification did take place. No positive proof on the subject is furnished by 587 the record; but, *of presumptive evidence there is no stint. Seven witnesses (and some of them I should take to be very intelligent men,) express their confident belief, that Rice had taken the oaths required by North Carolina, to make him a citizen of that State; and they relate facts, which strongly corroborate their tively that all the requirements of the law have been fully complied with. All the authorities declared that statutory directions which are imperative must be strictly complied with, and no principle seemed more firmly fixed by judicial authority, as well as by the common principles of justice and reason, than that where there is a summary proceeding affecting the rights of property in which extraordinary power is exercised concerning such rights of property, the course of proceeding directed by the statute must be strictly followed. Blackwell on Tax Titles, ch. 17, pp. 300-337, 5 Gratt. 120; 14 Howard 78; 18 Howard 60; 13 Wallace 506; Allen v. Smith, 1 Leigh 231; 4 Cranch 403; 4 Rand. 509. In the last-named case, Nalle v. Fenwick, 4 Rand. 509, the court said: "As a general proposition it will scarcely be controverted that where a naked power is given by law to an officer or other person, that power must be strictly pursued; especially if by the exercise of that power the estates or rights of others may be forfeited and lost; and it will devolve on him who claims a right, under the exercise of such power, to show that it was in all respects exactly pursued." In consequence of the application of these principles to the sale of land for the nonpayment of taxes, it had become extremely difficult to maintain a title claimed under such a sale, it being incumbent on the claimant to prove, at any distance of time short of that which would give him a title under the act of limitations, that every prerequisite to the exercise of the power of sale was strictly complied with, even though such prerequisite were a mere act in pais.

See principal case cited on this subject in Dequasie v. Harris, 16 W. Va. 383; Hays v. Heatherly, 36 W. Va. 628, 630, 631, 15 S. E. Rep. 228, 229. See further, foot-note to Flanagan v. Grimmet, 10 Gratt. 421.

opinion. They say he was an active partizan at elections, and voted both in North Carolina, and after here moved to this State: that such was the temper of the times, and the watchful jealousy of Americans towards foreigners, (as he was known to be,) that it would have been impossible for an alien to have acted as he did, with impunity; and indeed, that no such would have been permitted to remain in the country. Saterfield says, he knew him as an inhabitant of Edenton (North Carolina,) in 1779, if not earlier, and is well satisfied that he could not have remained, without taking the oath of allegiance to the State. Collins also knew him in 1779, and gives the same opinion as to the temper of the times. Ellison authenticates a deed from Savage to Rice for land, in 1783; says they were men of too much intelligence not to know that an alien could not hold land; and that if they had not known, the father of the deponent (who witnessed the deed) certainly did know it, and would have set them right. After his removal to Virginia, several witnesses speak of his activity and zeal at elections; and two, Cowper and Lugg, say, that he was once a candidate to represent the county of Princess Anne in the Legislature. The correspondence between Rice and Savage, beginning in April 1779, shews him to have been then in the employment of Savage, who, (from his letters,) I consider to have been a shrewd, sensible man of business. It is clear from these letters, that Rice possessed his confidence in a high degree. There are articles of co-partnership between them, which shew that they went into trade on joint stock. If all this mass of evidence, after the lapse of 45 years, be not sufficient to authorize the conclusion that Rice was a citizen, what less than point blank proof 588 will do? I confess I feel as well *satisfied of the fact, as if I had before me the certificate, in due form, of the magistrate who administered the oaths under the act of 1777, spoken of by Ellison. Such a certificate might be forged, but it is impossible to doubt the truth of the facts stated by these witnesses; nor can I conceive how they could have happened, unless Rice had been a citizen. I conclude that he was a citizen.

2. Was the will of Savage so proved as to pass lands? In England, the decision of the Ecclesiastical Court upon the probate of a will of personals, was held conclusive evidence that it was the testament of the party, to the full extent to which that Court had admitted it to probate. Thus in North v. Wells, Swinb. 412, citing 1 Lev. 235, the plaintiff gave in evidence probate of a will, to prove an executrix; and the defendant would have proved that the will was forged; but he was not admitted to such proof, because it was against the seal of the ordinary, in a matter proper for his jurisdiction.

In Chichester v. Philips, Sir Thomas Raymond, 404, it was held, that probate granted by the Ecclesiastical Court, is not traversable, but conclusive evidence of the will. With us, Courts of probate have equal jurisdiction over a testament of personals and a will of lands. By the Statute of 1785, it is enacted, "that when any will shall be exhibited to be proved, the Court having jurisdiction, may proceed immediately to receive probate. If any person interested shall, within seven years, appear, and by his bill contest the validity of the will, an issue shall be made up, whether the writing be the will of the testator, &c.; but no such party appearing within that time, the probate shall be forever binding."

On the 19th of June, 1789, the will in the case before us was admitted by the General Court to full probate, "as and for the last will and testament of the said William Savage." This suit was not commenced, until the 2d of December, 1799; upwards of ten years after the probate.

Can we now call in question the probate of this will, or "disturb it in any way? The law says not. It says that no party appearing within seven years to contest the will, "the probate shall be forever binding;" and so say the decisions of this Court. Bagwell v. Elliott, 2 Rand. 198. West v. West's ex'r, 3 Rand. 373.

But, if the time had not elapsed, and we were free to question this probate, I should strongly incline to the opinion, that the General Court did right in receiving it. The will was executed in North Carolina; the witnesses attested it there; and we must presume that their residence was there. The will was afterwards brought to this State, to be proved in the General Court, as the lands lay here. I understand the entry on the records of the General Court, to be this: "that Cosmo Medici, a witness to the will, proved it according to law; and that he also deposed, that Routhack and John Routhack, the two other witnesses to the same, subscribed their names thereto at the request, and in the presence of the said William Savage; and it appearing to this Court, that every legal means have been taken by the said Edward Rice, to procure the attendance at this Court, of the said Routhack and John Routhack, who are out of this State, to testify concerning the said will, and they not appearing, therefore it is ordered, that the said writing be recorded, as and for the last will and testament of the said William Savage, on the evidence of the said Cosmo Medici." The witnesses residing out of the State, and every legal means having been taken to procure their attendance, without effect, it would seem to present the same case as if they were dead. They were equally beyond the power of the Court; and in case of their death, I presume there could be no doubt that their attestation might be proved by the remaining witness; or that, if all had been dead, their handwriting might be proved.

It was said in the argument, that the mode prescribed in the act, "prescribing the method of proving certain wills," 12 Hen. Stat. at Large, 502, ought to have been pursued; "but I consider the provisions of that Statute, as made in aid of parties claiming under a will, and giving them an additional mode of proceeding; not depriving them of any which they might have pursued before. I therefore incline to think, that if this question were open, the decision of the General Court would be approved; but as it is not open, I would not be considered as giving a decided opinion on the point.

3. The third and great point in the cause, relates to the sale of the land made by the sheriff. It is contended for the appellants, that it is a good and valid sale; by the appellees, that it is invalid and void. As a general proposition, it will scarcely be controverted, that where a naked power is given by law, to an officer or other person, that power must be strictly pursued; especially if, by the exercise of that power, the estates or rights of others, may be forfeited and lost; and it will devolve on him who claims a right under the exercise of such power, to shew that it was, in all respects, exactly pursued.

In proof of this, there could not be a case stronger or more exactly in point, than that of Williams v. Peyton, 4 Wheat. 77. That was an ejectment brought by the original patentee, against a purchaser at a sale made for non-payment of the direct tax imposed by an act of Congress. The plaintiff exhibited his title. The defendant gave in evidence the books of the supervisor, shewing that the tax on the land was charged to the plaintiff; and that it had been sold for the non-payment thereof. He also gave in evidence the deed of the Marshal, executed in pursuance of the act of Congress; and proved by the plaintiff's agent that he did not pay the taxes, or redeem the land. Upon this evidence, the Court below instructed the jury, that the purchaser, under the sale of lands for the non-payment of the direct tax, to make out title, must shew, that the collector had advertised the land, and performed the other requisites of the law; otherwise, he made out no title; and that the Marshal's deed and the other evidence were not *prima facie evidence, that the land had been advertised, or the requisites of the law complied with. On appeal, this instruction was decided by the Federal Court to be correct. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the Court. In his own clear and strong manner, he says, "It is a general principle, that the party who sets up a title, must furnish the evidence necessary to support it. If the validity of a deed depends on an act in pais, the party claiming under that deed, is as much bound to prove the performance of that act, as he would be bound to prove any matter of record on which its validity might depend. It forms a part of his title; it is a link in the chain which is essential to its continuity, and which it is incumbent on him to preserve." The act under which the land was sold, directed that it should be advertised for two months, in six different public places within the district, and in two Gazettes in the State, if there be so many. Upon this part of the case, the Chief Justice observes, "The purchaser ought to preserve these Gazettes, and the proof that these publications were made. It is imposing no greater hardship on him to require it, than it is to require him to prove that a power of attorney, in a case in which his deed had been executed by an attorney, was really given by the principal. But, to require from the original proprietor proof that these acts were not performed by the collector, would be to impose on him a task, always difficult, and sometimes impossible to be performed."

The same principle is strongly laid down in Hopkins v. Yancey, 1 Munf. 318, and Christy v. Minor, 4 Munf. 431.

In 1781, the Legislature passed a law, entitled "an act for ascertaining certain taxes and duties, and for establishing a permanent revenue." 10 Hen. Stat. at Large, 501. By it, (among other things) it is directed, that the several County Courts shall annually, at their February Court, appoint three reputable freeholders of the county, to be commissioners to ascertain the value of all the lands 592 within the *same, (except their own:)

that after taking the oath prescribed, the two first named shall proceed to take an account in writing, of the quantity of the lands, and the names of the proprietors thereof, and shall ascertain their value by the acre: that they shall make out a fair list of the names of the owners of lands and lots, and the quantity and value of the lands belonging to each; and shall return the same to the clerk of the Court of their county, by the 1st of June annually: that each clerk shall file the list in his office, and make out three fair copies; one he shall deliver to the Auditor, by 1st of August annually; another, set up at the Court-house, on the next Court day; and the third, deliver to the sheriff or collector by the 10th of June in each year. The law then fixes the land tax at one pound in the hundred, on the assessed value; and goes on to lay taxes on persons and personal property. After the 1st of June, the sheriff may collect taxes, and after the 1st of July, may distrain the lands, slaves, goods and chattels of delinquents; and if the amount due be not paid, in five days after such distress, he may sell, giving six days notice of the day and place of sale, by advertising the same at the church or other public places in the parish, on the next Sunday after the expiration of the five days; provided, that in all cases where land shall be seized under this act, there shall be given at least four weeks notice in the public papers, before any sale shall be made of the same; and where there are other sufficient effects, no distress of land is to be made. The law then directs, that the sheriff shall account for and pay into the treasury, by the 1st of September, the full amount of taxes, &c. and on failure, subjects him to a judgment on motion before the General Court.

In the October session of 1782, there passed two acts on this subject; the first, entitled "an act to amend and reduce the several acts of Assembly, for ascertaining certain taxes and duties, and for establishing a permanent revenue, into one act." Hen. Stat. at Large, vol. 11, p. 112; the second, entitled "an act, 593 for equalising the land tax." *These

Acts make some small changes in the taxes, (one of which will be more particularly noticed hereafter;) but they do not materially affect the great scheme for laying and collecting the taxes established by the Act of 1781. This is the Act under which the sheriff proceeded in selling the land; as his deed proves, in which he refers to this Act by its title, as that under which he had sold the land. By this Act then, we will test the correctness of his proceeding.

1. To authorise the sheriff to sell any land for non-payment of taxes, he must shew that it had been actually taxed; that is, that the Commissioners had valued and rated it, and returned it in their list to the clerk. Without this, there could be no tax collected. The sheriff would have no means to ascertain the amount; no authority to levy it. The list of the Commissioners was his guide, and his warrant of distress. We have not only the reason of the thing for this, but we have an express legislative declaration to the same effect. In the Sessions Acts of 1792, (See Old Rev. Code, vol. 1, 454, Appendix,) it is recited, that "whereas no Commissioners had been appointed in several counties, and from the neglect of the Commissioners in returning a list of the taxable property in several other counties, by reason whereof, no collections of the public taxes have been, or could be made," &c. We have also the case of Kinney v. Beverley, 2 Hen. & Munf. 318, deciding that lands were not liable to forfeiture under the Act of 1790, for non-payment of taxes, unless they had been assessed and listed by the Commissioners, and returned to the Auditor, &c. We have also the case of Yancey v. Hopkins, 1 Munf. 419, deciding, that if land be listed by the Commissioners in a wrong name, and sold in that name for non-payment of taxes, the sale will not affect the title of the true owner. This was a case decided on the very law we are now considering. The land was sold within a few months of the time that the land in the case before us was sold; sold too 594 and bought, as here, by the *deputy sheriff; and by him sold, as here, to a purchaser with notice. Now, how can we know in this case, whether the land was listed at all, or whether listed in the proper name, unless we have the lists of the Commissioners before us? The deed of the officer, as we have seen, is not even prima facie evidence of these facts. Nor is it asking much of the party, to require the production of this evidence. The Commissioners return annually their list to the clerk, and he is bound to file it in his office, and to make out three copies; one of these he delivers to the Auditor, and another to the sheriff himself. If this officer had lost his own copy, he might apply to the clerk's, or the Auditor's office, where these documents are of record, and produce copies. Here then, the very foundation of the proceeding fails.

2. But, secondly, it is incumbent on the appellants to shew, that the amount of taxes, for which the distress and sale were made, was actually due. The advertisement states, that the lands would be sold for taxes due on them, for the years 1782, 1783, 1784, 1785, and 1786; and the sheriff's deed states, that the amount of taxes for which the land was sold, was 371. But, these statements are no evidence. If we had copies of the Commissioner's lists, or of the examiner's books, directed to be made out by the equalizing law of 1782, these documents would shew us what the lands were valued at; and the law would give us the per centage upon this valuation, which had been imposed as a tax. Here we should have certainty; and surely, it is not imposing too much upon the purchaser with notice, from the sheriff, to require this record evidence. This is a second vital defect in the proof necessary to support the sheriff's sale.

3. There is a third. The Act of 1781, requires, that where land is distrained for taxes, there shall be given at least four weeks notice in the public papers, before any sale shall be made of the same. The only evidence we have have of any advertisement, is a copy certified by the 595 clerk of *Culpeper Court. It bears no date; but the clerk states, that the date of the Virginia Gazette, from which it was taken, was the 10th of March, 1787; and the advertisement says, "To be sold to the highest bidder, at Culpeper Court-house, on Wednesday the 21st day of March next," &c. so that taking this paper as proved, (which it is not,) the only publication was on the 10th of March, of a sale to take place on the 21st, eleven days instead of four weeks. It was contended in the argument, that no advertisement of the sale was required by the law. That the law should direct a public sale of property, without notice to be given, would be a perfect anomaly; and would lead to consequences so mischievous, that we could not, without the strongest necessity, be justified in imputing such a course to the Legislature; especially where there has been no judicial proceeding, and where a man's highest estate, his land, was to be forfeited and lost to him, by the summary process of distress and sale for the non-payment of taxes.

It is true, that the law of 1782, ("To amend and reduce into one, the several Acts for ascertaining certain taxes and duties, and establishing a permanent revenue,") does not contain the proviso of the Act of 1781, that where lands are seized, there shall be four weeks advertisement in the public papers, before sale; but then it does not seem to me, that this omission would amount to a repeal, as both laws might well stand together; and this seems to have been the idea of the Court, in Yancey v. Hopkins, where proof of publication was looked to. It seems to have been the cotemporaneous exposition too; for both in Yancey v. Hopkins, and in the case before us, the parties thought a publication in the papers necessary; which must have been on the idea, that this provision of the Act of 1781, was not repealed. And indeed, the sheriff, in his deed, expressly states, that the proceeding was under the law of 1781; and it must of necessity have been so, for the tax of 1782, which was due before the Act of 1782, was passed.

596 *But, if it were clear that this Act of 1782, did repeal the provisions of 1781, requiring publication, and that the clause which says, that where a distress is made, and no payment of the tax in five days, the sheriff may sell, giving six days notice, applies as well to land as to personal chattels; then it follows, that on a distress of land for non-payment of taxes, there must be six days notice of the day and place of sale, given by "advertising the same, at the Church or other public places in the parish wherein such distress shall be, on the next Sunday after the expiration of the five days." These are the very words of the Act of 1782; and the party, claiming under any sale made by virtue of it, would be obliged to produce the proper evidence of this advertisement having been made, at the Church, or other public places in the parish. This is the very point decided in the case of Williams v. Peyton, before quoted.

We have no proof of any advertisement here. So that, upon either hypothesis, the proof is defective of the advertisement required by law; and the sale, in my opinion, void on all the grounds I have stated.

With respect to the objection that the proper parties are not before the Court, I do not consider it well founded. The object of the plaintiff, so far as related to the claim of the Nalles, is to remove the obstruction raised by the sale of the sheriff. In order to do that, it is only necessary to have before us, those who claim title under that proceeding, and they are here.

I am of opinion that the decree of the Court below, should be affirmed.

The other Judges concurred, and the decree was affirmed.*

*Fulton v. Shaw.

January, 1837.

Slaves—Emancipation—Reservation as to Increase—Effect.—Where a female slave is emancipated, with a reservation that her future increase shall be slaves, such reservation is void, and the woman and her increase are absolutely free.

This was an appeal from the Petersburg Superior Court, where Fanny Shaw, a woman of colour, brought an action to recover her freedom, against Elizabeth B. Fulton. At the trial, the jury found a special verdict, the substance of which is fully stated in the following opinion. The Court gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

May, for the appellant.

Spooner, for the appellee.

January 23. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

The first question in this case will be, as to the actual state, the civil condition of Mary Shaw, after the execution of the deed by Fitzgerald. Did that deed emancipate her? If so, then secondly, what was the civil condition of her children born after her emancipation?

In 1723 it was enacted, that no person should emancipate a slave but for meritorious services, and by permission of the Governor and Council. This law continued in force till 1782, when an Act passed entitled, "An Act to authorise the manumission of slaves;" by which it was enacted that "any person, by will or other instrument in writing under his hand and seal, attested and proved in the County Court by two witnesses, or acknowledged, &c. may emancipate and set free his slaves, who shall thereupon be entirely and fully discharged from the performance of any contract, entered into during servitude, and enjoy as full freedom as if they had been particularly named and freed by this Act."

598 *In 1788, six years after the passage of this Act, John Fitzgerald executed the deed in question. It runs thus: "To all persons whom it may concern. Know ye, that I, John Fitzgerald, do by these presents, by virtue and authority of a certain Act of the General Assembly of Virginia, entitled 'An Act to authorise the manumission of slaves,' liberate, emancipate, and relinquish all claim, right, title and interest, to a certain woman slave named Mary Shaw, and now living in the town of Petersburg, reserving to myself, my heirs, &c., nevertheless, an absolute right and claim to all such child or children, which the said Mary Shaw may hereafter bring, or may have born of her body, &c." This deed was executed, attested by two witnesses, and recorded in Court, in exact conformity with the directions of the Act; and from the reference in the deed to the Act by its title literally recited, it is very probable that the law was before the draftsman, when he drew the deed. The deed says, "by authority of the Act, I do liberate, emancipate and relinquish all claim, right, title and interest to Mary Shaw." Words could not be clearer or stronger to shew, that the grantor meant to liberate the slave as fully and completely as the law would authorise; and that declares that slaves liberated in the manner it directs, shall enjoy "as full freedom as if they had been particularly named and freed by the Act."

Upon the execution and delivery of this deed then, Mary Shaw became, to all intents and purposes, free; unless this effect was prevented by the subsequent reservation of an absolute right to any children she might afterwards have. It is clear that it was not the intention of the grantor, by this subsequent clause, to modify or narrow the freedom before given. The clause relates solely to the future increase. The deed bestows present freedom on Mary Shaw. The reservation had no present effect. It could only operate on a future contingency. Mary might never have children. In that case, the reservation would be a nullity. Would such a clause suspend, or in any way affect the freedom

599 *given immediately, and without qualification by the former part of the deed? Unquestionably not. It was said, that this being a voluntary deed, should be construed like a will. This, I think, would be a new rule of construction. We know not what was the consideration moving the grantor; but at law, the seal stands for a consideration, and all deeds are governed by the same rule of construction. If this were a will however, it would make no difference in the construction. We must give to the instrument its true meaning; and that is exceedingly plain. The grantor meant to emancipate Mary Shaw fully and immediately, and to hold in slavery any children she might afterwards have; and the only question is a question not of intention, but of power. Could the grantor, after giving the mother perfect freedom, reserve to himself any interest in her future children? When a female slave is given to one, and her future increase to another, such disposition is valid, because it is permitted to a man to exercise control over the increase and issues of his property, within certain limits. But when she is made free, her condition is wholly changed. She becomes a new creature; receives a new existence; all property in her is utterly extinguished; her rights and conditions are just the same as if she had been born free. After thus divesting himself of all property in the mother, the grantor could not reserve to himself a right to hold her future progeny in slavery. A free mother cannot have children who are slaves. Such a birth would be monstrous both in the eye of reason and of law. The reservation, therefore, was repugnant to the grant; and I need not cite authorities to shew, that in such case, the grant is good, and the reservation void.

But, independent of this rule of construction, such reservation was void by the positive law of the land, then in force; which declares that "all children shall be bond or free, according to the condition of their mothers." This law and its effects are noticed in various cases in this Court; by Judge Pendleton, in Shelton v. 600 Barbour, *2 Wash. 64; by Judge Fleming, in Pegram v. Isabel, 2 Hen. & Munf. 193; and by the Court, in Maria v. Surbaugh, 2 Rand. 228. In this last case, a female slave given to A, till she should be 31 years old, and then to be free, had children before she arrived at 31; and these children were held to be slaves. Why? Because, at their birth the mother was a slave. So here, Mary Shaw, by the deed, was emancipated, made free. The plaintiff was born afterwards. She is free, because that was the condition of her mother at her birth.

I think the judgment must be affirmed.

The other Judges concurred, and the judgment was affirmed.*

Appeal from the Superior Court of Fairfax county.

Kitty, a woman of color, brought an action to recover her freedom, against Fitzhugh. The jury found a verdict for the defendant, and the Court gave judgment accordingly.

601 "At the trial, the counsel for the plaintiff gave in evidence a record of proceedings in a suit instituted in Prince George's county, Maryland, by Catharine Norris against Patrick Sim, in July, 1814, (which said Catharine is the appellant in this cause,) in which she claimed her freedom, in consequence of having been imported into the State of Maryland contrary to the laws of that State, by the said Patrick Sim. In that suit, Patrick Sim, (as appears by that record,) disclaimed any right or title to the said Catharine; and judgment was rendered by the Court, that the petitioner should be free.

The counsel for the plaintiff also offered in evidence Patrick Sim's will, made in 1817, in which he declared that the children of Katy Norris were free, in consequence of their mother having been imported into Maryland, in the year 1804, without performing the acts required to be done by the law of that State; on which ground she had recovered her freedom by a judicial proceeding.

Depositions were also offered, which stated the following facts and circumstances: That Patrick Sim had held Kitty in possession for thirty years, as a slave, until the recovery of her freedom in Maryland; after which she continued to reside with Sim, until his death in 1815 or 1816, (one witness states that he died in 1817,) and has been going at large ever since, exercising the rights of freedom, until she was seized upon by Fitzhugh: that Patrick Sim went from Maryland to Loudoun county in Virginia, in 1801, carrying with him the woman Kitty: that he moved back from Loudoun to the City of Washington about the year 1803; and in 1808 or 1809, to Prince George's county, Maryland, and continued to reside there until his death: that Kitty went with Patrick Sim to Loudoun county, returned with him to Washington, and was in his possession in Prince George's county, Maryland: that P. Sim never acquired a settlement in Virginia, and never kept house there: that Mrs. Sim resided, at the time of the death of Patrick Sim, in Georgetown, in 602 the District of Columbia, "and continued to reside there until she removed to Alexandria, where she has resided to the present time: that Kitty and her children removed to the City of Washington soon after the death of Patrick Sim, where she continued to reside until she was removed by Fitzhugh to Virginia: that a separation took place between Patrick Sim and his wife some time in the year 1802, and they were divorced in the year 1805 or 1806, by an Act of the Legislature of Maryland; and after this event they never did again live together.

A copy of an Act of Assembly of Maryland (but not proved) was also introduced in evidence, by which actions of detinue were required to be brought within three years from the time of such actions accruing.

The next piece of evidence was a mortgage from Patrick Sim to Thomas Contee, by which Kitty was conveyed, with other negroes, to secure a debt due to the said Contee. This deed was dated on the 9th day of April, 1794. The property so conveyed, was advertised to be sold; and Richard Henderson became the purchaser of Kitty, and received a conveyance from Sim and Contee. The conveyance expresses, that the said Richard Henderson desires the said Kitty with her increase to go to the present use or occupation of his daughter Ariana, (Mrs. Sim.) By a codicil to the will of the said Henderson, he gives Kitty and her increase to his daughter (Mrs. Sim) when she shall be capable in law to hold such property in her own right, and failing such capacity, he gives them to his grand-son William Sim, &c.

A certificate of the discharge of Patrick Sim, as an insolvent debtor, dated March 17, 1801, was also given in evidence: that Fitzhugh employed constables and others to take up Katy and her children, who were found in Washington, and carried to Fairfax court-house, and there lodged in jail for safe-keeping. There was other evidence which is not material to this report.

603 "The plaintiff's counsel asked the instruction of the Court to the jury, that if from the evidence the jury should believe that the plaintiff was taken possession of by Patrick Sim, in the year 1802, and held by him in the District of Columbia, until his removal into Prince George's county, Maryland, in 1809: that he took her with him in 1809 into Prince George's county, and held her there until his death in 1819: that in 1815, the plaintiff recovered her freedom by judgment of the Court of Prince George's county against Patrick Sim: that in May, 1819, or previously thereto, he removed to the City of Washington, and from that time until she was seized on by the defendant in October, 1825, resided and acted publicly and openly as a free woman, claiming her freedom under the recovery aforesaid; and that from the year 1802 until 1820, Mrs. Sim resided in Georgetown, and from 1820 until the seizure aforesaid, resided in Alexandria: that in the year 1805, Mrs. Sim was legally divorced from her husband, and from that time, was capable in law of holding property in her own right, under the will of her father, Richard Henderson; then that the plaintiff was entitled to her freedom in this suit; which opinion the Court refused to give, and the plaintiff's counsel excepted.

The plaintiff's counsel also moved the Court to instruct the jury, 'that if from the evidence so as aforesaid given, the jury should believe the matters stated above to be true, and should moreover believe that the said Patrick Sim, had seized and held the plaintiff as aforesaid, from the year 1802 until her recovery of her freedom by the judgment aforesaid under a claim of title to her as his slave, then, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover in this suit; which opinion the Court refused to give, unless with this qualification, that the jury should be satisfied that the possession of the said Patrick Sim did not originate in fraud or violence, and that the said Sim did really and bona fide claim property in the said slave, when he so forcibly possessed himself of her. To this opinion the plaintiff's counsel excepted.

604 *The plaintiff appealed.

Leigh, for the appellant.

Johnson, for the appellee.

January 31. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

Concurring, as I do entirely, with my brother Coalter, in the general view which he has taken of this case, on the merits, I have thought it not amiss to state a separate ground, which, in my mind, justifies the Court below in refusing the instructions asked for by the counsel for the plaintiff.

It is this: that instead of presenting to the Court, the points of law distinctly and separately, as arising out of the facts, and asking on these points the instruction of the Court to the jury, the counsel has presented the whole mass of evidence, and blending fact with law, has asked the Court to instruct the jury generally, that if they believed the facts to be proved, the plaintiff was entitled to her freedom.

In Smith v. Carrington, 4 Cranch, 62, one question before the Court was, whether the Court below erred in refusing to give instructions to the jury, which were asked. The Chief Justice, delivering the opinion of the Court, says, "The difficulty of deciding did not arise from any doubt produced by the facts in the cause, but from the manner in which the question was propounded. After a long and complex statement of the testimony, the counsel for the plaintiffs requested the Court to declare, 'whether if the plaintiffs had actually paid the premium to the underwriters, before any notice of the change of the destination of the ship, they had a right, under the circumstances of the case, to recover the same of the defendant.' Had the plaintiffs' counsel been content with the answer of the Court to the question of law, he would have been entitled to that answer; but when he involved fact 605 *with law, and demanded the opinion of the Court on the force and truth of the testimony, by adding the words, 'under the circumstances of the case,' the question is so qualified as to be essentially changed; and although the Court might, with propriety, have separated the law from the facts, and have stated the legal principle, leaving the fact to the jury, there was no obligation to make this discrimination, and consequently no error in refusing to answer the question propounded."

In Brooke v. Young, 3 Rand. 115, this Court examined this subject, and assigned at some length the reasons why a party, asking the instruction of the Court to the jury, as to the law, should specify the point, and not be permitted to ask instructions generally, as to the law arising out of a complicated mass of evidence; thereby throwing it upon the Court to ascertain all the points of law which might be involved; to separate them from the facts, and decide upon them. To this course there are many strong objections. In the hurry and confusion of a jury trial, points, buried under this mass of evidence, may be overlooked, and this omission may involve a reversal of the judgment; whereas, if the point of law, or the different points arising, had been distinctly put, such a consequence could not follow. The opposite party too, when he heard a specific objection made, might be able to remove it immediately by additional evidence. This course, therefore, is calculated to entrap both the Court and the party. Upon this ground it is, that a party wishing the instruction of the Court on a point of law, is required to give his question a precise shape, and not blend together law and fact.

In the case before us, a mass of evidence filling many pages, is submitted to the Court, and they are asked to instruct the jury, that the plaintiff was entitled to her freedom, if they considered the facts (a long catalogue of which is stated) to be proved. Before the Court could come to the conclusion that the plaintiff was free, observe what they would have to do. This 606 mass of evidence must be carefully weighed and sifted, to ascertain what points of law were involved in it, and then these points must be decided. A few of these points are, 1. What law shall govern the case, that of Maryland or Virginia? 2. Does the Act of Limitations apply? If so, then, 3. From what time shall it run? 4. To what weight is the Maryland judgment entitled? Several other questions might be put as fairly arising on the record. Now is it to be tolerated, that in the hurry and confusion of a jury trial, a Court should be forced in the way of instructions to the jury, to hunt up all these points, and decide on them in the lump? Is this either proper or necessary? If a party wants the opinion of the Court on the law arising on the whole case, let him procure a special verdict, or demur to the evidence; and then the jury are discharged, and the Court deliberates at leisure on all the points which may arise. I have no doubt, that for this reason alone, the Court was justified in refusing the instructions asked.

JUDGE COALTER.

Although the bill of exceptions spreads the evidence in this case on the record, yet we have nothing to do with it, further than to see whether the instructions of the Court were correct in the case, provided the jury should believe that the facts alleged to exist, were proved.

In examining this case, I will consider it as governed by the laws of Maryland, and will endeavor, as far as I am enabled to do so, to pronounce the law of that State upon it. When the law of that State is not in proof before me, I will take the common law as my guide, the party having furnished me with no other.

I will also premise that the question, whether, if the Statute of Limitations began to run as between Col. Sim and Mrs. Sim, in the county of Washington and District of Columbia, whilst they both resided therein, it continued to run after his removal from the District to the county 607 of "Prince George's in the State of Maryland, is not presented by the statement of facts contended for on the part of the appellant. By those facts, if established, the period of three years had elapsed, before that removal; and there is no instruction asked, as to what the law would be in case that was not the fact. That matter, therefore, both as to fact and law, was left to the jury. They may have found, and probably did find, both against the appellants. On this point, the facts contended for as having been proved, were, 1. That Patrick Sim took possession of the appellant in 1802, and held her in possession in the District of Columbia, until his removal into Prince George's county in 1809. 2. That from 1802, until 1820, Ariana Sim resided in Georgetown in the District of Columbia. 3. That in 1805, she was legally divorced from her husband Patrick Sim, and from that time, was capable in law of holding property in her own right, under the will of her father Richard Henderson.

The evidence set out in the record shews, how Richard Henderson became entitled to the appellant; and his will, which is also in the record, so far it relates to Kitty, made in 1801, gives her to his daughter Ariana, when she shall be capable in law to hold such property in her own right, &c.

The Act of Assembly divorcing these parties, is not in the record; and the only witness who speaks of it, says it passed in 1805 or 1806.

As to the removal of Patrick Sim to Prince George's, two witnesses only speak of it. One says it was in 1808; the other, in 1808 or 1809. The time being thus left doubtful, both as to the passage of the law and his removal, the jury may well be supposed to have found that the three years had not elapsed; and it may have been proved to them, that by the law of Maryland, the Statute did not bar, unless the three years had elapsed before the removal.

There may also be a question, which I would not wish to be considered as having decided, in this case, one way 608 "or the other; and that is, how far a slave, who has been emancipated by one, who, but for a possession which by the Act of Limitations bars a recovery by the true owner, had no title and no right to emancipate, can recover his freedom under such emancipation, against his true owner? As for instance, A. takes possession of a slave, claiming him as his own, but who in reality belongs to B. and holds him for more than 5 years; so that, if he was sued by B. he might plead the Act of Limitations, and bar his recovery; and after this possession, he emancipates him, and B. the real owner, gets possession. Can a title to freedom be maintained against B. the real owner, because A.

might have pleaded the Act of Limitations in a suit against him?

The remaining facts, on which it was contended that the appellant was entitled to her freedom, under the first instruction moved for, are these:

4. That Patrick Sim took her into the county of Prince George's in 1809, and held her there until his death in 1819. 5. That in 1815, she recovered her freedom by judgment of the Court of that county, against him. 6. That in May, 1819, or previous thereto, she removed to the City of Washington, and from that time until she was seized in 1825, resided and acted publicly and openly as a free woman, claiming her freedom under the said judgment. And the Court was asked to instruct the jury, that if, from the evidence, they believed these facts, then the plaintiff was entitled to her freedom. This instruction the Court refused to give.

I think the Court was correct in refusing this instruction. The reason why the Court might have been sustained here in refusing to give either of the instructions asked for, and which have been stated by the Judge who has preceded me, applies emphatically to this instruction; for, in addition to those objections to it, the evidence in the record shews, that the statement of facts so submitted, excluded all those belonging to the defence, and which, if believed, would support that defence and justify a contrary 609 "finding; as for instance, whether a bare possession for the time required by the Act, by one not claiming title or property, but on the contrary disclaiming such property, will, by such mere possession and lapse of time, vest a title in the possessor? Or whether, if such possession is obtained and retained by fraud or false pretence, length of time will give property?

As to the Maryland judgment, it could have no effect in favor of the appellant, except against Sim and those claiming under him, posterior to the judgment.

The object of that judgment, and of the will of Sim, seems to have been, to admit and establish certain fictitious facts, and thereby prove a right to freedom in the appellant, on the return of Sim and wife from Virginia in 1801 or 1802, and prior to the time when he took possession of her; so as to shew in fact, that at that time she was a free person. The intention of this collusive judgment was, doubtless, to defeat the rights of Mrs. Sim, under the will of her father. The Court, therefore, probably erred in not directing the jury to weigh these facts, in the consideration of the question, whether the possession of Sim was unaccompanied by circumstances of fraud, and whether it was accompanied by a real and bona fide claim of property in himself, adverse to that of Mrs. Sim. But, as this error, if it is one, is against the appellee, it is unnecessary to consider it further, inasmuch as I am of opinion, that there is no error in the proceedings, of which the appellant can complain.

The second instruction moved for, was this: that if, from the evidence, the jury believed the matters stated in the preceding prayer to be true, and should moreover believe that the said Patrick Sim had seized and held the plaintiff as aforesaid, from the year 1802, until her recovery of freedom by judgment as aforesaid, under a claim of title to her as his slave, then that the plaintiff was entitled to recover in this suit; which opinion the Court refused to give, unless under this qualification, 610 that the jury should *be satisfied that the possession of the said Patrick Sim did not originate in fraud or violence, and that the said Sim did really and bona fide claim property in the said slave, when he forcibly possessed himself of her. By this I understand the Court to mean, that if the possession originated in fraud, no title could vest in Sim, by reason of lapse of time; and even if by violence, as the word seize in the instruction asked for, would seem to import, (thereby shewing a possession contrary to the consent of the owner,) that lapse of time would not give property under such possession, unless he did really and bona fide claim property in the said slave, when he so forcibly possessed himself of her.

As the evidence in this case shews no breach of the peace in getting possession, or any thing beyond that force which attends the taking away property which would not go itself, I cannot suppose that the Judge intended to raise the question, how far the Courts would discourage breaches of the peace, in taking property really and bona fide claimed by the taker, by deciding that in such cases, lapse of time would not give property. On the contrary, he instructs under the supposition of a forcible possession, by saying that such possession will not give title, unless accompanied with a real and bona fide claim of property. Was the instruction so understood, correct?

I understand that the first branch of it, as to a fraudulent possession, is considered correct; and as the instruction moved for is predicated on the necessity of a possession, accompanied with a claim of property, and which surely ought to be a real and bona fide claim, or it is no claim, I consider the second branch as mainly objected to on a construction of its meaning variant from that I have put on it; and that if it shall have that construction, it is unobjectionable.

On the whole, I think the judgment must be affirmed.

The other Judges concurred in the opinion that the judgment ought to be affirmed on the merits.

Appeals—Dismissal on Motion.*—An appeal taken in the name of a party without his knowledge or consent, may be dismissed as to him, on motion.

This appeal was docketed in the names of Richard M. Scott and others, against Josiah Watson and others. Richard M. Scott, by his counsel, moved to have the appeal dismissed as to him, upon the allegation that the suit was originally taken without his knowledge or consent. To prove this, he filed sundry affidavits. The Court made a rule on the appellees, to shew cause why the appeal should not be dismissed as to Richard M. Scott; and reasonable notice being given of the rule: It was ordered, that the appeal should be dismissed as to him.

Evidence—Question of Freedom.—In questions of freedom, evidence that there had been a belief in the neighbourhood, some 60 or 60 years before, that the female ancestor of the plaintiff was entitled to her freedom, is not admissible. By two Judges.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Chesterfield county, where James Baugh, a man of color, brought an action against Thomas Gregory, to recover his freedom. The pleadings are in the usual form; and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. Judgment was rendered accordingly.

At the trial, the plaintiff filed two bills of exceptions.

612 *1. The first states, that upon the trial, the plaintiff proved by two witnesses that he is the son of Biddy, who was the daughter of Sibyl; that Sibyl was a copper-coloured woman, with long, straight, black hair, with the general appearance of an Indian, except that she was too dark to be of the whole blood: that she was called Indian Sibyl, but her color, and that only, shewed she had negro blood; that he also introduced the deposition of Benjamin Smith, aged 70, who proved that when he was a boy, between 7 and 10 years old, he knew a yellow woman in the family of Peter Ashbrooke, who was called Ashbrooke's old Sibyl, and Indian Sibyl; that she had every appearance of an Indian, and had several children; one by the name of Biddy, and one by the name of Jenny; that Sibyl had long, straight, black hair; and he was always under the impression that she was of Indian descent. The plaintiff also offered to prove, that in the life-time of Sibyl, about the year 1770, it was currently said and believed in the neighborhood, that she was entitled to her freedom. To the introduction of this evidence the defendant's counsel objected. But, the Court was of opinion, that though such evidence was not legal evidence to prove the affirmative position that Sibyl was free, it was legal and proper evidence, as a circumstance with others, to aid the jury in deciding whether the African mixture in Sibyl came from the father or mother, and for that purpose only, and to have such weight as the jury deemed it entitled to. The defendant excepted to this opinion.

2. The second bill of exceptions states,

*See monographic note on "Appeal and Error" appended to Hill v. Salem, etc., Turnpike Co., 1 Rob. 268. The principal case is cited with approval in Franklin v. Peers, 96 Va. 604, 29 S. E. Rep. 321.

†See monographic note on "Evidence" appended to Lee v. Tapscott, 3 Wash. 276.

that after the cause had been argued before the jury, on all the circumstances of the case, the defendant by counsel stated, that the evidence proved the plaintiff to be the son of Biddy, who was the daughter of Sibyl, who was half Indian and half negro, and moved the Court to instruct the jury, that if they so found the facts, that in this action it was needful for the plaintiff to prove, that Sibyl was descended, in the maternal line, from an Indian 613 woman. But the Court *said, that it is true that the jury must find that fact, but that the Court would not instruct the jury, that further evidence to prove it, was of legal necessity, to be given by the plaintiff: that it was a question to be decided on probabilities and circumstances; among which, it was lawful for the jury to consider facts connected with the history of the country, as if formally proved to them; and if, at the time spoken of, it was much more common for female Indians to be captured and domesticated among us, than males, that circumstance might be regarded by them as of some weight, and in the case before them, they should attentively consider all the circumstances, and find for the plaintiff, if they believed that Sibyl's mother was an Indian woman; otherwise, they should find for the defendant. To this opinion, the defendant excepted.

The defendant appealed.

Leigh, for the appellant.

Bacchus, for the appellee.

February 14. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

The appellee sued the appellant for freedom. The pleadings are in the usual form, putting the question of freedom in issue. The case comes up on two exceptions taken by the defendant to the opinion of the Court.

1. The plaintiff proved by two witnesses, that he is the son of Biddy, who was the daughter of Sibyl: that Sibyl was a copper-coloured woman, with long, straight, black hair, with the general appearance of an Indian, except that she was too dark to be of the whole blood: that she was called Indian Sibyl; but her color, and that only, shewed she had negro blood. He also introduced the deposition of Smith, who said, that when a boy, (between 7 and 10,) he

614 knew a yellow woman in the family of Ashbrooke. She *was called Ashbrooke's old Sibyl and Indian Sibyl. She had every appearance of an Indian; long, straight, black hair; and he was always under the impression that she was of Indian descent. After the introduction of this evidence, the plaintiff offered to prove, that in the life-time of Sibyl, about the year 1770, it was currently said, and believed in the neighbourhood, that she was entitled to her freedom; to the introduction of which evidence, the defendant objected. But, the Court was of opinion, that though such evidence was not legal evidence to prove the affirmative position that Sibyl was free, it was legal and proper evidence, as a circumstance with others, to aid the jury in deciding whether the African mixture in Sibyl came from the father or mother, and for that purpose only, and to have such weight as the jury deemed it entitled to. The plaintiff was allowed to give the said evidence.

2. The second exception is substantially this: After argument of the cause, the defendant's counsel, stating the amount of the evidence to be, that the plaintiff was son of Biddy, who was daughter of Sibyl, who was half Indian, half negro, moved the Court to instruct the jury, that it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove, that Sibyl was descended in the maternal line from an Indian woman. But, the Court said, that it is true the jury must find that fact, but that the Court would not instruct the jury, that further evidence to prove it, was of legal necessity, to be given by the plaintiff: that it was a question to be decided on probabilities and circumstances, among which it was lawful for the jury to consider facts connected with the history of the country, as if formally proved to them; and if, at the time spoken of, it was much more common for female Indians to be captured, and domesticated among us than males, that circumstance might be regarded by them of some weight, and in the case before them, they should attentively consider all the circumstances, and find for the plaintiff, if they believed Sibyl's mother was an Indian woman; otherwise, they should find for the defendant.

615 *The question presented by the first bill of exceptions is, in my mind, a very important one. In Shelton v. Barbours, 2 Wash. 64, the President remarks, "that although liberty is to be favoured, the Court cannot, on that, or any other favored subject, infringe the settled rules of law." In Pegram v. Isabel, 2 Hen. & Munf. 193, Judge Roane repeats these remarks verbatim, and adds, "This decision, therefore, shuts out the pretence, that we can, in this case, take a greater latitude in relation to the rules of evidence, than in any other." In Mima Queen and Child v. Hepburn, 7 Cranch's Rep. 290, the Chief Justice, delivering the opinion of the Court, says, "However the feelings of the individual may be interested on the part of a person claiming freedom, the Court cannot perceive any legal distinction between the assertion of this, and any other right, which will justify the application of a rule of evidence to cases of this description, which would be inapplicable to general cases, in which a right of property may be asserted." I have thought it proper to state these authorities, in order to fortify the mind against that bias we so naturally fell, in favor of liberty.

This, then, is a general question on the law of evidence. It is well remarked by Lord Kenyon in Rex v. Eriawell, 3 Term. Rep. 707, that "all questions upon the rules of evidence are of vast importance to all orders and degrees of men. Our lives, our liberties and our property are all concerned in the support of these rules, which have been matured by the wisdom of ages, and are now reversed from their antiquity, and the good sense in which they are founded. They are not rules depending on technical refinements, but upon good sense; and the preservation of them is the first duty of Judges." Among these rules, none is more firmly fixed, or rests on a more solid foundation, than this; "that hear-say evidence is in its every nature inadmissible. It violates the fundamental principles which ordain, that any fact which is to affect a person should be proved by a witness sworn to speak the truth, and testifying 616 "in the presence of the party, that he may cross-examine him.. It generally supposes better evidence behind; and even where this is not the case, its intrinsic weakness, its incompetency to satisfy the mind of the existence of the fact, and the frauds which might be practised under its cover, combine to support the rule, that hear-say evidence is totally inadmissible." To this rule, however, there are some few exceptions, which, the books tell us, are as old as the rule itself. These are cases of pedigree, prescription, custom, and in some cases of boundary. These exceptions were no doubt admitted, under the idea that they resulted from the necessity of the case; but Courts have been fearful, (and with good reason,) lest they should let in many mischiefs, and have guarded strongly against enlarging them. This subject is very ably discussed in the case of The King v. The Inhabitants of Eriswell; and though, in that case, the Judges were equally divided, it will be seen by the cases of Rex v. The Inhabitants of Nuneham Courtney, 1 East. 373, and Rex v. Ferryfrystone, 3 East. 54, that the question has been entirely settled in favor of the opinion of Grose and Lord Kenyon, who were opposed to the introduction of hear-say evidence. Grose remarks, "I dread that rules of evidence should ever depend on the discretion of Judges. I wish to find the rule laid down, and to abide by it; and nothing but a clear incontrovertible decision upon the point, and not the concession of counsel, or the obiter dictum of a Judge, ought to form an exception to a general rule of law, framed in wisdom by our ancestors, and adopted in every case, except where the exception is as ancient as the rule."

Lord Kenyon also, speaking of the necessity of defining the exceptions to the rule strictly adds; "For, unless that is done, I am much afraid we may endanger a rule of infinite importance to every individual, and by suffering exceptions to creep on, one after another, leave nothing like a rule." In the case before cited from 7th Cranch, Judge Marshall, after laying down the rule and the exceptions, 617 "adds; "But if other cases, standing on similar principles, should arise, it may well be doubted whether justice, and the general policy of the law, would warrant the creation of new exceptions. The danger of admitting hear-say evidence, is sufficient to admonish Courts of Justice against lightly yielding to the introduction of fresh exceptions to an old and well established rule, the value of which is felt and acknowledged by all. If (he adds) the circumstance that the eye-witnesses of any fact be dead, should justify the introduction of testimony to establish that fact from hear-say, no man could feel safe in any property, a claim to which might be supported by proof so easily obtained."

If I have dwelt longer on this point, than might seem necessary, it is because of my anxiety (by the aid of these great names) to impress deeply a sense of the mischiefs, which may result from enlarging the exceptions to this ancient and venerable rule.

The question before us, is a case of pedigree. The object was, to trace back the descent of the plaintiff, through the maternal line, to an Indian woman. The evidence offered was, that about the year 1770, it was currently reported and believed in the neighbourhood, that Sibyl, the maternal grand-mother of the plaintiff, was entitled to her freedom; and the Court said, that this was legal and proper evidence, as a circumstance with others, to aid the jury in deciding, whether the African mixture in Sibyl came from the father or mother. To ascertain the correctness of this opinion, let us examine a little the extent to which the exception has gone, in cases of pedigree.

In Rex v. Eriswell, (before cited,) Lord Kenyon says, "I admit that declarations of the members of a family, and perhaps, of others living in intimacy with them, or received as evidence as to pedigrees; but evidence of what a mere stranger has said, has always been rejected in such cases."

In Vowles v. Young, 13 Ves. 140, an issue had been directed out of Chancery, 618 in the trial of which, upon a "question of pedigree, what a husband had said as to the legitimacy of his wife, was offered in evidence. The law Judge rejected it, on the ground that the husband did not come within the rule, which limited the evidence to members of the family of the person, whose descent was to be traced. A motion was made to Lord Chancellor Erskine for a new trial, on the ground of mis-direction; and he granted it, thinking the husband clearly within the rule. He says, "The law resorts to hear-say of relations upon the principle of interest in the person, from whom the descent is to be made out; and it is not necessary that evidence of consanguinity should have the correctness required as to other facts. If a person says another is his relation or next of kin, it is not necessary to state how the consanguinity exists. It is sufficient that he says A. is his relation, without stating the particular degree, which, perhaps, he could not tell, if asked. But, it is evidence from the interest of that person in knowing the connections of the family: Therefore, the opinion of the neighbourhood, or what passed among acquaintance, will not do.

This point is again stated in the case of Whitlocke v. Baker, 13 Ves. 511, where Lord Eldon says, "I accede to the doctrine of Lord Mansfield, as it has been stated from Cowper, 591; but it must be understood as it has been practised and acted upon; and one word in that passage wants explanation. It was not the opinion of Lord Mansfield, or of any Judge, that tradition generally is evidence of pedigree; the tradition must be from persons having such a connection with the party to whom it relates, that it is natural and likely, from their domestic habits and connections, that they are speaking the truth, and that they could not be mistaken. The whole goes upon that. Declarations in the family, descriptions in wills, descriptions on monuments, descriptions in bibles and registry books; all, are admitted upon the principle that they are the natural effusions of a party, who must know the truth, and who speaks upon an occasion, when his mind stands in an even position, without any temptation to exceed or fall short of the truth. But, there may be many circumstances forming part of the tradition, which you would reject, taking the body of the tradition." From these authorities it would seem, that the exception which tolerates hear-say in cases of pedigree extends only to the hear-say of those who, by connection and consanguinity, have both the means of knowing, and an interest in making themselves acquainted with, the facts of which they speak, and does not take in every neighbourhood rumor or report. If some of the cases heretofore decided in this Court, on the subject of freedom, should seem to have overstepped these limits, it is by no means my purpose to disturb or unsettle what they may have decided. I have merely attempted to shew what is the rule. The Court has always professed in these cases, as in others, not to intend a departure from settled rules. The doctrine was not particularly laid down in those cases. The opinion in the case before us, seems to me to have gone a step beyond any former decision, and it is to shew its error that I have stated the exception to the general rule.

Suppose we allow the greatest extent to this exception, that any of the cases give, and admit that in the case of persons claiming freedom by descent, through the female line, from Indian ancestors, general report of the neighbourhood should be admitted; still, it must be general report as to pedigree. In the case before us, it should be a general report that old Sibyl was the child of an Indian woman. But, there was no such evidence here. The evidence offered and objected to was, that it was the current belief of the neighbourhood, that Sibyl was entitled to her freedom. What was the ground of that belief, no where appears. Was it a knowledge in the neighbours, that Sibyl was the daughter of an Indian woman? If so, that would naturally have been stated as the reason. Or, was it her appearance, copper color, and long hair? These, we know, she might as well have derived from an Indian *father as mother. Or, was it an idle rumor, which, like a thousand others, had no foundation at all? Suppose a man were to bring suit for a tract of land, claiming it by a descent from a remote ancestor. He proved that he was the son of A., who was the son of B.; but here the proof of descent stopped, being still short of the ancestor. To supply the defective links in the chain, however, proof was offered that it was the current belief of the neighbourhood, some fifty or sixty years past, that B. was entitled to the land. Would this be received as evidence, that B. was descended from the ancestor, so as to complete the chain of descent? I do not think this would be contended for; and yet the two cases seem to me exactly parallel.

The case of Mima Queen v. Hepburn, before cited, was, like this, a question of freedom; and evidence, very much of the character of that offered here, was rejected by the Court below, and a writ of error brought before the Supreme Court, where the judgment was affirmed; the Chief Justice delivering a clear and strong opinion, from which I have already quoted several passages.

Again. In Negro John Davis, &c. v. Wood, 1 Wheat. 6. Error on judgment of the Court below, rendered against the plaintiffs, who in that Court were petitioners for freedom. They excepted to the opinion of the Court, stating that they had offered to prove by competent witnesses, that they (the witnesses) had heard old persons now dead, declare that a certain Mary Davis, now dead, was a white woman born in England, and such was the general report of the neighbourhood where she lived; and also offered the same kind of evidence to prove that Susan Davis, mother of the petitioners, was lineally descended in the female line, from the said Mary; which evidence by hear-say and general reputation, the Court refused to admit, except so far as it was applicable to the fact of the petitioner's pedigree. The counsel for the plaintiffs in error, referred to the case of Mima Queen and Child v. Hepburn, remarking, that unless the Court was disposed to re-view its decision, it must be taken for law; and he could not deny its authority. The Chief Justice delivered the opinion of the Court, and stated, that as to the first exception (the one I have stated,) the Court had revised its opinion in Mima Queen v. Hepburn, and confirmed it. These two cases clearly decide, that though evidence by hear-say and general reputation be inadmissible as to pedigree, it is not admissible to prove the freedom of the plaintiff's ancestor, and thence to deduce his own. I conclude on this point, that the admission of the evidence in the case before us, was erroneous, whether we consider the exception as it seems to be confined by the English cases, to the hear-say of relations and connections; or, extended by our own and the cases in the Federal Court, to general report and reputation.

It remains to consider the second bill of exceptions. The Court was asked to instruct the jury, that it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove the descent of Sibyl in the maternal line, from an Indian woman. Such proof was certainly necessary, and it seems to me that the Court ought to have said so, without further comment. But the Court said it was true the jury must find that fact, but that the Court would not instruct them that further evidence to prove it was necessary, but simply that the fact must be proved. The Court went on to remark, that it was a question to be decided upon probabilities and circumstances, among which it was lawful for the jury to consider facts connected with the history of the country, as if formally proved to them.

I have two objections to this part of the instruction. 1. That it was not called for by the motion, and seemed calculated, (though I am sure the worthy Judge had no such intention,) to influence the jury on the evidence. 2. That it was not, (if I understand it aright,) correct in point of law. "The jury may consider facts connected with the history of the country, as if formally proved to them." This, I presume, cannot mean that the jury are 622 to consider *such facts as if formally proved, when proved; but, that without proof, they are to consider them as if formally proved; that is, that each juror might take any facts as formally proved, which he might have heard of in a way to satisfy his mind, and might consider as connected with the history of the country. If this be the meaning, (and I can see no other,) it is contrary to law; for, it is laid down in all the books, that there must be some proof adduced of historical facts. In the case of Mima Queen v. Hepburn, Judge Marshall says, "There are also matters of general and public history, which may be received without that full proof, which is necessary for the establishment of a private fact."

In Stainer v. The Burgesses of Droitwich, Salk. 281, an issue was directed out of Chancery, wherein the question was, whether by the custom of Droitwich, salt pits could be sunk in any part of the town, or in a certain place only; and upon the trial at bar, Camden's Britannia was offered in evidence, but refused. For, the Court held, that "a general history might be given in evidence to prove a matter relating to the Kingdom in general, because the nature of the thing requires it, but not to prove a particular right or custom." Surely, there ought to have been some evidence adduced of any facts contended for as historical. The jury should all have had the same proof to act upon, and not to be left, each to his own stock of information, whether scanty or abundant, correct or erroneous.

The Court go on to say, that "if, at the time spoken of, it was much more common for female Indians to be captured and domesticated among us than males, that circumstance might be regarded by the jury as of some weight." This is very vaguely expressed; and there is always danger in such cases, of mis-leading the jury. "The time spoken of." What time? There is nothing to specify. If the Court meant the time when Sibyl's mother, (taking her to have been an Indian,) was brought into the country, when was that? From the record it would seem, that Sibyl, about 623 *the year 1760, must have been at least fifty years old, as she was then called old Sibyl. This would carry back the time of her birth to 1710. But, how old her mother then was, or when brought into the country, (if brought in at all,) there is not a single fact in the cause, to give us the slightest information.—Again. What was the evidence, on which the jury was to decide, that it was more common to capture females than males at this period; so vaguely alluded to? None is stated, none in the record. The jury might conclude, that being one of the historical facts before mentioned, they might take it as formally proved, without any evidence being adduced to them; or, they might suppose that they were at liberty to weigh probabilities; and if to their understanding, it seemed more likely that women should be captured than warriors, to conclude that the fact was so in the case before them. It was wrong, I think, to commit the jury to this vague course of surmise and conjecture.

The last part of this instruction is, that the jury should find for the plaintiff, if they believed Sibyl's mother was an Indian woman. I think this was laying down the law too broadly. Taking Sibyl to have been born about the year 1710, and her mother to have been thirty at her birth, she would have been born in 1680, and might have been brought into the country under the law of 1682, permitting Indians to be held in slavery. This act, we know, was in force till repealed (as the Courts have decided) by the act of 1691, permitting free trade with the Indians. It would have been going far enough, I think, if not too far, to have told the jury, that if they believed that Sibyl was the daughter of an Indian woman, it was prima facie evidence of freedom, and threw on the other party the burthen of proving, that she was properly held in slavery or service; for, there were laws allowing this latter. It will be observed that the motion, under which this instruction was given, was made by the defendant, who did not ask the Court to say, that proof of Sibyl's 624 being the daughter *of an Indian woman was sufficient; but, that such proof was necessary for the plaintiff to support his action. The two things are very different.

Upon the whole, my opinion is that the Court erred in both the instructions excepted to; and that the judgment should be reversed, and the case sent back for a new trial, on which such instructions are not to be given.

JUDGE GREEN.

It appears by the bills of exceptions, that the plaintiff was the son of Biddy, who was the daughter of Sibyl: that the latter, about the year 1760, was called old Sibyl and Indian Sibyl, was a copper-coloured woman, with long, straight, black hair, with the general appearance of an Indian, except that she was too dark to be of the whole blood; and her color shewed that she was half Indian and half negro; and that about 1770, it was currently said and believed in the neighbourhood, that Sibyl was entitled to her freedom; which latter evidence the Court admitted, not as legal evidence to prove that Sibyl was free, but as legal and proper evidence of a circumstance, with others, to aid the jury in deciding whether the African mixture in Sibyl came from the father or mother, and for that purpose only, to have such weight as the jury deemed it entitled to. The Court also instructed the jury, that although it was necessary to justify the jury in finding for the plaintiff, that Sibyl descended, in the maternal line, from an Indian woman, the Court would not instruct them (although asked to do so by the defendant,) that further evidence to prove it, was of legal necessity, to be given by the plaintiff: that it was a question to be decided on probabilities and circumstances; amongst which, it was lawful for the jury to consider facts, connected with the history of the country, as if formally proved; and if, at the time spoken of, it was much more common for female Indians to be captured and domesticated among us, than 625 males, *that circumstance might be regarded by them of some weight; and in the case before them, they should attentively consider all the circumstances, and find for the plaintiff, if they believed that Sibyl's mother was an Indian woman; otherwise, they should find for the defendant.

To determine upon the propriety of these decisions, it will be proper to enquire in what cases Indians, under our laws, could be held as servants, and in what, as slaves.

An act of 1655, 1 Hen. Stat. at Large, 410, provided, that all Indian children might be taken as servants with the consent of their parents, for such term as might be agreed upon, provided the covenants for service were confirmed before two justices of the peace, and that they be brought up in the christian religion.

In 1657-8, Ibid. 455, it was enacted, that the service of such children should not be transferred to any other, and that they should be at their own disposal at the age of twenty-five. These are the only acts relating to voluntary contracts of service.

An act of 1661-2, 2 Hen. Stat. at Large, 143, provided, that what Englishman, trader or other, shall bring in any Indians as servants, and shall assign them over to any other, shall not sell them for slaves, nor for any longer time than English of the like ages should serve by Act of Assembly, (if above sixteen, five years; if under, until they attain the age of 24;) and no one was to entertain any of the neighbouring Indians as servants, without license of the Governor.

In 1670, 2 Hen. Stat. at Large, 283, an act recites, that whereas some disputes have arisen, whether Indians taken in war by any other nation, and by that nation that take them, sold to the English, are servants for life or term of years; and enacts that all servants, not being christians, imported into this colony by shipping, shall be slaves for their lives; but what shall come by land, shall serve, if boys or girls, until thirty years of age; if men or women, twelve years and no longer. This act (26 was *the first that alludes to the question of the slavery of Indians under any circumstances, and was made to remove a doubt whether those taken in war by other nations, and sold to the English, were slaves or not.

There are several indications that Indians, before this time, were held in slavery. 2 Hen. Stat. at Large, 155, (1661-2,) there is an order of the Assembly discharging Metappin, a Powhatan Indian sold for life to Elizabeth Short, by the King of the Wainoake Indians, because he had no power to sell him, being of another nation; and in 1670 an act passed, reciting that it hath been questioned whether Indians or negroes manumitted, or otherwise free, could be capable of purchasing christian servants; and enacting that no negro or Indian, although baptised, and enjoying their own freedom, shall be capable of any such purchase of christians.

In 1675, war was declared against most of the Indian nations. In 1676, Nathaniel Bacon rebelled, and took possession of the Government; and in June of that year, the Assembly passed a law renewing the declaration of war, and declaring that "all Indians taken in war be held and accounted slaves during life." Bacon's insurrection being quelled, all his laws were repealed in February, 1676-7; and most of them re-enacted at the same session; and amongst others, it was ordered, that all such soldiers who either already have or shall hereafter take prisoners any of our Indian enemies, at the time of such taking being under a lawful command, under due and full authority, shall retain and keep such Indian slaves to their own proper use. 2 Hen. Stat. at Large, 404. And in 1679, Ibid. 440 it was enacted that the Indian prisoners taken in war, shall be free purchase to the soldier taking the same.

In 1682, 2 Hen. Stat. at Large, 490, an act was passed, reciting, amongst other things, that "those Indians that are taken in war or otherwise, by our neighbouring Indians, confederates or tributaries to his Majesty, and this, his plantation, are slaves to the said 627 neighbouring Indians that *so take them, and by them are sold to his Majesty's subjects here as slaves; repeals the act of 1670 in express terms, to all intents and purposes, and enacts, that all servants, except Moors and Turks, in amity, &c. which, from and after the publication of this act, shall be brought or imported into this country, either by sea or land, whether negroes, Moors, mulattoes or Indians, who and whose parentage and native country are not christian, &c. and all Indians which shall be hereafter sold by our neighbouring Indians, or any other trafficking with us, as for slaves, are hereby adjudged, deemed and taken to be slaves, to all intents and purposes. The next act declares, that Indian women servants, sold to the English, above the age of 16, are tithable.

In 1691, 2 Hen. Stat. at Large, 69, an act passed declaring a free trade for all persons, at all times, at all places, and with all Indians whatsoever. Until this time, there had been continually restrictions in various degrees, upon the trade with the Indians. This statute was re-enacted in 1705, and the General Court in 1777 decided, that after this act no American Indian could be enslaved; and the Court of Appeals have repeatedly affirmed the same proposition; which, however, does not affect the condition of those Indians and their descendants in the female line, who were slaves before the passing of the act.

In 1691, 3 Hen. Stat. at Large, 87, it was enacted, that any English woman, whether free or a servant, having a bastard child by a negro or mulatto, the child should be bound out by the church-wardens as a servant, until the age of 30 years.

This does not apply to the case of an Indian woman servant; but, is mentioned only for the understanding of the subsequent laws.

By the act of 1705, 3 Hen. Stat. at Large, 453, it was provided, that if any woman servant, or free christian white woman, had a bastard child by a negro or mulatto, the child should be bound out by the church-wardens, until 31 years old. This extended to the case of such a bastard 628 *child of an Indian woman servant. An act of 1723, 4 Hen. Stat. at Large, 133, provided, that "when any female mulatto or Indian, by law obliged to serve to the age of 30 or 31 years, shall, during the time of her servitude, have any child, every such child shall serve the master or mistress of such mulatto or Indian, until it shall attain the age the mother of such child was obliged by law to serve unto." This statute was re-enacted verbatim, in 1753, 6 Hen. Stat. at Large, 357; except that it mentions only those mulatto or Indian servants, by law bound to serve 31 years, not noticing those bound to serve to 30 years.

An act of 1765, 8 Hen. Statutes at Large, 134, 135, after reciting, that by the act of 1753, "if any woman servant shall have a bastard child by a negro or mulatto, or if any free christian white woman shall have such bastard child by a negro or mulatto, the church-wardens were directed to bind the child to be a servant until it shall be 31 years of age, which is an unreasonable severity upon such children," provides, "that the church-wardens shall bind out such bastard children already born, and not yet bound out, or which shall hereafter be born, either of white women servants, or of free christian white women, the males to 21, and the females to 18, and no longer;" and, that "the children hereafter to be born of mulatto women, during the term of their service, who are obliged by law to serve to the age of 31 years, shall serve the master or mistress of such mulatto woman, the males to the age of 21, and the females to the age of 18 only, and no longer." An act of 1778, prohibits the enlistment, as soldiers, of "such servants as are bound to serve to 31 years of age."

That the act of 1705, included in the general description of "any woman servant," female Indian servants, I think is perfectly apparent from various considerations. First — the expression literally embraces them; and although the Legislature might not have felt the same anxiety to prevent the connection of negro or 629 mulatto men *with Indian, as with white women, yet they would feel no greater reluctance to bind the child of an Indian woman servant by a negro or mulatto, to a protracted service, than the child of a white woman by a negro or mulatto. Again: The terms of the act of 1691, "English woman being a servant," are dropped, and in their place, the act of 1705 uses the words "any woman servant;" which could only be for the purpose of including the case of Indian women servants; for, there could be no other than those two descriptions of servants. But, on this question, the words of the act of 1723, are decisive. They subject any child of any female mulatto or Indian, by law bound to service till the age of 30 or 31, to a service to the same age. What class of persons fell within the description of female mulattoes by law bound to service, till the age of 30 or 31? The definition given by law, of the term mulatto, by the act of 1705, 3 Hen. Stat. at Large, 252, answers this question. That act is in these words: "and for clearing all manner of doubts which may hereafter happen to arise upon the construction of this act, or any other act, who shall be accounted a mulatto, be it enacted, that the child of an Indian, and the child, grand-child, or great grand-child of a negro, shall be deemed, accounted, held and taken to be a mulatto." This act does not, in terms, state, that to constitute a mulatto, some portion of white blood was necessary; but, that is the necessary construction. For, otherwise a child of a negro by a negro, and of an Indian by an Indian, would have been a mulatto; and after one generation there could have been no Indian or negro, but all would have been mulattoes. Yet, the subsequent statutes speak of Indians and negroes. If, therefore, there was no white blood, the child of an Indian woman, no matter who was the father, was an Indian, and of a negro woman, no matter by whom begotten, a negro; the child belonging to the class of the mother. That this was the effect of the law, will clearly appear hereafter, when we enquire what class of

630 persons was designated *by the word Indian in the act of 1723. By "mulattoes by law bound to serve till 30 or 31," in this act, was meant, the bastard children of white women, whether free or servants, by a negro or mulatto; those born between the passing of the acts of 1691 and 1705, being bound to serve to the age of 30; and those born after the passing of the act of 1705, being bound to serve until 31. No other laws than those of 1691 and 1705, bound any mulattoes to serve until 30 or 31. If the mother was a slave, the child was a slave; if free, the child, in all other cases than those provided for by those acts, was absolutely free. If it were admitted, that the child of a negro and an Indian could be called a mulatto, then no such mulatto was bound, by any law, to serve until 30 or 31, unless the law of 1705 extended to the case of a female Indian servant, having a bastard child by a negro or mulatto. But, the act of 1723, by the term "Indian bound by law to serve till 31," recognized that Indians might, by law, be bound to such service, and provided in relation to the condition of their children born during such service. There was no law, by which an Indian could be bound to such service, unless he or she was a bastard of a female Indian servant by a negro or mulatto, and bound to such service by the act of 1705. The act of 1723, recognizing Indian female servants by law bound to serve till 31, and it being impossible that any other Indians but of that description, should be bound to such service, it follows, that the act of 1723, by Indian servants bound by law to serve till 31, meant the bastard children of Indian women servants, by negroes and mulattoes. No Indian could, in 1723, be bound to such service, except such bastards. The act of 1670, which allowed Indians to be bound to the age of 30, being repealed by the act of 1682, all those so bound must have been free in the year 1712. The act of 1723, called persons descending from an Indian woman by a negro or mulatto, Indians, and not mulattoes; as did the act of 1753, 6

Hen. Stat. at Large, 357, repeating 631 verbatim the *act of 1723. Surely, in 1753, there could be no Indians bound to serve till 31, by law, unless those descended in the female line from an Indian, and in the male line originally from a negro, were so under the act of 1705.

This legal description, designating a descendant of an Indian mother and a negro father, as an Indian, and a descendant of a negro woman and Indian father, as a negro, and neither as a mulatto, was probably, in 1753, and even so late as 1778, (when the law before cited was passed,) familiarly known, and in common parlance, the descendant of an Indian by the female line, and of a negro on the father's side, was called an Indian; and the descendant of a negro woman in the female line, and of an Indian on the father's side, was known as, and called, a negro.

In 1785, an act passed, 12 Hen. Stat. at Large, 184, which is still in force, changing the definition of the word mulatto. It enacts that every person, of whose grandfathers or grand-mothers, any one is or shall have been a negro, although all his other progenitors except that descending from the negro, shall have been white persons, shall be deemed a mulatto; and so, every person who shall have one-fourth part or more, of negro blood, shall in like manner be deemed a mulatto. Since this act, a mixture of Indian and negro blood, if there be one-fourth part or more of negro blood, constitutes a mulatto; but did not, before this act.

The effect of these laws, in respect to the various classes of Indians which might be lawfully held as slaves, or as involuntary servants, or as servants by contract, seems to be, first, as to slaves, that up to 1670, no Indian could be legally a slave. After 1670, and up to the passing of the act of 1778, prohibiting the importation of slaves, all Indians imported by shipping, were slaves; but no Indian brought in by land, could be a slave before the act of 1682, except those taken as prisoners in war by our own troops, under the acts of June, 1676, February, 1676-7, and 1679; after the act of 1682, all brought into this country 632 by sea *or land, whose parentage and native country were not christian, or sold by the neighboring Indians, or any other trafficking with us as for slaves, were slaves. The provisions of the act of 1682, were virtually re-enacted in 1705, and in 1753; the last of which enacts that "all persons who have been or shall be imported into this colony by sea or land, and were not christians in their native country, except Turks and Moors in amity with his Majesty, and such as can prove their being free in England, or any other christian country, before they were shipped for transportation hither, shall be accounted and be slaves, and as such be here brought and sold, notwithstanding their conversion to christianity after their importation."

These acts, so repeated in terms, embrace the case of all Indians imported by sea or land, not coming within the exceptions of the acts, and prove that the Legislature had no idea up to 1753, that the permission to trade with all Indians, allowed by the acts of 1691, and 1705, prohibited the enslaving of all American Indians, as was decided by the General Court in 1777, and repeatedly by this Court since; and so I should have thought, but for those decisions. Even if such a construction of the acts of 1691, and 1705, was otherwise proper, I should have thought that the acts of 1705, and 1753, directly contradicting it, would have prohibited that construction. We have no intimation that the idea that the acts of 1691, and 1705, allowing a free trade with Indians, could have the effect of prohibiting the enslaving of American Indians ever existed until the case decided in 1777, occurred.

Allowing the acts of 1691, and 1705, to have the effect which has been attributed to them, then American Indians coming within the act of 1682, might have been made slaves up to 1691. The Indians, therefore, which could have legally been slaves in Virginia, at the time of Sibyl's birth, were all foreign Indians brought in by sea since 1670; all taken prisoners in war from 1676, to 1691; and all brought in by land and sold as slaves by Indians or 633 *others, from 1682 to 1691, or perhaps, until long after Sibyl's birth.

I am persuaded that few, if any Indians, were brought in as slaves, after the act of 1682; especially of those captured in war. The statutes, as might be expected, notify us of all the Indian wars, in which Virginia was engaged, of the wars of 1623, 1629, 1631, 1632, 1644, 1654, 1675, 1676, and 1677. After the war terminating in 1677, we find no traces of an Indian war, until 1754, when the war with the French and Western Indians began. The war of 1675 was a general one, with all the Indians in our neighbourhood, and ended in 1677, in the total subjection of all the Indian tribes, within the limits of Virginia, on this side of the Alleghany, who submitted to be tributaries, and by our laws, (1705, 3 Hen. Stat. at Large, 467,) were protected in their persons, goods and properties. Those tributary Indians, therefore, could not be made slaves legally, and there was not the least probability, that, in the teeth of this legal guarantee, any attempt would be made to reduce one of them to slavery. As to the more remote Indians, not tributaries, the Five Nations seem to have been the only Indians, with whom we had any intercourse or misunderstanding. They having wars with divers nations of the Southern Indians for many years, took their marches along the frontiers of the colony, and committed many robberies and hostilities. A treaty was made with them in 1722, 4 Hen. Stat. at Large, 103, by which they stipulated not to cross the Potomac, or to pass to the eastward of the great mountains; and our tributary Indians agreed not to pass over the Potomac or to the west of the great mountains, without licenses respectively from the Governors of Virginia and New York; and it was enacted, Ibid. 104, that any tributary Indians violating this treaty should be transported to the West Indies, and sold for slaves. In 1711, 4 Hen. Stat. at Large, 1, to restrain disorderly and barbarous Indians frequenting our frontiers, Rangers were appointed; and it was enacted, that if any *Indian, of any nation at war with us, was taken by the Rangers, he should be transported, and sold for the benefit of the Rangers.

From all this, and particularly from the provision for transporting to the West Indies those who were to be made slaves, instead of keeping them here, I think but few, if any American Indians, were enslaved here, after the great Indian war of 1675.

As to those who might be held to involuntary service at the time Sibyl was probably born, they consisted of those who were bound to service until thirty years of age, under the act of 1670, which was repealed by the act of 1682; (and all those must have been free in 1712;) and the children of the females of these by a negro or mulatto, born during the mother's time of service, and after the passing of the act of 1705, who were to be bound out until the age of thirty-one; and by the act of 1723, the children of those children, born whilst the mother was bound to service, and so their children in all generations, were bound to service until their ages of thirty-one. There were also other Indian servants, bound by their parents with the assent of two justices, until their age of twenty-five, or for a shorter time, under the acts of 1655 and 1657. The children of the females of these by a negro or mulatto, were bound to service until 31, by the act of 1705, if born during the time of their mother's service; and the children of such children were bound to service till thirty-one, under the act of 1723, in like manner as the others. There could no longer be a class of Indians bound to involuntary service, (as English servants were bound) under the act of 1661. That act being repealed by the act of 1670, would have been, as the law then was, revived by the repeal of the act of 1670 by that of 1682, if the latter act had not contained a provision directly against that of the act of 1661, providing that the very Indians directed by the act of 1661, to be bound as English servants, should be held as slaves.

635 *The question whether Sibyl was free or a slave, depends upon the facts, 1. Whether she was descended, in the maternal line, from a negro or an Indian. If from a negro, she was a slave; since her being, and always continuing in service, would have been utterly inconsistent with the supposition that her mother was free; for, a negro woman could at no time be bound to service, unless as a slave. 2. If from an Indian, Sibyl may either have been a slave, because her female ancestor might have been a slave; or free, but subjected to service until she attained her age of thirty-one years, because her mother might have been an Indian servant, bound to service until she attained the age of thirty years, or otherwise, as aforesaid; in which case, Sibyl's being retained in involuntary service until her age of thirty-one, would not have been inconsistent with her right to freedom, after she attained that age.

There is no direct evidence in relation to the quality or condition of the mother of Sibyl; and in the nature of things, there could be no such evidence. No written evidence ever existed, as to what Indians were slaves, and what servants; nor as to the descent of any child from an Indian or negro mother; except that the church-wardens bound, by indentures, the children of Indian servants by a negro or mulatto, till the age of thirty-one, and the Indian parents, with the approbation of two justices, bound their own children at pleasure, not longer than the age of twenty-five. But these indentures were not recorded, and remained either in the hands of the masters, or church-wardens, or justices, and not of the servants; and wherever left, were not likely to be preserved with any care. Such fugitive papers might naturally be expected to be lost within thirty years.

As to these facts, therefore, no direct evidence could be expected to exist, but only parol; and no such evidence could possibly exist, of facts of considerably more than one hundred years standing. 636 Hear-say and presumptive *evidence, therefore, (if any evidence at all was admissible in such a case) was necessarily to be admitted.

The questions, therefore, to be considered, are, 1. Whether any such hear-say and presumptive evidence was admissible in such a case as this; and 2. Whether the evidence offered in this case, was admissible or not.

The fundamental rule of evidence is, that the best evidence which the nature of the case will admit of, must be produced; and this rule is without exception. Another rule is, that no evidence can be received but upon oath; and this excludes hear-say evidence in general. But to this there are exceptions; in cases in which hear-say is not only the best, but the only evidence, which can, in the nature of things, exist. Thus, under the first rule, if the question be, whether an instrument of writing was executed or not; if there be a subscribing witness who is alive, and can be produced, no other evidence of the execution can be received but his testimony upon oath, not even the proof of the admission of the party. If the subscribing witness be dead, or cannot be produced, then the next best evidence is the proof of his hand-writing, which is therefore required and received. If the witness could not write, and his attestation was by a mark only, as no proof could be given of his hand-writing or his mark, the next best evidence is proof of the hand-writing of the party, which is therefore required and received; and if the party was himself a marksman, so that neither his hand-writing nor mark could be proved, then proof of his admission would be admissible. In Keeling v. Ball, 1 Peake's Evid. Appendix, 184, it was held, that a bond to which there were subscribing witnesses, being lost, and the names of the subscribing witnesses being for gotten, proof of the acknowledgment of the debt by the party, and his promise to pay it, was held admissible and sufficient evidence of the execution of the bond; and proof that the bond was printed, and in the usual form, was held to be sufficient evidence that it bound the heirs.

637 But, in such a case, *evidence that a deceased person had said, that he heard the party acknowledge the debt, and promise to pay it, would not have been admissible, because the transaction being recent, the reasonable presumption would be, that if the bond ever had an existence, some direct proof must exist as to the fact; and nothing short of that direct proof would be admitted. But this objection does not exist as to matters, in relation to which, from their nature and antiquity, none but hear-say evidence can possibly exist.

Accordingly, hear-say evidence has always been admitted in questions of pedigree and legitimacy, and that not only as to the actual descent of the party in question, but as to the time of the marriage of the parents, and the birth of the child, and death of the parent or other relation: in questions of boundary and prescription, as of a right of way and other easements or services, and of modus; and not only as to the possession according to the right claimed, but also of the reputation of the existence of the right itself. In such cases, hear-say is admitted, when from the antiquity of the fact and other circumstances, it is not reasonable to suppose, that if the fact in truth existed, it could be otherwise proved. Peake, after laying down the rule that all evidence must be given upon oath, says, "The few instances in which this general rule has been departed from, and in which hearsay evidence has been admitted, will be found, on examination, to be such as were in their very nature incapable of positive and direct proof. Of this kind are all those which can only depend on reputation. The excluding of hear-say in questions of pedigree, prescription, or custom, would prevent all testimony whatever; for, the evidence of any living witness of what passed within the short time of his own memory, would often be insufficient in the former instance, always in the latter; and there is no other way of knowing the evidence of deceased persons, than by the relation of others of what they have been heard to say. In these cases, therefore, the law departs from its general rule, and receives evidence of 638 the *declarations of deceased persons, who, from their situation, were like to know the facts." 1 Peake's Evid. 8, 9; and Buller, in his Nisi Prius, p. 294, says, "So where the issue is on the legitimacy of the plaintiff or defendant, it seems the practice to admit evidence of what the parents have been heard to say, either as to their being or not being married; and with good reason," &c. "So hear-say is good evidence to prove who is my grand-father, when he married, what children he had, &c. of which it is not reasonable to presume I had better evidence. So, to prove my father, mother, cousin, or other relation beyond the sea, dead; and the common reputation and belief of it, in the family, gives credit to such evidence; and for a stranger, it would be good evidence, if a person swore that a brother or other near relation had told him so, which relation is dead. So, in questions of prescription, it is allowable to give hear-say evidence, in order to prove general reputation; as when the issue was on the right of way, evidence was admitted of a conversation between persons not interested, then dead, wherein the right to the way was agreed."

In two cases in Noy's Rep. anon. 28, and Webb v. Pitts, 44, cited in 11 Vin. Abr. 118, pl. 2, 3, it was held, that common fame, proved by two witnesses, was sufficient to establish a modus; or proof by witnesses, "that for a long time, as they heard say, the occupiers of that farm had used to pay annually to the parson, 3s. 6d. for all tithes."

In allowing hear-say evidence, the principle, as to the best evidence which the nature of the case will admit of, is applied; so that, in giving evidence of hear-say, as to pedigree, the reputation must come originally from a member or members of the family, who are more likely to know the truth, than a stranger. Vowles v. Young, 13 Ves. 140. The same rule, as to hear-say evidence, is found in the civil law. Domat, citing the texts of the civil law, 1 Dom. 456, sec. 14, lays it down thus:

"When the question is to prove an ancient fact, of which there are no written 639 *proofs nor living witnesses, if the fact be such as that it ought to be admitted to proof, as for instance, if the matter be to know how long an estate has been in a family, at what time a work was made, or other fact of the like nature, we receive the declarations which witnesses are able to make, of what they have heard concerning the said facts from other persons, who were then alive," &c.

The evidence of hear-say and reputation are in effect the same, and stand upon the same principles, whenever admissible. Are hear-say and reputation, as to the descent and right to freedom of one claiming to be free, admissible in any case? That they are admissible, as to descent, has been frequently decided in this Court; and upon the best reason. From the nature of the case, if the question arises after a great lapse of time, no better evidence can be presumed, or can possibly exist; and, upon this broad ground, the rule admitting such evidence is founded. In the questions of legitimacy, pedigree and prescription, it is admitted, not upon any ground of peculiarity in such questions, other than that such evidence is the only evidence which can exist in such cases; and when, owing to a state of things existing here, unknown in England, a new case arises in all respects like those to which this rule has been applied there, and turning upon the same reasoning, the principle of the law should be applied to such new case. For the same reasons, reputation of the right to freedom may, in proper cases, be received, as the reputation of the right of way, and of a modus.

In all cases in which hear-say and reputation are offered in evidence, it is the province of the Court to determine, upon all the circumstances of the case, whether such evidence is admissible. If it be offered under circumstances, in which it may fairly be presumed, that if the fact existed, better proofs of its existence might be produced, it should be rejected; or, if the evidence is so inconsistent with other circumstances, as to produce only a light presumption, it should be rejected as unfit to be left 640 to the *jury, from which to presume the fact in issue. But, if no better evidence can be presumed to exist, if the fact existed, and if the evidence of hear-say or reputation be so consistent with the other circumstances in proof, as to afford probable grounds to presume that the fact alleged existed; then it should go to the jury, to be weighed by them, even if the Court should think that it was not sufficient to justify the jury in finding the fact affirmatively. Thus, in a question as to a right of way, if the right was alleged to have commenced recently, hear-say and reputation of right would be inadmissible, because it ought to be presumed, that if the right existed, there would be better proof of it; or, if the right was alleged to be ancient, and the possession had been long adverse to the right, such evidence ought not to be admitted against the possession. But, if the possession had been, as far as it could be traced, equivocal, the use of the way being interrupted, or if it were doubtful whether the use of it was permissive, or in the assertion of a right; such evidence might then be properly admitted, to remove the doubt.

So, in a question of slavery. If the claimant and his ancestors had been immemorially held in slavery, and from their race could only be absolutely slaves or free, hear-say evidence, or reputation that they were entitled to their freedom, would afford so light a presumption of the fact, against the immemorial possession of them as slaves, as to be inadmissible. But, if the claimant was of a race, of which some might be absolute slaves, and some bound to service from their birth, until they attained an age considerably advanced, and the possession of them in service was equivocal, and might be the holding of them as slaves, or only as bound to service until a given age; then the hear-say and reputation that they were entitled to their freedom after they attained the age to which they were bound to service, might be admissible. As in the case under consideration. The proofs not objected to, shewed that Sibyl was the child 641 of a negro and an Indian, and was *kept in service all her life, and to an old age. Whether her mother was an Indian or a negro, was the first enquiry. The probabilities were precisely equal, upon the mere fact that she was half negro and half Indian. The circumstance that she was held in service, would have been calculated to induce a belief that her mother was a negro, if no descendant of an Indian woman could be a slave or servant by birth. The circumstance that Indians might be slaves, and bastards by a negro or mulatto man and an Indian woman might be bound to service until they were 31 years old, is calculated to weigh on the other side, in the scale of probability; and, in deciding this question, I think the fact that Sibyl was called Indian Sibyl, and the reputation that she was entitled to be free, were admissible, and proper to be weighed by the jury, with the fact of her being held all her life in service, to determine whether her mother was an Indian or a negro; and if, as I suppose, the child of an Indian woman by a negro was considered and called an Indian, and the child of a negro woman by an Indian was considered and called a negro, both by our laws and in common parlance, at the time when Sibyl was called Indian Sibyl, the fact of her being so called, is proof of a reputation that her mother was an Indian. The legal distinction between the epithets Indian, negro, and mulatto, was probably then perfectly familiar, as many rights under the then existing laws, as that of 1723, depended upon the distinction; rights, which have long since ceased to exist, and the distinction consequently forgotten.

If, upon this evidence, the jury thought that Sibyl's mother was a pure Indian, the next question would be, whether she was a slave or bound to service, until she attained the age of 30, under the act of 1670, or was bound to service by her parents, as aforesaid. On this question also, the continual possession of Sibyl and her children in service, would afford a presumption that her mother was a slave. On the other hand, the evidence as to the age of Sibyl gives reason to believe that she was 642 born between *1705 and 1712; and if of an Indian woman, her father was a negro; in which case, if her mother was free, and bound to service till the age of thirty, and was not thirty years old at Sibyl's birth, or was otherwise bound to service as aforesaid, the latter and all her children, and their children born before she and they were 31 years old, were born free, and bound to service until they attained thirty-one years of age. The presumption that Sibyl was born a slave, founded upon her being kept in service after she attained her age, is met by the proof that she was in 1770 reputed to be entitled to her freedom, which might be founded upon the knowledge that she was born of an Indian woman servant, and therefore entitled to be free at her age of thirty-one. This reputation in 1770, probably could not be founded upon any idea that she was free, merely because she was descended from an Indian woman. For the construction of the act of 1705, authorising a free trade with all Indians, and its consequences that all brought in after 1705, or rather after 1691, could not be held as slaves, was not probably known or thought of till 1777, or at least until after 1770. The presumption too of Sibyl being born a slave, from her being continued in service twenty or thirty years after she was thirty-one, is weakened by the consideration of her servile condition and ignorance from her birth, and the decisive power of her master over her. Upon the whole, I think that this evidence of the reputation that Sibyl was entitled to her freedom, should be left to the jury to be weighed by them, with all the other circumstances of the case, in order to determine whether Sibyl's mother was an Indian, and if an Indian, whether she was a slave, or free woman bound to service, until her age of thirty years, or otherwise.

The Court erred in directing the jury to find for the plaintiff, if they believed that Sibyl's mother was an Indian. It did not follow, if the mother was an Indian, that she was free. She might have been a slave; and in the absence of any other evidence, such as the reputation 643 *that Sibyl was entitled to be free, I should think that the circumstance of Sibyl and her descendants being always held in service, would be conclusive to prove, by a violent presumption, that she was born a slave. But, upon the proofs in the cause, the fact (if the jury should think her mother was an Indian) whether she was a slave or free, though bound to service till her age of thirty or otherwise, should have been left to the jury, without any instruction as to the weight of the evidence.

The other branch of the instruction, mentioned in the second bill of exceptions, is also erroneous. Facts connected with the history of the country, must be proved as all other facts, by the evidence proper to prove them; as by books written on the subject, laws, records, letters or other documents or even by well-supported tradition; the confidence in the facts alleged being regulated in degree, according to the nature of the proofs. This is only another instance of the application of the rules of law already discussed. Such proofs are admitted, because they are the best which, from the nature of the question, can be presumed to exist, and indeed the only proofs which can exist. It does not appear, that the fact that female Indians were more commonly captured and domesticated with us, than males, was proved in any way; but was only conjectured from the greater probability, which was supposed to exist, that the fact was so; and as to the time spoken of, it does not appear what time that was. If it was a time subsequent to 1691, which was the only material time, upon a reference to the Statutes at Large, it does not appear that we had any war with any Indians after 1677, until 1754; whilst the same books give us distinct indications of many Indian wars before 1677. There was, therefore, no probability of any Indians being captured and domesticated by us after 1691. If the captures alluded to, were supposed to be made by our tributary Indians in war against Indians more remote, and the captive brought to us, then, from the same source, we 644 have no information *of any wars carried on by them, except with the Five Nations, who marched southward to attack their enemies, and probably did not bring with them their wives and female children, to be captured. This instruction was calculated to influence the jury upon the preliminary question, whether Sibyl's mother was an Indian or a negro. The conjecture that, from the nature of the subject, it was probable that more females than males were captured and domesticated, was too slight (if indeed the fair presumption was not the contrary) to be admitted as evidence, if it can be so called; or to have any effect whatever, on the decision of any of the questions in the cause.

I have treated the second exception, as properly taken, as I think it was. The Judge, if he had thought after the trial that he had mis-directed the jury, might ex-officio have set aside the verdict, and awarded a new trial. So, if he had doubted whether he had mis-directed or not, and if he thought it proper, upon all the circumstances of the case, to save that question to the party by signing a bill of exceptions, he might rightfully do so, although the party might have lost the strict right to claim it as legally due to him.

The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions that upon the second trial, no such instruction shall be given to the jury as that contained in the second bill of exceptions; and that, if it shall appear that Sibyl was the child of a negro and an Indian, and was born after the passing of the act of 1705, the proof (if offered) of the reputation of the neighbourhood in which she lived, that she was entitled to her freedom, shall be admitted, not to prove that she was free, but to weigh as much as the jury shall think it ought to weigh in deciding the questions, whether Sibyl's mother was an Indian or a negro, and if an Indian, whether she was a slave or free.

645 *JUDGE COALTER.

In order to the better understanding of the questions involved in the case before us, it becomes, in some measure, necessary to enquire into the early state of Indian slavery and servitude in this State. Fortunately, we have a better opportunity of doing this, than our predecessors, who had not the advantages of that valuable collection of our Statutes, which, under the title of "Hening's Statutes at Large," has been furnished to us.

It was not until the year 1733, that an edition of our laws was published in Virginia. An abridgment by Beverley, was published in 1722, and a second edition thereof, in 1728. The collection by Purvis, is supposed to have been published between 1684 and 1687. All these were published in London, and the last is said to have been very inaccurate. So that, at all events, up to 1684, the laws were promulgated here by manuscript copies, read to the people at the Courts, and a copy deposited in the Clerks' offices. See preface to the 1st volume of Hening's Statutes at Large, p. 5.

I mention these things now, because, in the progress of this enquiry, when I shall come to speak of the decision of the General Court, and of this Court, on the subject of Indian slavery, after the year 1691. I shall have occasion to remark, that probably those decisions would have been different, had the present compilation then existed. The result of my examination of the various acts, from 1655 up to 1676, to be found in the 1st vol. of Hen. Stat. at Large, p. 396, 410, 455, 481; and vol. 2d, 143, 113 and 240, is this: That attempts had, in various ways been made to reduce Indians to slavery, as by encouraging Indians to steal Indian children and sell them, by importing them, and by purchasing them from the Kings of their country; all which were prohibited by law, except the last, which seems impliedly to have been sanctioned, by an act of 1661, declaring that a Powhatan Indian, who had been sold for 646 *life, by the King of Wainoake, who had no power to sell him, being of another nation, and that, therefore, he should be free, he speaking perfectly the English tongue, and desiring baptism.

As to imported Indians, another act of 1661 declares, that they shall not be sold for any longer time than English of the like ages should serve by act of Assembly; which acts, as to English servants not indentured, provided that they should serve for five years, if above 16 years of age, and all under, until 24; and by a subsequent act, that they should serve five years, if of 19 years old or above, and if under, until the age of 24.

Thus stood the laws until the year 1670; when, by an act entitled, an act "what time Indians to serve," 2 Hen. Stat. at Large, 283, it was enacted, that whereas some disputes have arisen, whether Indians, taken in war by any other nation, and by that nation sold to the English, are servants for life, or term of years, it is resolved and enacted, that all servants, not being christians, imported into this colony by shipping, shall be slaves for their lives; but, what shall come by land, shall serve, if boys or girls, until 30 years of age; if men or women, 12 years and no longer. The enacting clause seems to drop the distinction between Indians and other pagans, and also, the circumstance of an Indian being captured in war by another nation; and, was doubtless intended to make a general provision, extending as well to Indians as other pagans imported by shipping. Although negroes had been brought into the country as slaves, by some Dutch ships, as early it is said as 1620, I see no law before this to justify their importation as slaves.

After this, until 1682, all Indians imported by shipping were slaves for life, those brought in by land were to serve until the age of 30; with this exception, that in order to encourage and reward our soldiers in time of war, it was provided by the acts of 1676, 1677, and 1679, that Indians taken in war should be slaves for life, and 647 free purchase *to our soldiers. 2 Hen. Stat. at Large, 346, 404, 440.

The next law in order of time is that of 1680, entitled, "an act allowing a free trade with the Indians;" by which it was enacted, that all former acts of Assembly restraining, limiting and forbidding trading with the Indians, be, and stand hereby repealed, and that henceforth there be a free and open trade for all persons, at all times and places, with our friendly Indians. Ibid. 480.

It becomes necessary here, to collate this act with that of 1696, entitled, "an act for a free trade with the Indians," and that of 1705, on the same subject. 3 Hen. Stat. at Large, 69, 468. That of 1691, declares that all former clauses of former acts of Assembly, limiting, restraining and prohibiting trade with Indians, be, and stand repealed, and that from henceforth there be a free and open trade for all persons, at all times, and at all places, with all Indians whatever. This act of 1705, is verbatim with that of 1691, from the words, "there be a free and open trade," to the end.

These acts, then, seem to be essentially and verbatim the same, except the words "friendly Indians," in the first; and "all Indians whatever," in the last two, if that can be called a difference. Neither the act of 1691, nor that of 1705, could have been intended to permit a free and open trade, by people belonging to the colony, with Indians at war with the colony. All others, I presume, would come under the denomination of friendly Indians.

The edition of the laws of 1733, which was the first edition printed in this country, as above stated, and was published by order of the General Assembly, and is said to contain the titles of such acts as are expired or repealed, contains the titles of the acts of 1680, and 1691, above cited, and puts the word expired opposite the first, and repealed opposite the last, Ibid. 82, 44; referring to the act of 1705, ch. 52. Under the act of 1705, it is understood that the General Court in 1777, in the case 648 of Hancock *and others v. Davis, decided that after 1705, no native American Indian could be made a slave. 1 Tuck. Black. part 2, Append. 47. This Court, in Jenkins v. Tom, 1 Wash. 123, and in Coleman v. Dick, Ibid. 233, decided the same thing.

In Pallas v. Hill, in this Court, 2 Hen. & Munf. 149, in consequence of a discovery of a manuscript copy of the act of 1691, above cited, the Court carried back the time when an Indian could not have been made a slave to 1691.

The act of 1680, which I have above cited, I presume was not known at the time of those decisions; for it is not hinted at either by Court or bar. If it had been before the Court, it would seem to me that the same principle would have carried the Court back to the year 1680.

But, whatever might be the legal effect of this law declaring a free trade, did the Legislature intend that it should alter the law in relation to Indian slavery? It seems to me clearly, that it did not; and that this law was not intended to operate on the act of 1670, above mentioned. For I find that two years after, to wit: in 1682, by an act entitled, "an act to repeal a former law making Indians and others free," it is recited, that "whereas, by the 12th act of Assembly of 1670, entitled "an act declaring who shall be slaves," it is enacted that all servants, not being christians, being imported into this country by shipping, shall be slaves; but what shall come by land shall serve, boys and girls until 30, and men and women for 12 years. It then goes on to recite, that "many Moors, mulattoes, negroes, and others, born in heathenish and pagan countries, have heretofore and may hereafter be purchased or obtained as slaves from their native country, by well disposed christians, who may have converted them to christianity, which by law does not manumit or make them free here, and as it often happens that such owner may be enforced to bring or send such slaves here, to sell or dispose of them; and will be obliged to carry them back, or send them to some other place, if they should be obliged to sell them 649 *here for no longer time than the English or other christian is to serve; and whereas also, those Indians that are taken in war or otherwise, by our neighbouring Indians confederates or tributaries, are slaves to those Indians which take them, and by them are likewise sold here as slaves;" it is enacted that the act of 1670, be and is repealed, &c. and further, "that all servants, except Turks and Moors, whilst in amity, &c. which from and after publication of this act, shall be brought or imported into this country, either by sea or land, whether negroes, mulattoes, Moors, or Indians, who, and whose parentage or native country are not christian at the time of the first purchase, though after and before their importation they be converted to christianity, and all Indians which shall hereafter be sold by our neighbouring Indians, or any other trafficking with us, as for slaves, are hereby declared slaves." 2 Hen. Stat. at Large, 490.

The act of 1670, above, bore several titles. The title given in Hening's Statutes, as cited above, is, "What time Indians shall serve." In the act of 1682, and in the edition of 1733, and elsewhere, it is entitled, "an act declaring who shall be slaves." It was certainly, however, considered a statute restrictive of the power of making Indian slaves; as for instance, in case of importations by land, whether by traders or neighbouring Indians, who had taken them in war, and who, by the act of 1670, were to serve only for a term of years, but who, by the act of 1682, are to be slaves. Now, the act of 1680, allowing a free trade, cannot be supposed as intended to repeal the act of 1670, as to Indians imported, as seems evident by the act of 1862 above, which extends the right of making slaves of Indians, far beyond the act of 1670. If, then, the acts of 1680 and 1682, had been before this Court in the decision of the case last mentioned, it seems to me it would have afforded strong ground for a contrary decision. Nor can I perceive any thing in that part of the act of 1705 which declares a free trade, which would have warranted the ships could be made slaves; inasmuch as by this, whether imported by sea or land, they could be made slaves. Now Turks, Moors or negroes could not be brought in by land, so that this part of the law could only relate to Indians. At all events, I am so well satisfied, that, viewing all the laws together, (as we are now enabled to do) that there is some ground to question the propriety of those decisions, I think the Court ought to do nothing which would enlarge the claims to freedom under them.

650 *judgment of the General Court above cited, if they had had the laws above mentioned before them. For it is to be remarked, that even that act, in declaring who shall be slaves, though it takes perhaps a middle ground between the act of 1670 and that of 1682 above noticed, still extends the right to make Indian slaves beyond the act of 1670. It declares that all servants imported and brought into this country by sea or land, who were not christians in their native country, except Turks and Moors in amity &c. and others who can make due proof of their being free in England or any other christian country, before they were shipped in order to transportation hither, shall be accounted slaves, notwithstanding a conversion to christianity afterwards. This law, then, which is enacted at the same session with the act of 1705, ch. 52, allowing a free trade as aforesaid, is broader in its operation than the act of 1670, under which, undoubtedly, Indians imported in

When Indians captured in war, either by our soldiers or by other nations, ceased to be brought in as slaves, or when traders and others ceased to bring them in, it is not easy, at this day, to conjecture. It doubtless, gradually ceased in practice, as our friendly relations with them extended; to which, perhaps, the clause in the act of 1705, ch. 52, 3 Hen. Stat. at Large, 467, contributed; by which it is enacted, that Indians, tributary to this government, shall be secured and defended in their persons, goods and properties; and that whosoever shall defraud or take from them their goods, or do hurt or injury to their persons, shall 651 *make satisfaction, and be punished for the same, according to law, as if the Indian sufferer had been an Englishman. As this, however, did not extend to all Indians, those not tributary would seem to be left as theretofore. I think, however, without any direct repeal of the laws, the practice had probably ceased before 1711; for, by a statute then made, providing for Rangers, &c. they are authorised to apprehend any Indian, have him examined, &c. and if it turns out that he belongs to any of the nations at war with this government, he shall be transported for the benefit of the party of Rangers. 4 Hen. Stat. at Large, 10. So too, by the act of 1722, 4 Hen. Stat. at Large, 104, any tributary Indians, or Indians belonging to the Five Nations, are not to pass certain bounds, &c. and if they do, they shall suffer death or be transported to the West Indies, and there sold as slaves. If it had then been the habit to make slaves of Indians here, I see no particular reason why these should be transported.

Before proceeding to examine the remaining acts on the subject of Indians bound to service for a term of years, it may be proper to make some remarks on the grounds, on which the plaintiff claims his freedom, and which have been fully stated by the Judges who have preceded me. These must be proved, in order to support the plaintiff's action.

Smith, the witness, whose deposition was taken in 1820, and who was then about 70 years of age, testifies that when he was between seven and ten years old, (say between 1757 and 1760) he knew a yellow woman in the family of Peter Ashbrooke, called Ashbrooke's old Sibyl or Indian Sibyl, who had every appearance of an Indian: that she had several children, one named Biddy, and one by the name of Jenny, which he recollects. She had long, straight, black hair, and he was under the impression that she was of Indian descent.

In the year 1758, or 1760, then, Sibyl had acquired the appellation of old Sibyl, 652 had a number of children, and *had been and continued, during her life, to be held in slavery, as her progeny has been ever since. To what number they now amount, is unknown; but one of them has sued for his freedom. It is not probable that she acquired the appellation of old, much under fifty years of age, and consequently was probably born as early as the year 1710. This, however, must be altogether conjecture. Whether she was the first only, or any other child of her mother, does not appear by any direct evidence, any more than whether that mother was a negro or Indian.

But, if the jury were satisfied that her mother was an Indian, did that of itself and without any proof whatever of the condition of that mother, throw the burthen of proof on the defendant, to show that she was a slave? It seems to me that it would not. She might have been brought into the country, even before 1680, and then have been about thirty years of age when Sibyl was born.

In all the cases above referred to, in the General Court and this Court, I understand the plaintiff not only proved Indian blood, but also, by hear-say or otherwise, that the importation of the mother stock was, in all the cases but one, since 1705, and in that one, since 1691. Accordingly, in this case, the plaintiff offered to prove that in the lifetime of Sibyl, viz: about the year 1770, it was currently said and believed in the neighbourhood, that she was entitled to her freedom. This evidence was objected to; "but the Court was of opinion, that though it was not legal evidence to prove the affirmative position that Sibyl was free, it was legal and proper evidence, as a circumstance with others, to aid the jury in deciding, whether the African mixture in Sibyl came from the father or mother, and for that purpose only, and to have such weight as the jury deemed it entitled to."

If it was to have no other bearing; if it was to be no proof whatever of the condition of that mother, further than that she was an Indian, and it was intended to be so restricted; was it a circumstance

653 to prove that her mother *was an Indian? In what way would it simply conduce to prove this, and this only, more than that her father was an Indian? In no way that I can perceive, except in this: that a report that Sibyl was entitled to freedom, if it can be connected with, or considered as having its origin in, the fact that she was born free, then, as it would be more likely that such a report and belief should exist, in case her mother was an Indian, then it would, in case she was a negro, the jury might weigh it, and determine that her mother was an Indian; but unconnected with her title to freedom by birth, I cannot perceive that it was entitled to any weight. If we say that though it may be admitted, that the report and belief did not arise from any knowledge of the party raising it, that her mother was free, but that it arose from a mere conjecture that, as she had Indian blood she may have been free, and of course Sibyl free also; and that, in this way, without having any weight or being entitled to any, as to the freedom of the mother, it might be a circumstance to shew that Sibyl's mother was an Indian, and that only; I think it would behove us well to consider whether hear-say of a title to freedom, resting on mere conjecture, and not on a knowledge of the facts necessary to give such title, would be at all admissible for any purpose? I think it would not.

All hear-say or reputation, to be evidence, must proceed from those who knew the fact itself, and could prove it, if in Court; for, if they were examined in Court, and only proved a conjecture or a vague opinion, arising from facts not sufficient to support the belief, the facts only, and not the conclusion or belief, would be evidence. The evidence, then, in order to prove any thing at all as to Sibyl's mother being an Indian, must, it seems to me, be permitted to go further, and to prove that she got her freedom from her mother; that is, that her mother was a free Indian. For, if the jury ought not to have been permitted, and were not permitted, to consider that it was more likely that the mother of Sibyl would be free, if an 654 *Indian, than if she was a negro, then the evidence would prove nothing as to the condition of the mother, and was only calculated to confuse and embarrass the jury. If, in either case, the mother was equally to be considered a slave, until proved to be otherwise, by other evidence than this report, then it was as easy to believe that Sibyl might be entitled to her freedom as the daughter of a free negro woman, as of a free Indian woman. But, as it could not be legal evidence, (restricted as the literal construction would seem to restrict it,) and as it could not, so restricted, tend to prove that Sibyl's mother was an Indian, and could only do so by its collateral operation on the question of freedom in her mother, was it proper to be admitted for this double purpose, not only to weigh as a probable circumstance to prove that the mother was an Indian, but that she was a free Indian? If it would, then we would not reverse, for the apparent restriction of the evidence to one point when it might have been explicitly admitted for both objects.

Was it properly admitted, or might it have been properly admitted for both objects? Why would it be evidence of both propositions? Because it is said, that unless her mother was not only an Indian, but a free Indian, such report and belief could not have had existence. The evidence, then, must prove first and mainly, that the mother was a free Indian; and if she was, it was not a matter of proof but of law that Sibyl, following her condition, would be free also. What would this be more than to prove directly by this report, that Sibyl was entitled to her freedom? And if so, why could not the jury as well say that this report arose because her mother was a free negro; for, if this was the fact, it would equally justify the report? But, no. It is not as probable that a report would arise from that fact, as from the other, that she was an Indian. Why so? All reports ought to originate in a known fact, sufficient to prove the title resting on it, if the fact itself was given in evidence; and when a report may have arisen 655 from the existence *either of one fact or another, either of which would be sufficient to support the title claimed under that report, and we have no evidence on which of the facts it was founded, by what authority do we set a jury to conjecturing on which of those facts the author or authors of the report founded their opinion? There is no hear-say or reputation, or other evidence, that Sibyl's mother was free, except inasmuch that if Sibyl was entitled to freedom, it may be that she was entitled by birth; but, it also may be that she was entitled to it otherwise. The authors of the report have not stated on what foundation they placed her title to freedom; and as it was not necessary to have birth for its foundation, there is no proof, by hear-say or otherwise, of any fact from which title to freedom in the mother can be deduced. Indian blood, no more than white blood, can give that title. Beyond this, we have no evidence, except a report that, in some way or other, she was entitled to freedom. If a witness had sworn that he believed her entitled to her freedom, (and this is the amount of the report,) it would not be enough. He must say on what ground he believed it; for, that might not have justified such belief. How can hear-say, then, be evidence, when, if what was said, and is so detailed, had been given in evidence by those who had said so, it would not be received? There is no hear-say of neighbours, that they knew Sibyl's mother, or her condition; the hear-say is as to Sibyl herself. They probably knew more about her than her mother; and as they say nothing of the latter, they may have known something by which Sibyl was entitled to freedom, though her mother might have been a slave. All this is conjecture; and I fear, that to admit such evidence, would be going very wide of the legitimate limits, within which hear-say evidence is proper.

But, if admitted to all, it would seem to me more reasonable that a report and belief that Sibyl was entitled to freedom, should be received directly to prove that she herself was free, than to prove that her 656 mother was free, *who might have been a slave, and yet Sibyl be free. For, it does not follow, as the jury were permitted to suppose, that because Sibyl was half Indian, and entitled to freedom, her mother must have been a free Indian woman.

It seems to me, then, that we are brought back to the enquiry; was the Judge right in saying, that this was not legal evidence to prove that Sibyl herself was free? Surely he must have been right on that point. It would be going too far to say, that after the lapse of more than a century, during all which time a woman and her descendants have been held in slavery, that those descendants should be considered as entitled to freedom in consequence of a report and belief in the neighbourhood, that their mother was entitled to her freedom, though she was held all her life as a slave; without any evidence, hear-say or other, from what fact such belief originated. It is impossible to contradict so vague a report. No fact is stated as being reported, nor is any one named as the author of the report; nor is there any thing, concerning which a Court can judge. They must be left to their own conjectures as to the grounds on which such a report has obtained circulation.

But, suppose the jury have arrived at the belief that Sibyl's mother was an Indian; still, the plaintiff must produce some proof that she was a free Indian, or such a strong probability of it, as to throw the burthen on the defendant to prove that she was a slave. Could the plaintiff then say, "I have produced evidence to satisfy the jury that her mother was an Indian: that she must have been in the country prior to 1710, as Sibyl may have been born about that time; and although it does not appear how or when she came into the country, yet, as Sibyl, about 60 years thereafter, was reported to be entitled to her freedom, I have a right to insist that it was so reported, on this ground, to wit: that her mother was an Indian woman servant, not a slave: that she had a bastard child, Sibyl, by a negro man, and which child, though it ought to have been bound an apprentice, and to have her freedom recorded, 657 *&c. was nevertheless held in slavery all her life, and her children after her, for more than a century; and that, through this long detention is entitled to some weight against me, and although I know nothing, and can prove nothing of the ground on which such a report was founded; yet, as it might have originated from the facts aforesaid, if the defendant cannot prove otherwise, the jury must find for me." If such pretension would be right, then the position for which I have above contended, to wit, that a belief that Sibyl was free, cannot prove that her mother was, which, in turn, is to prove that she was, is not correct. In short, I can view the subject in no way, in which I am not brought back to that point.

As to the acts of Assembly in relation to Indian servants, bound to service for a term of years, and that if Sibyl's mother was such, and during the term of her service had a bastard child by a negro man, &c. I had intended to take a view of the acts of Assembly, and to express some doubts which have arisen in my mind, whether the act of 1705 which fines a woman servant 15l. or to be sold for five years, and the child bound until 31 years of age, was intended as anything more than re-enacting the law on that subject, which theretofore existed, and which was confined to whites, and was intended, not to punish the crime of fornication, but to superadd thereto a heavy penalty, in order to prevent the contamination of the white blood. It is not necessary to pursue that enquiry; because, from the view I have taken above, it would not alter my opinion. It is not unworthy, however, of remark, that by the ancient laws, the church-wardens, at their meetings, were to make presentment of certain offences, and amongst others, that of fornication; and to return their presentments to Court, 1 Hen. Stat. at Large, 240; 2 Ditto, 49; 3 Ditto, 140; and that this was the law about the time when Sibyl was probably born. If, too, she was to be bound out until 31, then the records of the Court or church-wardens might shew a presentment or a binding out. 3 Hen. Stat. 658 at *Large, 454. The act of 1705, (and I believe previous acts,) provides also for the recording of the freedom of servants. Now it may be, that none of these things were done, or that the records are lost, &c. But, there is no proof that they are lost; but, as the 15l. penalty, if it would be incurred in this case, went to the parish, it is not very likely that such offences would be overlooked by the wardens.

Be all this, however, as it may, the Judge, as it appears by another exception hereafter mentioned, was of opinion, that if the jury were satisfied that Sibyl's mother was an Indian, the plaintiff was entitled to recover; but, if he was not right as to this broad ground, as I have before stated, then the jury were to be satisfied from this hear-say report. 1. That Sibyl's mother was an Indian; 2. That she was a free Indian held to service for a term of years; 3. That during that time of service, she had a bastard child, Sibyl, by a negro man; 4. That that child was bound to service, under the act of 1705, until she was 31 years of age, and was continued to be held as a slave forever after, contrary to law; or. 5. That he was not bound, but held by the master of her mother, who, by the way, must, according to the above dates, have been free from that service very soon after the birth of Sibyl, and would probably have not permitted such injustice, but had her bound out. It does seem to me, that to permit all these suppositions to be found as facts by a jury, on so vague a rumor, when that same rumor would as well justify the finding of certain other suppositions as facts equally sustaining the report, would be going too far. On the whole, I think this evidence ought not to have been received.

The second bill of exceptions sets out the application of the defendant to the Court, to instruct the jury, that though the evidence should have proved the plaintiff to be the son of Sibyl, who was half Indian and half negro, yet it was necessary that the plaintiff should prove that Sibyl was descended, in the maternal line, from an Indian woman. *The Court gave that instruction, but went on to give further instructions, as has been stated by the other Judges.

I concur in the opinions which have been given, that both branches of the instruction so given and excepted to, were wrong. The judgment must be reversed.*

Slaves—Removal into State—Oath—Presumption.†—A man removing into this State with his slave, takes the oath required by the law of 1792; but it is doubtful, upon the evidence, whether the oath was taken within sixty days after his removal. After a great lapse of time, it will be presumed that what had been done, was done rightly.

Same—Same—Oath—Failure to Take—Effect.—But, if it does not appear, by evidence or otherwise, that the oath was taken within sixty days after the removal of the master, the slave will be entitled to his freedom, when he has remained in the State twelve months.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Hampshire county, where George, a man of colour, brought an action to recover his freedom, against Jacob Parker, who held him in slavery. At the trial, the defendant produced a certified copy of a record from the County Court of Berkeley, in these words: "Berkeley Scil. Appeared before me Gerrard Keith, and made oath that a negro man named George, aged about two or three and thirty years of age, was not imported into this State with a view of traffic or trade, but for his own use. Given under my hand this 19th day of January, 1796.

JAMES MAXWELL."

660 *This certificate was duly recorded in the County Court of Berkeley.

There was another oath taken by Keith on the same day, to the same effect, but more strictly following the terms of the law. This oath was also recorded, in the same manner as the former.

The defendant also produced a witness, who said that he could not say when Keith, the former owner, moved to Virginia, but that he knew that it was after the first day of January, 1795; but whether in 1795 or 1796, he did not know.

Upon this evidence, the defendant moved the Court to instruct the jury, that they ought to presume, after so long a time, that that which appeared to be done was rightly done, until the contrary appeared by rebutting such presumption. The Court gave this instruction, and added, that with respect to the sixty days elapsing before the oath was made, it ought not to be presumed unless proved; and if the oath had been made before the plaintiff had remained altogether a whole year in the State, it was a sufficient compliance with the law, it being, in this respect, directory. To this opinion, the plaintiff excepted.

Verdict and judgment for the defendant; and the plaintiff appealed.

February 14. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

This is a suit brought for freedom, by the plaintiff, as having been imported contrary to the provisions of the act of 1792. By that act, slaves imported into the State, and remaining twelve months, are declared free. But it is provided, that the act shall not extend to a person removing 661 *into the State and becoming a citizen, "if, within sixty days after such removal, he take the oath prescribed, before some justice of the peace." The question here was, whether that oath had been taken, and in due time. To prove this, the defendant produced a certified copy from the record of Berkeley, of an oath taken by Keith, the former owner of the slave, bearing date the 19th of January, 1796, and in the precise words of the law. He proved also by a witness, that Keith removed into the State after the 1st of January, 1795; but whether in the year 1795 or 1796, the witness did not know. Upon this evidence, the Court was moved to instruct the jury, that after such a lapse of time (the suit being brought in 1823,) they ought to presume that, that which appeared to have been done, had been rightly done, until the contrary appeared by rebutting such presumption; which the Court did do; and if they had stopped here, there could be no doubt of the correctness of the instruction. The defendant would have had the benefit of the presumption, in the first place; and the plaintiff would have been left free to rebut it by any evidence he could produce.

But the Court went further, and instructed the jury, that "if the oath had been made before the plaintiff had remained altogether a whole year in the State, it was a sufficient compliance with the law, it being, in this respect, directory." Here, I think the Judge was palpably wrong. The law is not directory at all. It leaves the importer perfectly at liberty to take the oath or not. It says that the slave shall be free; but that the law shall not extend to the importer becoming a citizen, "if within sixty days, he take the oath;" making this the condition by which he may save the forfeiture. If the importer suffer the sixty days to elapse, without taking the oath, he cannot take it with effect afterwards. To say that he can, would make the law restricting him to sixty days, a dead letter. If the importer fail to take the oath within sixty days, I see no possible chance of his escaping the forfeiture, except by removing the slave out of the State before the end of the year. If he remain twelve months, and there has been no oath taken within the sixty days, he is free, or the law is a senseless jargon.

I am clear, therefore, that the Judge misdirected the jury, and that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause sent back for a new trial, upon which no such instructions as those last above mentioned, are to be given.

The other Judges concurred.*

Alimony—Power of Equity Court to Grant.—A Court of Chancery has power to grant alimony to a wife, in Virginia, even without a contract for separation, where the misconduct of the husband is such

*The PRESIDENT absent.

†Alimony—Power of Equity Courts to Grant.—In Stewart v. Stewart, 27 W. Va. 172, it is said: "In Galland v. Galland, 38 Cal. 265, it was decided by a majority of the court, that the provision for alimony made in the statute concerning divorces was not intended to be a prohibition to the granting of alimony in other cases; that the power to decree alimony falls within the general powers of a court of equity and exists independent of statutory authority, and in the exercise of its original and inherent powers a court of equity will in a proper case decree alimony to the wife in an action, which has no reference to a divorce or separation. For instances, where this power has been exercised either as claimed under the inherent power of chancery courts or by authority of statutes I refer to the following cases: Jelineau, by next friend v. Jelineau, 2 Des. 46; *Prather v. Appeal from the Chancery Court of Fredericksburg.

Elizabeth Almond, by Cox, her next friend, filed a bill against David Almond, her husband. The whole nature of the subject is fully unfolded in the following opinion.

Briggs, for the appellant.

Harrison and Stanard, for the appellee.

The case was submitted without argument.

July 21. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

This is a bill filed by Mrs. Almond, by E. Cox, her next friend, against her husband, for alimony. It states, "that she brought him seven or eight negroes, which have all been wasted by him in riot and drink: that her brother gave her a girl after her marriage, who has had three children: that her husband treated her with great cruelty, beating her in his drunken fits, which became so frequent and intolerable, that she was at length obliged to leave him, and throw herself upon the charity of her son: that when she went, her husband told her to take her present along, meaning the woman: that the woman and her children soon after joined her at her son's: that her husband, though he had disclaimed any right in the property, came to her son's, took the children, and sold them out of the State; saying, at the time, that he left the mother at her free disposal; but, he has since brought suit against the said Cox for her, and recovered a judgment for her at law, which he will enforce, unless prevented. The bill prays, that the Court would decree her a separate maintenance, that she may be quieted in the possession of the slave, and the judgment enjoined."

The answer denies, that the defendant ever treated his wife amiss: that she became morose and ill-tempered, and at length, without cause, left him: that he was anxious for her return, and solicited her often to come back to him: that she did so, and remained with him from 1815 to 1818, when she again, without cause, left him: that ever since her last separation, he has been entirely willing, and still is so, to receive her back; and while she behaves as a wife, will treat her with the kindness due to one: that as she has voluntarily separated from him, she has no right to a separate maintenance; and he submits, whether, by the law of the land, and the constitution of Courts of Equity, that Court has jurisdiction of the case, where there are no articles of separation between the parties, no divorce, nor any trust fund for the use of the wife, the disposition of which the Court might control; and where, by their interposition, the Court would take from him the only means of discharging the claims of his creditors; the funds 664 tied up *by his wife being by far the greater part of what he is worth.

There is evidence in the record of the defendant's bad habits: that he is addicted to drinking, beyond the hope of reform; that he has treated his wife badly, beating and abusing her in his drunken frolics; and that she cannot, in the opinion of the witnesses, live in peace and safety with him; also, that he has wasted his whole property, that now in contest in this suit excepted; and that the negro woman is dead. There certainly is nothing like an agreement between the parties for living separately; nor any arrangement as to their property in case of separation. It is proved by four witnesses, that when the defendant went to take, and did take, the children forcibly from Cox, he said he left their mother for his wife's use. Some say he said he had no claim to her; others, that she was free to dispose of her as she pleased. But, there is nothing like a contract; nothing in such a form, that equity could act upon it under the idea of executing an agreement. The Chancellor dissolved the injunction, and dismissed the bill.

Can we say that he erred? In England, matters of this kind belonged principally to the Ecclesiastical jurisdiction. It was only incidentally, that Courts of Equity acted upon it. Where there have been articles of separation between man and wife, by which she is allowed so much for her separate maintenance, there Equity will, at her suit, carry these articles into execution, while the separation continues; or where a woman applies to the Court upon a supplicavit, for security of the peace against her husband, and it is necessary that she should live apart; as incidental to that, the Chancellor will allow her a separate maintenance.

In Head v. Head, 3 Atk. 295, Lord Hardwicke says, "The principal grounds for bills of this kind, are an agreement for maintenance, or a trust for this purpose, and in either of these cases, the Court will entertain a suit for alimony and maintenance; and even after sentence in 665 *the Ecclesiastical Court for it, when the husband, in order to evade it, is going out of the kingdom, will, upon a bill filed by the wife, grant a ne exact regno."

The same case afterwards came before the Court again. 3 Atk. 547. Sir Francis Head had written to his wife's father, saying, "I am willing to send her 100l. and no more, between this and Christmas, and to continue her such quarterly payments, when it shall best suit my convenience, so long as we shall continue separate." Lady Head brought her bill for execution of this, as an agreement for separate maintenance, and prayed liberty to live separately, and that the Court would decree payment of the money. Lord Hardwicke said, "as to the liberty prayed, it is not in the power of the Court to decree it, and I do not find that this Court ever has made a decree for establishing a perpetual separation between man and wife, or to compel a husband to pay a separate maintenance to his wife, unless upon an agreement between them, and even upon this, unwillingly." He went on to decide that the letter of the defendant was not an agreement to continue during their lives, but merely for her maintenance during an occasional absence, and Sir Francis having, by his answer, offered to receive her again. The Chancellor decreed only the arrearages of the maintenance, and that he should receive and treat her as a wife; and if she did not return within a month, the allowance should cease: But if she returned, and the defendant refused to receive her, and maintain and treat her as a wife, the maintenance should continue.

In Ball v. Montgomery, 2 Ves. jr. 195, Lord Roslyn says, "It is contrary to the established doctrine, that a married woman should be a plaintiff in this Court, for a separate maintenance."

"I take it to be now the established law, that no Court, not even the Ecclesiastical Court, has any original jurisdiction to give a wife separate maintenance. It is always as incidental to some other matter, 666 that she becomes entitled *to a separate provision. If she applies to this Court upon a supplicavit for security of the peace against her husband, and it is necessary that she should live apart; as incidental to that, the Chancellor will allow her separate maintenance. So, in the Ecclesiastical Court, if it is necessary for a divorce a mensa et thoro propter coevitiam." There are other cases which say, that subsistence has been provided for the wife by this Court, either where the husband has turned her out of doors, or by ill treatment obliged her to leave his house, or has quitted the kingdom, leaving her destitute. See Duncan v. Duncan, 19 Ves. 394, and the cases there cited. See also 1 Fonb. Eq. 104, a learned note, where all the cases are brought together. This seems to be a brief view of the law in England.

I find no case with us, in which the subject has been before this Court. Having no Ecclesiastical Tribunal, the powers of that Court seem to have been considered as vesting originally in the old General Court. From thence, some of them have been distributed to other Courts, as they were branched out. The power over the probat of wills, executors and administrators, and distributions, &c. were given to the District, Superior, County and Corporation Courts. I know of no law which has given to any Court the trial of matrimonial causes, except so far as relates to incestuous marriages; as to which, a power is given to the Court of Chancery to annul them. Judge Tucker, in his Blackstone, 3d vol. 94, says, "With respect to suits for alimony after a divorce a mensa et thoro, as there is no Court in Virginia which possesses jurisdiction in such cases, so until there is such Court, there can be no room for suits of this nature; unless, perhaps, the High Court of Chancery should sustain them as incidental to its equitable jurisdiction."

The suit before us is not after a divorce.

but a voluntary separation; if that may be called voluntary, which seems to have been forced upon the wife by ill treatment. I believe that in practice, the County 667 Courts, sitting as Courts *of Equity, have assumed the power of giving separate maintenance in cases of separation; but, by what rule they have been regulated, I know not. The jurisdiction was sustained by the Chancellor of the Richmond Chancery Court, in Purcell v. Purcell, 4 Hen. & Munf. 507; and the reasoning of the Chancellor on the point of jurisdiction seems to me sound. If there be a contract for separation, it is conceded on all hands, that equity might, in proper cases, enforce that contract. But, suppose a husband to turn his wife out of doors, or to treat her so cruelly that she cannot possibly live with him; suppose him to persevere in refusing to take her back, or to provide a cent to feed and clothe her. Surely, in a civilized country, there must be some tribunal to which she may resort. She cannot be out of the protection of the law; an outcast, dependent on the charity of the world, while her husband may have thousands, and she may have brought him all. I would, in such cases, unquestionably, stretch out the arm of Chancery, to save and protect her.

But, assuming jurisdiction, I should be cautious to regulate it by the rules which have been established elsewhere. If the parties have made an agreement, that should be the standard; if not, I would take the practice of the Court in analogous cases. There has certainly been no contract here. I find it laid down, that where a separation has taken place, and the wife sues for a support, if the husband, in his answer, states that she left him of her own accord, that he has offered to receive her, and is willing to receive and treat her well, the Court refuse the maintenance. In the answer before us, there is an entire willingness expressed, to receive her back and treat her as a wife. But, though this be a general rule, there must be exceptions to it. Suppose it fully proved to the Court, that the husband was in the constant habit of intoxication; that when drunk, he was a madman, and his anger particularly pointed at his wife. Surely, the Court would not, because of the offer to take her back, refuse

a support, and thus force her either 668 to hazard *her life, or to depend on charity. I do not mean to say that this is such a case; but, I put it to test the principle.

I have considered the case thus much at large, because it is entirely new in this Court. There is a specific objection to the proceeding here, on which I think the judgment of the Court below must be sustained. The demand is not for alimony, or maintenance generally; but, that a judgment which the husband has recovered for a specific piece of property, (a negro woman,) shall be enjoined, and the wife quieted in the possession of that woman. Now, the claim of the wife for alimony is a personal claim on the husband: she has no lien on any specific property, without an agreement. She can no more, therefore, ask the Court to assign her this negro, or that tract of land, than a creditor of the husband could come into Court and ask such assignment; which we know, without a particular lien, could not be done.

Under this view of the case, I think the injunction was properly dissolved, and the bill dismissed.

The other Judges concurred, and the decree was affirmed.*

1. In an action on an attachment bond, by which the obligor was obliged to pay all costs and damages which might accrue to the obligee in consequence of suing out the attachment, it is not necessary that they should be previously ascertained in some other action, to justify an action on the bond.

Dickinson, Adm'r &c. v. M'Craw, 158

2. An action brought in the name of A. B. Cashier of a certain Bank, is an action brought by A. B. individually, and the phrase Cashier, &c. is mere surplusage.

Porter v. Nekervis, 359

3. See Joint Action, No. 1. 2.

ADMINISTRATION.

1. An administration granted in another State, does not give the administrator appointed there, a right to sue jointly with an administrator appointed in Virginia.

Dickinson, Adm'r &c. v. M'Craw, 158

2. The certificate of probat or of administration, granted by a Court of this State, and attested by the Clerk, will enable the executor or administrator to act, and may be given in evidence in any Court in this Commonwealth. Ibid.

AGENT.

1. An agent, without reward, will not be required to use more diligence than would be used by a prudent man in the management of his own concerns.

Pate v. M'Clure, &c., 164

2. Individuals who contract for the benefit of a company or society, where the credit is given to them, and not to their constituents, are personally liable.

Trustees of Presbyterian Church v. Manson, &c., 197

ALIEN.

See Citizenship.

ALIMONY.

1. A Court of Chancery has power to grant alimony to a wife, in Virginia, even without a contract for separation, where the misconduct of the husband is such as to render it unsafe for the wife to live with him, or he turns her out of doors without a support.

Almond v. Almond, 662

2. But, such a claim does not give the wife a right to any specific property of the husband. Ibid.

AMENDMENT.

1. In what cases a plaintiff should be allowed to amend his bill.

Smith & al. v. Smith, &c., 95

2. It is error in a Court to amend a record, *after the term at which judgment was rendered.

Sydnor v. Burke & wife, 161

3. Therefore, if the record omits to state that a plea was entered and issue joined, the Court cannot, after the term at which judgment was rendered, direct a plea to be entered nunc pro tunc, upon the evidence of the Clerk, that such a plea was filed and issue joined. Ibid.

ANSWER IN CHANCERY.

1. Where the answer of the defendant in Chancery omits to notice some of the allegations of the bill, and replies to others, the allegations not noticed are not considered as admitted, but the plaintiff must except to the answer as insufficient.

Coleman v. Lyne's ex'or, 454

2. An answer cannot be excepted to as insufficient after replication. Ibid.

APPEAL.

1. See Injunction, No. 5.

2. Where a judgment of a County Court is appealed from and reversed, and sent back for a new trial by the Superior Court, from which judgment of reversal there is an appeal to the Court of Appeals, and before bond and security are given on this appeal, the cause goes back to the County Court, is again reversed by the Superior Court, and a second appeal taken to the Court of Appeals; on this last appeal, it is competent for this Court to enquire into the propriety of the first judgment.

Jones v. Raine, 386

3. An appeal from a Court of Common Law cannot be allowed, with condition to give bond and security after the term at which the judgment was obtained.

Morris v. Deshazo, 460

4. But, a Court of Chancery has power to grant an appeal, if bond and security be given within a reasonable and limited time, in the next vacation after the term at which the decree was rendered. Ibid.

5. An appeal will lie from the order of an inferior Court, refusing to grant leave to a person held in slavery, to sue in forma pauperis.

Sam v. Blakemore, 466

6. A party appealing from an order dissolving an injunction, can only be required to give security to perform the decree of the inferior Court, and to pay the costs and damages awarded in the Appellate Court, if the decree shall be affirmed.

M'Kay v. Hite's ex'ors, 564

7. Quære, whether, where bond and security have been given to perform the decree of the Court below, and further security is required in the Appellate Court, which the party cannot give, the surety in the first bond is discharged? Ibid.

8. An appeal taken in the name of a party without his knowledge or consent, may be dismissed as to him, on motion.

Watson, &c. v. Watson, &c., 611

APPEALS, COURT OF.

See Jurisdiction, No. 1.

APPOINTMENT.

1. Where an appointment is made, in pursuance of a general power not prescribing the mode of appointment, it must be made in such a way as would pass the title, if the property belonged to the person making the appointment.

Knight v. Yarborough, 566

2. Therefore, where an appointment is made of slaves, under such a general power, by an oral declaration that the trustee gives them to the appointee, without a delivery of possession, the appointment is void.

Ibid.

3. Where an appointment is made to several persons at different times, or in unequal portions, and a residue of property is left unappointed, the appointees shall be allowed to participate in the unappointed surplus, upon bringing the value of their several appointments at the time they were made, into account, without accounting for interest, profits or increase, since they received their several appointments. Ibid.

4. But the appointees must account for interest, profits, &c. after the death of the trustee having the power of appointment, before they can participate in the unappointed surplus.

Ibid.

APPRENTICE.

The master of an apprentice is bound to pay for medical attendance on the apprentice, from the very nature of the relation between master and apprentice; and the father of the apprentice is only bound, when the services have been rendered at his instance.

Easley v. Craddock, &c., 423

ASSIGNEE.

1. The assignee of a bond, under our statute, does not acquire the legal title to the debt, but an equitable right, which, by virtue of the statute, he may assert at law in his own name; and he has his election to sue at law in his own name, or in that of the original obligee, for his benefit.

Garland v. Richeson, 266

2. The assignee of a chose in action has not a right, in all cases, to come into a Court of Equity, upon the mere ground that he cannot sue in his own name, 671 at law; but *it must appear that he is prevented from suing at law in the name of the assignor, or that the assignor himself would have had a right, if he had not assigned, to go into a Court of Equity. Per Green, Judge.

Moseley v. Boush, &c., 392

ATTACHMENT.

See Action, No. 1.

See Averment, No. 2.

AUDITOR.

1. See Malitia, No. 1.

2. A contract is made with the Executive, under an authority given them by law; which directs that the Auditor shall issue warrants upon the orders of the Executive. The Executive refuse to give such order. The party aggrieved may resort to the Courts, by original petition, and have his rights enforced by their judgment.

Shields v. The Commonwealth, 541

3. It seems, that in such cases, the party may obtain redress either in law or equity as the circumstances of the case may give jurisdiction to either tribunal. Per Green, Judge. Ibid.

AVERMENT.

Quære, what averments of the transfer of a note, and of demand and notice, are sufficient?

Hatcher v. Lewis, 152

2. In an action on an attachment-bond, it is not sufficient to allege in the declaration, that the defendant "did not pay all such costs and damages as have accrued, &c." but it must be expressly averred, that costs and damages had been actually sustained.

Dickinson, Adm'r &c. v. M'Craw, 158

3. An averment of a breach of the condition of a bond, although it may not entitle the plaintiff to all the demands, will entitle him to recover what he is legally entitled to, in consequence of the breach.

M'Dowell v. Burwell's Adm'r, 317

4. No defect in a record can be supplied by averment.

Wood v. The Commonwealth, 329

AWARD.

1. See Equity, No. 7, 8.

2. Where some only of several distributees submit their interest to arbitration, the award will be binding on the parties to the submission, as far as their interests are concerned.

Smith and others v. Smith, &c., 95

3. When parties submit a question of law alone to arbitration, the award is binding, though contrary to law.

Ibid.

4. Awards are to be construed liberally; and therefore, the terms "heirs at law," in an award respecting personal estate, may be construed to mean "all a testator's children living, and the child or children of any of them who died in his life-time."

Ibid.

5. Where a submission is made of all matters in difference between two parties, in a particular suit then depending, to two persons and such umpire as they shall choose, and their award to be made the judgment of the Court; and the arbitrators and umpire act together and make a joint award; such award will be good.

Rison v. Berry, 275

6. Although the award does not state that the third person who signed the award, had been chosen by the arbitrators, as umpire, yet that fact may be proved by other evidence.

Ibid.

7. If the third person who signed the award was a mere stranger, this would not vitiate the award.

Ibid.

BAIL.

1. Appearance bail enters into a recognition of special bail before a Judge in the country. He commits it to his son, to be delivered to the clerk where the suit was depending. The son delivers it to a lawyer who practised in that Court, and who promised to deliver it in time. The lawyer forgets his commission, and the office judgment is confirmed against the principal and his appearance bail. A Court of Equity will not grant relief in such a case. By two Judges, one dissenting.

Dickinson v. Sizer, &c., 113

2. The principles on which relief will be granted to bail. Ibid.

3. Where a joint action is brought against drawer and endorser of a negotiable note, bail cannot be demanded as of right, but can only be obtained from a Judge or Justice of the Peace, on proper affidavit.

Hatcher v. Lewis, 152

4. It is error to require bail in an action on a bond with a collateral condition.

Nadenbush, &c. v. Lane, 413

5. It is a general rule, liable to very few exceptions, that no tribunal can take from a plaintiff a legal advantage which he has gained against bail, if such advantage happens without any participation or agency of the plaintiff.

Gilliam v. Allen, 498

6. Special bail cannot be entered at the Clerk's table, unless it is directed by the Court, or assented to by the plaintiff's counsel; even where the appearance bail is offered as special bail. Ibid.

672 *BAIL BOND.

A bond which is returned to the clerk's office, but which specifies no sum to be paid by the obligor to the obligee, is a mere nullity.

Harrison v. Tiernans, 177

BANK.

See Jurisdiction, No. 1.

BANK NOTE.

1. Where a bank note is cut in two, and one half sent by mail and lost, the holder of the remaining half has a right to demand payment at the Bank, upon presentation of the half in his possession, proving ownership, and giving bond with adequate security for the indemnification of the Bank.

Farmers' Bank, &c. v. Reynolds, 186

2. But, if these prerequisites are not complied with, and the Bank is sued in consequence of refusing payment, the holder will not recover interest or costs, although he may perform the conditions after the suit is brought. Ibid.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where parol evidence is excluded, which might be proper when connected with a record, the bill of exceptions should state that such record was offered. Otherwise, it will be presumed that the parol evidence alone was offered.

M'Dowell v. Burwell's Adm'r, 317

BILL OF EXCHANGE.

1. When a bill of exchange returns protested, and the drawer, on payment being demanded, promises to pay, he cannot afterwards resist the payment, on the ground that due notice was not given of the protest.

Pate v. M'Clure, &c., 164

2. See Fraud, No. 7.

3. Where a bill of exchange is presented to the drawee, who refuses to accept or to pay, notice need not be given to the endorser, if the bill was drawn and endorsed for the accommodation of the drawer, with the knowledge of the endorser, and there was no expectation that the bill would be paid by the drawee.

Farmers' Bank, &c. v. Vanmeter, 553

BOND.

1. See Assignee, No. 1.

2. See Bail Bond.

BRITISH SUBJECT.

The representative of a British subject, whose estate was sequestered under the law of 1777, and who does not apply to the Auditor until 1822 for a certificate, is not entitled to interest on his claim, after the 1st of January, 1811.

Martin v. The Auditor, 264

CHOSE IN ACTION.

See Assignee, No. 2.

CITIZENSHIP.

The question of citizenship may be decided, after a great lapse of time, by facts and circumstances leading to a presumption that a foreigner had actually become a citizen.

Nalle's Representatives v. Fenwick, &c., 585

COMMONWEALTH.

When the Commonwealth sells the lands of a public debtor, and the purchaser is afterwards evicted by title paramount, the purchaser has no redress against the Commonwealth, as the law only authorises a sale of all the estate and interest of the debtor.

Commonwealth v. M'Clenachan's Ex'ors, 482

CONDITION.

1. Where it is stipulated in a mortgage, that money shall be paid on or before a given day, and it is paid after that day, the mortgagee is not deprived of his right of action at law, on the mortgage.

Faulkner's Administratrix v. Brockenbrough, 245

2. See Declaration, No. 2, 3, 4.

3. In a contract for the purchase of land, where no time is limited for the conveyance of the property, and a time is limited for the payment of the purchase money, the conveyance is not a condition precedent to the right to demand the money.

Bailey v. Clay, &c., 346

4. A general undertaking to pay money, without appointing a day of payment, obliges the party to pay immediately; but an undertaking to do a collateral act, as to convey lands, entitles the party to perform it at any time during his life, unless hastened by the request of the other party. Ibid.

5. When a day is appointed for the payment of money, and the day is to happen after the thing, which is the consideration of the money, is to be performed, no action can be maintained for the money before performance.

Brockenbrough v. Ward's Adm'r, 352

6. Covenants are dependent or independent, according to the intention and meaning of the parties, and the good sense of the case. Ibid.

673

CONSTABLE.

An execution issued upon a judgment by a Justice of the Peace, from the Court of a county or corporation, cannot be served by a constable, except in the City of Richmond.

Stokes v. Perkins, 356

CONTRIBUTION.

The endorser of a bill of exchange has no right to contribution against the other endorsers, where the several endorsements were made for the accommodation of the drawer, unless there is a stipulation to that effect.

Farmers' Bank v. Vanmeter, 553

CORPORATION.

1. A corporation can only sue in the name and style given to it by law.

Porter v. Nekervis, 359

2. When a corporation sues, it need not set forth in the declaration, by way of averment, how it is a corporation, but may prove it on the trial.

Grays v. Turnpike Company, 578

3. This doctrine is equally applicable to motions by corporations, as to suits brought by them. Ibid.

4. If the law authorizes a sale of the stock of delinquent subscribers, and if the sale shall not produce the sum due, then a motion against such subscribers for the deficiency; and under this power the corporation exposes the stock to sale, which is not sold for want of bidders; they may then maintain a motion against the delinquent subscriber, under the spirit of the law. Ibid.

CREDITORS.

1. An unrecorded deed is void as to creditors, whether they have notice or not; but it will be good against purchasers with notice, or who have not purchased for valuable consideration.

Guerrant v. Anderson, 208

2. A purchaser under a sale in behalf of a creditor, holds the rights and occupies the place of the creditor; and therefore he will not be affected by notice of an unrecorded deed. Ibid.

DAMAGES.

The stipulated price of property sold, is the proper measure of damages for the non-performance of the contract, if no evidence is offered to shew that some other standard is more proper.

Bailey v. Clay, 346

DECLARATION.

1. See Averment, No. 1, 2, 3.

2. The failure to allege the performance of a precedent condition in a declaration, will be cured by a verdict.

Bailey v. Clay, &c., 346

3. The general rule is, that no party can be required to prove, upon the trial, any matter not alleged by him in his pleadings, unless the fact not alleged is necessarily implied from the facts stated in the pleadings. In cases coming within the general rule, all matters necessarily implied from what is alleged, are presumed to have been proved on the trial, after verdict. Ibid.

4. But, matters collateral to the fact in issue, and necessary to the right of the party, if they are omitted in the pleadings, cannot be presumed to have been proved, and therefore their omission could not be cured by the verdict at common law. Ibid.

DEEDS.

1. The difference between deeds and bills of exchange and promissory notes, as to the mode of their execution.

Harrison v. Tiernans, 177

2. Where a grantor has conveyed all his estate, real and personal, to trustees, the conveyance includes equitable as well as legal rights, and the trustees are the proper persons to assert them in a Court of Equity.

Carter v. Harris, 199

3. See Creditors, No. 1, 2.

4. See Voluntary Conveyance, No. 1, 2.

DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

1. A demurrer to evidence should contain the evidence on both sides.

Childers v. Deane & Page, 406

2. The Court ought not to compel a plaintiff to join in a demurrer to evidence, if the evidence set forth in the demurrer shews that the plaintiff ought to recover.

Brockenbrough v. Ward's Adm'r. 352

DEPOSITION.

A deposition taken while the replication was standing, cannot be read after it is withdrawn.

Clarke v. Tinsley's Adm'r. 250

DISTRESS.

1. The property of a third person never was liable to distress, unless it were found upon the premises; and even where it is found there, the distress is taken away by the act of 1818, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 113, sec. 15.

Davis v. Payne's Adm'r, 332

2. See Equity, No. 23.

674

EJECTMENT.

An ejectment may be brought against several persons in possession of any part of the tract of land claimed by the lessor of the plaintiff.

Stuart's heirs, &c. v. Coalter, 74

EQUITY.

1. See Injunction, No. 1.

2. See New Trial, No. 1.

3. It is a correct course of proceeding, for a Chancellor to dissolve an injunction upon the defendant's tendering a deed to the plaintiff, or filing it with the papers, without requiring it to be approved by the Court before the injunction shall be dissolved.

M'Mahon v. Spangler, 51

4. Equity has not jurisdiction to grant redress for the unlawful diversion of a water-course, but to prevent it by injunction before it is done.

Coalter v. Hunter, &c., 58

5. See Partition, No. 1, 2.

6. A Court of Equity has no jurisdiction to settle the title or bounds of land between adverse claimants, unless the plaintiff has an equity against the defendant claiming adversely to him. An equity against other persons will not give such jurisdiction.

Stuart's heirs, &c. v. Coalter, 74

7. A bill in Chancery, which makes out a case for a specific execution of an award, but does not pray for general or special relief, is sufficient, if no objection be taken by the defendant, and he answers on the merits of the complaint, and submits himself to the decree of the Court. Quære, would this objection be sustained on a demurrer to the bill?

Smith, &c. v. Smith, &c., 95

8. Equity has jurisdiction to decree specific execution of an award, where the remedy at law is inadequate. Ibid.

9. Tenants in common, of personal estate, cannot have partition at common law; and, therefore, a Court of Equity is the proper tribunal to decree a partition of it. Ibid.

10. See Amendment, No. 1.

11. A surety will not be discharged by an indulgence granted by the creditor to the principal debtor, unless such indulgence ties up the hands of the creditor from pursuing the debtor at law. Nor will the surety be discharged even then, where the indulgence was granted with his knowledge and assent.

Hunter's Adm'r v. Jett, 104

12. A surety will not be discharged from his responsibility, unless he demands such discharge in his bill, and states such a case as would entitle him to it. Ibid.

13. See Bill, No. 1, 2.

14. Where a debtor who has given a deed of trust, enjoins a sale of the property, and pending the suit the trustee dies, the Chancellor, upon dismissing the bill, may direct the property to be sold by his Marshal.

Pate v. M'Clure, &c., 164

15. See Bank Note, No. 1, 2.

16. See Deeds, No. 2.

17. See Account.

18. When exceptions are filed to an answer, they must be disposed of before any further proceedings can take place in the cause.

Clarke v. Tinsley's Adm'r, 250

19. Where two persons purchase a tract of land jointly, and one of them pays more than his proportion of the purchase money, while the other takes a conveyance of the whole to himself, the person who has advanced more than his share, has a lien on the land for the money so advanced.

Hayes v. Wood, 272

20. In such case, if the plaintiff does not pray to subject the land, but only for a personal decree for the balance due, equity will have jurisdiction. Ibid.

21. The maxim of equity, that he who seeks equity must do it, only applies to an equity between the parties, but not to an equity which any third person may have against the plaintiff.

Garland v. Rives, 282

22. Where a creditor, who claims under a judgment at law, comes into equity to enforce his judgment, that judgment is prima facie evidence against the debtor or mere strangers, unless they can impeach it on the ground of fraud, or by shewing that a full defence was not made, and can produce new proof shewing that the debt is not due. Ibid.

23. If the landlord should distrain property as being fraudulently removed from the premises, and should not shew that it was so fraudulently removed, nor that the distress was levied within the time allowed by law, nor that the property was ever on the demised premises, the tenant ought not to seek his redress in a Court of Equity, but by damages at law.

Davis v. Payne's Adm'r, 332

24. Equity will not grant relief on the ground of a defence which might have been made at law, unless the plaintiff alleges and proves a good excuse for not having used it at law. Carr, Judge.

Chapman, &c. v. Harrison, 336

25. See Injunction, No. 4.

26. See Assignee, No. 2.

27. A bill by husband and wife is the husband's suit only, and the wife is joined for conformity, to be bound only so far as in justice she ought to be bound.

Dandridge, &c. v. Minge, 397

28. See Usury, No. 4.

29. If the proceedings under an execution are wholly void, no title passes by the sale to the purchaser, and the defendant may have redress in an action of detinue, and a Court of Equity has no jurisdiction.

Hamilton v. Shrewsbury, 427

30. See Execution, No. 2.

31. See Substitution, No. 1, 2, 3.

32. All persons materially interested in the subject in controversy, ought to be made parties in equity; and if they are not, the defect may be taken advantage of, either by demurrer, or by the Court at the hearing.

Clarke v. Long, 451

33. Therefore, the purchaser of an equity of redemption cannot file a bill to redeem against the mortgagee, without making the mortgagor a party. Ibid.

34. See Answer in Chancery, No. 1, 2.

35. Equity will not, without strong reasons, rip up old transactions, or settle stale accounts.

Coleman v. Lyne's Ex'or, 454

36. Quære, whether on a bill taken pro confesso, the plaintiff can have a decree for his claim, without documents or other evidence to support his bill? Ibid.

37. In general, a contract will not be enforced by a Court of Equity, if the party asking the execution of it has been in default, and the other party will thereby suffer a serious loss, if compelled to carry the contract into execution.

Vail v. Nelson, &c., 478

38. But if the purchaser knew, when he made his contract, that there was a defect in the title, and that it would take a considerable time to remove it; or acquires this knowledge after his purchase, and acquiesces in the delay, or proceeds, with knowledge of the defect, in the execution of the contract; he had no ground of complaint. Ibid.

39. A bill in equity for partition is a matter of right, if the title of the plaintiff is admitted or clear; but if that be denied, and it depends on doubtful facts or questions of law, a Court of Equity will either dismiss the bill, or retain it until the right is decided at law.

Straughan, &c. v. Wright, &c., 493

40. In questions purely equitable, twenty years adverse possession will bar the remedy of the plaintiff; but where the Court is only called upon to grant partition under a legal title, which is disputed, the proper course is to retain the cause until the title is decided at law. Ibid.

41. Quære, whether a Court of Equity would refuse to assist a party to assert a legal title, when the right of entry is barred by twenty years adverse possession, by removing impediments to a fair trial at law? Ibid.

42. See Bail, No. 5, 6.

43. It is a general rule, that a Court of Equity will not allow a man to make a defence which he might have made in a Court of Law, unless she shews some good reason why he did not make that defence in a Court of Law.

Vanlew v. Bohannon, &c., 537

44. But if the defendant in equity does not insist upon that objection, but voluntarily goes in to the merits of the case, and in his answer admits facts, which, if they had appeared to the Court of Law, would have produced there a different result, a Court of Equity ought to grant relief. Ibid.

45. Courts of Law or Equity may entertain petitions by claimants against the Commonwealth, as the circumstances of the case may give jurisdiction to either tribunal. Per Green, Judge.

Shields v. The Commonwealth, 541

46. Equity has jurisdiction wherever a lost instrument is to be set up, notwithstanding that Courts of Law now exercise jurisdiction in the same cases. Ibid.

47. A Court of Equity will never injoin a judgment on the ground that it would have been reversible if the proper steps had been taken in the Court of Law, but by mistake a confession of judgment had been entered.

Farmers' Bank v. Vanmeter, 553

48. See Alimony, 1, 2.

EVIDENCE.

1. The general rule is, that parol evidence cannot be admitted to contradict, explain or alter a written agreement, but may be received to prove fraud, mistake or surprise in the execution of it. But in the latter case, the evidence must be strong and clear.

M'Mahon v. Spangler, 51

2. An affidavit taken by a party may be read in the cause, although the party taking it may wish to suppress it, because it operates against him. Ibid.

3. See Sheriff, No. 1, 4.

4. See Bill of Exceptions.

5. It is a general rule, that the evidence of a subscribing witness to an instrument, is the best, and must be adduced, if it can be had; and if it cannot, proof of his handwriting will be required.

Gilliam's Adm'r v. Perkinson's Adm'r, 325

6. But if the subscribing witness merely makes his mark if he is dead, proof of the hand-writing of the party executing the instrument, will be proper. Ibid.

7. Parol evidence is admissible to impeach evidence under seal, on the ground of fraud.

Starke's Ex'rs v. Littlepage, 368

8. The principal obligor in a bond cannot be a witness for his surety jointly bound with him, because the latter would have recourse against the former for the whole recovery against him, including all subsequent costs expended by him.

Jones v. Raine, 386

676 *9. An interested witness, who has been examined on a former trial without being released, may be rendered competent on a subsequent trial, by a release. The objection will only go to his credit. Ibid.

10. In what cases, and upon what principles, hear-say evidence as to pedigree is admitted.

Gregory v. Baugh, 611

11. Matters of general history must be given in evidence, as well as other facts; and the jury are not to be left to their own information as to such things. Ibid.

12. In questions of freedom, evidence that there had been a belief in the neighbourhood, some 50 or 60 years before, that the female ancestor of the plaintiff was entitled to her freedom, is not admissible. By two Judges. Ibid.

EXCEPTIONS.

See Equity, No. 18.

EXECUTION.

1. An action of debt will not lie against the surety of a sheriff, on his official bond, to recover the penalty imposed by law for failing to return an execution. Such penalty can only be recovered by motion; and an action of debt will only lie for the damage actually sustained by the sheriff's failure to return the execution.

M'Dowell v. Burwell's Adm'r, 317

2. If the execution is valid so far as to bind the property, but the sale under it is void on account of the interest or improper conduct of the Sheriff, the Court, from which the execution issued, may correct the abuse of its own process, by quashing the execution, &c. and there is no ground for equity to interfere.

Hamilton v. Shrewsbury, 427

3. See Equity, No. 29.

EXECUTIVE.

1. If the payment of certain expenses of militia, which properly belong to the United States, is left by law to the discretion of the Executive of the State, a party cannot claim, as a matter of legal right, more than the Executive, in their discretion, may choose to allow.

Commonwealth v. Pierce's Adm'r, 432

2. See Auditor, No. 2, 3.

EXECUTOR.

1. It is the duty of an executor or administrator to apply the assets of the estate, not necessary for the payment of debts, to the exoneration of the real estate of his testator or intestate, which may be under mortgage.

Dandridge, &c. v. Minge, 397

2. An executor may make a valid sale of his testator's effects, whether they be necessary for the payment of debts or not, if there is no fraud or collusion in the purchaser.

Knight v. Yarborough, 566

EXECUTORY DEVISE.

1. A limitation over after an indefinite failure of issue in the first taker, is too remote and void.

Riddick v. Cohoon, 547

2. Where an estate is given by will to A. and if he should die without issue living at his death, then so much of the estate as may remain undisposed of by A. to B. the limitation over is void for uncertainty, and because the power to dispose of the property, gives A. an absolute estate. Ibid.

FORTHCOMING BOND.

A. B. and C. execute a forthcoming bond to release the goods of A. taken in execution. C. pays the debt, and moves against B. as a principal in the bond. There is nothing in the bond to shew whether B. was principal or surety. B. contends that he was only a surety jointly with C. The Court below give judgment for C. on the motion. No evidence is in the record to shew whether B. was surety or principal. The judgment was affirmed in the Court of Appeals, as it will be presumed that the Court below had evidence before them, that B. was a principal and not a surety.

Cunningham v. Mitchell, 189

FRAUD.

1. A creditor who takes a conveyance from his debtor to secure his debt, but at the same time inserts provisions in the deed, to delay, hinder or defraud other creditors, comes within the Statute of Frauds, and the conveyance is void.

Garland v. Rives, 282

2. So likewise, if the grantee be privy to a fraudulent intent on the part of the grantor, and takes a deed to secure his own debt, with provisions to delay, hinder or defraud other creditors, the deed will be void, although his only motive was to secure his own debt, and the other provisions were forced upon him by the grantor, as the only means of having his own debt secured. Such a grantee will not be considered a bona fide purchaser. Ibid.

3. Under our Statute of Frauds, as well as the English Statute of 13th Eliz. a bona fide purchaser for value, having no notice of covin, fraud, collusion, &c. will be protected. *To vitiate a conveyance, there must be a fraudulent design in the grantor, and notice of that design in the grantee. Ibid.

4. In cases of actual fraud, a Court of Equity has concurrent jurisdiction with a Court of Law, in remedying the fraud. In these cases, equity follows the law, and gives relief to the same extent as a Court of Law. And, therefore, where a creditor comes into equity to set aside a conveyance tainted with actual fraud, and the grantee had notice of the fraud, the conveyance shall be set aside in toto. Ibid.

5. Where a debtor makes a fraudulent conveyance of his property, for the purpose of protecting it from his creditors, the fraudulent grantee may enforce such conveyance in a Court of Law, and the debtor will not be allowed to defeat the claim, by proving the fraud. By two Judges.

Starke's ex'ors v. Littlepage, 268

6. See In Pari Delicto.

7. It is no fraud in the holder of the bill of exchange to make an arrangement with one of the endorsers, by which it is agreed that the whole burden shall be thrown upon the other endorsers, and that the endorser first mentioned is to be liable only in case they should be unable to pay.

Farmers' Bank v. Vanmeter, 553

FREIGHT.

1. It is a general principle that freight is not due until it is earned by a delivery of the cargo, unless the delivery is prevented by the default of the shipper or his agents.

Brown & Rives v. Ralston & Pleasants, 504

2. If it is impossible to deliver the cargo, from causes not arising from the default of either party, the shipper will be excused from paying freight. By two Judges. Ibid.

HEAR-SAY.

See Evidence, No. 10.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

1. A husband cannot rightfully elect that his wife's property should be real or personal, at his pleasure.

Dandridge, &c. v. Minge, 397

2. When the rights of a wife appear clearly in the record, it is the duty of the Court, ex officio, to protect her against any injurious effects arising from the acts or admissions of her husband, whether the point was made in the pleadings or not. Ibid.

3. See Equity, No. 27.

INDEBITATUS ASSUMPSIT.

Under the 86th section of the act concerning proceedings in civil suits, &c. (1 Rev. Code, 510,) an account filed in an action of indebitatus assumpsit, which gives notice of the character of a claim, is sufficient, although it may be made up of various items, of which no notice is given.

Moore v. Mauro, 488

INDULGENCE.

See Equity, No. 11, 12.

INJUNCTION.

1. On a motion to dissolve an injunction, it ought not to be required of the defendant to invalidate, by full proof, the allegations of the bill; but the burthen of proof lies on the plaintiff to support them. All that is required of the defendant, is, to shew that the evidence of the plaintiff is entitled to no credit.

North's Ex'or v. Perrow, &c., 1

2. See Equity, No. 3.

3. The principal and surety to a bond obtain an injunction to a judgment against them. The surety dies pending the suit in Chancery. After referring the cause to a Commissioner, exceptions to the report on account of set-offs disallowed (some of which were claimed by the surety himself,) and the Court rejecting them because not filed in time, the injunction is in part dissolved, and in part perpetuated, without making the representative of the deceased plaintiff, a party. This proceeding is erroneous. A rule should have been given him, at the instance of the defendant, that unless he revived the suit by an appointed time, the injunction should stand dissolved.

Jackson v. Arnold, 195

4. It is error to perpetuate an injunction against a party, without having him before the Court.

Chapman, &c. v. Harrison, 336

5. When a party has obtained an injunction from the Chancery Court to a judgment at law, which is afterwards dissolved, and he appeals to the Court of Appeals, he cannot be required to give security for the amount of the judgment enjoined, but only for such costs as may be awarded against him by the Court of Appeals.

Eppes v. Thurman, 384

6. See Appeal, No. 6, 7.

IN PARI DELICTO, &c.

1. The rule in in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis, does not apply, 678 where "the policy of the law requires that a fraudulent or vicious conveyance should be enforced.

Starke's Ex'ors v. Littlepage, 368

2. See Fraud, No. 5.

INSTRUCTION.

1. An instruction by the Court, that the facts proved are not conclusive evidence, does not amount to an instruction as to the weight of evidence, because it leaves the whole matter open to the jury.

Dabney v. Taliaferro, 256

2. The instruction of a Court will not be reversed, when it is right in principle, but the reason assigned is erroneous.

Easley v. Craddock, &c., 423

3. The instruction of a Court to the jury ought not to involve matters of fact as well as of law.

M'Rae v. Scott & Saunders, 463

4. A party asking instructions of the Court to the jury as to the law, should specify the points, and not ask instructions generally as to the law arising out of a complicated mass of evidence.

Kitty v. Fitzhugh, 600

INTEREST.

1. A demand of interest in the declaration, which is not claimed in the writ, is not erroneous.

Hatcher v. Lewis, 152

2. Interest upon interest on a legacy will not be allowed, unless the testator plainly requires it.

Calloway, &c. v. Langhorne and wife, 181

3. Compound interest will not be allowed, except under special circumstances. As to what those circumstances are, see

Childers v. Deane & Page, 406

ISSUE.

The misjoinder of an issue is not fatal after a verdict, and it being stated in the record that issue was joined.

Moore v. Mauro, 488

JAILOR.

1. A sheriff, as jailor, is bound to furnish a runaway committed to the jail, with such supplies as are necessary for the season of the year.

Dabney v. Taliaferro, 256

2. A sheriff is ex-officio jailor, and is liable for the misconduct of his turn-key or servant. Ibid.

3. Quare, if a jailor is regularly appointed by the sheriff, is he thereby discharged from responsibility for the acts of his jailor? Ibid.

JEOfAILS.

1. See Interest, No. 1.

2. Quare, how far the statute of Jeofails will cure a declaration which sets out no cause of action?

Sydnor v. Burke and wife, 161

JOINT ACTION.

1. Where a joint action is brought against drawer and endorsers of a negotiable note, an office judgment cannot be confirmed against all or either of the defendants, without a writ of enquiry.

Hatcher v. Lewis, 152

2. A single bill under seal, is not a note, but a specialty; and therefore, the drawer and endorsers of such a note, made negotiable and payable at the Farmers' Bank, cannot be sued jointly.

Mann v. Sutton, 253

JUDGMENT.

1. When the judgment of a Court of competent jurisdiction is pronounced on any question, it is conclusive on all other tribunals, until it is reversed by a regular course of proceedings.

Cottom v. Cottom, 192

2. Therefore, where two successive applications are made to a County Court for administration, and rejected; appeals taken to the Circuit Court from both decisions, and the judgments of the County Court affirmed; upon an appeal to this Court on the second case, the Court cannot reverse the first judgment and grant administration. Ibid.

3. A joint judgment cannot be reversed as to one defendant, and affirmed as to the other.

Jones v. Raine, 386

4. In cases of judgments by default for want of appearance, the writ, with the endorsement, is a necessary part of the record.

Nadenbush, &c. v. Lane, 413

5. A judgment deciding in favor of the freedom of a person held in slavery, has no effect against any party, except the defendant and those claiming under him posterior to the judgment.

Kitty v. Fitzhugh, 600

JURISDICTION.

1. The Court of Appeals has no jurisdiction in the case of an information against the members of an unchartered Bank, for a violation of the law of 1816, 2 Rev. Code, 111, because that act is a penal law.

Commonwealth v. Scott & Thompson, 143

LAND.

1. See Equity, No. 6.

679 *2. Where a patent is issued in pursuance of the act of 1788, 2 Rev. Code, 434, which includes in its general course a prior claim, it does not pass to the patentee the title of the Commonwealth in and to the lands covered by such prior claim, subject only to the title, whatever it may be, in the prior claimant; but, if that title is only a prior entry, and becomes vacated by neglect to survey and return the plat, any one may lay a warrant on the same, as in other cases of vacant and unappropriated land.

Nichols, &c. v. Covey, &c., 365

3. The purchase of a warrant from the Commonwealth, and an entry in consequence thereof, is not a purchase of the land itself until the entry is carried into grant. Ibid.

LIMITATIONS.

The saving in the 4th section of the act of limitations, 1 Rev. Code, 488, applies to the 7th section of the same act; by which an action between merchant and merchant is neither barred by one year, nor five years.

Moore v. Mauro, 488

LOST INSTRUMENT.

See Equity, No. 46.

MILITIA.

1. By the general law prescribing the duties of the Auditor, he is not authorised to issue a warrant for any claim not arising under some law or resolution of the General Assembly; and, therefore, a claim under the act of January 8th, 1814, for the passage of troops over a toll-bridge, who were in the service of the Commonwealth, but not taken into the service of the State by any law or resolution, cannot be sanctioned by the Auditor, but the redress of the claimant is by application to the Legislature.

Commonwealth v. Pierce's adm'r, 432

2. Expenses of the militia in time of war, under requisition of the United States, are properly payable by them; and if the State of Virginia consents to advance any portion of those expenses, she is under no legal or moral obligation to pay more. Ibid.

3. The act of January 8th, 1814, only provides for expenses necessary to place the militia under requisition for the service of the United States, at the appointed place of rendezvous. Ibid.

NEW TRIAL.

1. Where a plaintiff suffers a verdict and judgment to go against him at law, he cannot apply to a Court of Equity to grant him a new trial, on the ground of his having been surprised at the trial at law by unexpected evidence, unless he was prevented by fraud or accident from suffering a non-suit.

NORFOLK.

The act authorising an assessment for paving the streets of Norfolk, does not impose a lien upon the lots in the borough, for the payment of the assessment, but gives a personal remedy only, against the freeholders in possession, and not against remaindermen and reversionsers.

PARTITION.

1. The power of a Court of Equity to decree partition, is governed by the same principles which govern cases of partition at law. It may decide on the rights of the parties to participate in the division, but not on the simple question of title to the land.

Stuart's heirs, &c. v. Coalter, 74

2. Tenants in common of personal estate cannot have partition at common law, and therefore, a Court of Equity is the proper tribunal to decree a partition of it.

PLEADING.

1. The same strictness as to form, is not required in actions for freedom, as in other cases.

M'Michen v. Amos & al., 134

2. Where the defendant, in such an action, by his plea, protests that the plaintiff is his slave, and that he is not guilty of the assault, &c. the plaintiff replies, that "by reason of any thing by the defendant in protesting alleged, he ought not to be barred, &c." because he is a free person; and issue is joined on this replication; this issue, although irregular, will be sustained after verdict. Ibid.

3. See Non Est Factum.

POSSESSION.

No person has a right to divert a water-course on his own land, so as to turn it from the land of his neighbour lower down the stream; and if he claims that right from long enjoyment of it, he must prove that he has had adverse possession for upwards of twenty years.

Coalter v. Hunter, &c., 58

POWER.

Where a naked power is given by law to an officer or other person, that power must be strictly pursued, especially if such proceeding involve a forfeiture; and it devolves on him who claims a right under the exercise of such power, to shew that it was, in all respects, exactly pursued.

SALE.

1. See Warranty.

2. A sale by a sheriff will be vacated, if he raises doubts or makes impressions, unfavourable to a fair sale, and then buys in the property at an under rate.

Carter v. Harris, 199

3. Such a sale will be void if the sheriff is the only bidder, or there is another who only gives a colour of fairness to the sale.

Ibid.

4. If a sheriff sell under execution a slave mortgaged by a deed not recorded, and void against the creditor, and he sells and the purchaser buys the property, subject to the claim asserted in the deed; the purchaser takes the slave subject to the payment of the mortgage debt. But if, in such case, the sheriff sells all the title that he has a right to sell in the property, under the execution, whether the deed be valid or void, the absolute title passes to the purchaser, discharged of any claim on the part of the mortgagee.

Guerrant v. Anderson, 208

5. A fair purchaser under a sheriff's sale, without knowledge of any improper conduct on the part of the officer, acquires a valid title to the property purchased, and the remedy of the party injured, is by action at law for damages against the sheriff. The same remedy applies, where a sheriff has improperly refused a forthcoming bond, when he ought to have received it.

Hamilton v. Shrewsbury, 427

6. See Power and Taxes.

SCIRE FACIAS.

When a recognizance is entered into before two justices, and it omits to state that it was taken in the county to which the justices belong, while the scire facias, in reciting the recognizance, sets forth the county in which it was taken, the variance will be fatal.

Wood v. The Commonwealth, 329

Joint and separate demands cannot be set off against each other; nor can partnership and separate demands be set off against each other.

Porter v. Nekervis, 359

SHERIFF.

1. A sheriff's return may be contradicted by evidence allunde; in which case the sheriff himself would be a competent witness to prove its truth. But after judgment by default, a party cannot object in an Appellate Court, to the truth of the return.

Cunningham v. Mitchell, 189

2. A sheriff who is interested in an execution cannot levy it himself.

Carter v. Harris, 199

3. See Sale, No. 2, 3, 4, 5.

4. In an action against the sureties of a sheriff for breach of duty, judgments obtained against the latter are not evidence against the former.

M'Dowell v. Burwell's administrator, 317

5. A payment to a sheriff in discharge of an execution, after the return day of the execution is passed, is not binding on the creditor.

Chapman, &c. v. Harrison, 336

SLAVES.

1. The act of 1778, prohibiting the importation of slaves into Virginia, applies only to those slaves who are brought in with the consent of the owner, and not to those imported by wrong-doers.

Sallust v. Ruth, &c., 67

2. See Pleading, No. 1, 2, and Verdict, No. 1.

3. See Appeal, No. 5.

4. Where a female slave is emancipated, with a reservation that her future increase shall be slaves, such reservation is void, and the woman and her increase are absolutely free.

Fulton v. Shaw, 597

5. Quære, how far a slave, who has been emancipated by one who had no title originally, but who has had a length of possession which bars a recovery by the true owner, can recover his freedom under such emancipation, against the person who had the original right?

Kitty v. Fitzhugh, 600

6. See Evidence, No. 13.

7. A man removing into this State with his slave, takes the oath required by the law of 1792; but it is doubtful upon the evidence, whether the oath was taken within 60 days after his removal. After a great lapse of time, it will be presumed that what had been done, was done rightly.

George v. Parker, 659

8. But if it does not appear by evidence or otherwise, that the oath was taken within 60 days after the removal of the master, the slave will be entitled to his freedom, when he has remained in the State twelve months. Ibid.

SPECIAL VERDICT.

See Verdict, No. 1, 2.

SUBSCRIBING WITNESS.

See Evidence, No. 5, 6.

SUBSTITUTION.

1. Where A. gives his bond for duties imported into the U. States for B. the importer, and B. is not bound in the bond, if A. discharges the bond, it seems that he cannot be placed in the condition of the U. States, as to priority, in a claim against A. under the law of Congress.

Enders, &c. v. Bruue, 438

2. But upon general principles of equity, A. in such a case, will be substituted in place of the creditor (the U. S.) and have every preference that the United States were entitled to. Ibid.

3. Equity does not regard form but substance; and therefore it does not require that a surety shall be bound in the same bond with his principal, in order to make the doctrine of substitution operate, but merely that having bound himself for the debt of the principal debtor, he should have paid it. Ibid.

SURETY.

1. See Equity, No. 11, 12.

2. See Sheriff, No. 4.

3. See Substitution, No. 1, 2, 3.

TAXES.

Where land is sold by a sheriff for non-payment of taxes, it is incumbent on the purchaser to shew that all the steps have been taken, which the law requires in such cases. It seems that although the act of 1782 does not require four weeks advertisement in the papers, before land can be sold for non-payment of taxes, yet the act of 1781 is not repealed in this respect, which requires such a proceeding.

Nalle's Representatives v. Fenwick, &c., 585

UNLAWFUL DETAINER.

1. In a writ of unlawful detainer, under the act of 1814, the omission to state in the complaint the estimated quantity of the land in dispute, is not fatal, if the complaint contains a reasonably certain description.

Allen v. Gibson, 468

2. Under this act, a mortgagee may obtain possession of the mortgaged premises after forfeiture, by the mode of proceeding therein pointed out. Ibid.

3. This act gives a civil remedy for the immediate recovery of the possession, in certain cases, even where no force occurred. Ibid.

4. One tenant in common may have this remedy for the whole land, against any party having no right whatever, without joining his co-tenant. Ibid.

USURY.

1. To constitute usury, there must be an intention to take more than legal interest.

Childers v. Deane & Page, 406

2. The mistake of a scrivener in putting one sum for another, will not charge a party with usury. Ibid.

3. If a mode of calculating interest, which gives to the creditor more than legal interest, is adopted, and the creditor knows it will have that effect, he is guilty of usury, although he may not suspect that he is violating the law. Ibid.

4. In all cases, where a party applies to a Court of Equity for relief against an usurious contract, whether he alleges in his bill that he is able to prove the usury without the defendant's confession, or not, he can only be relieved upon payment of principal without interest, under the third section of our act of Assembly.

1. The vendor of real estate is not responsible for any defects of title, unless he has bound himself by some covenant or warranty to protect the vendee, or unless he has been guilty of some fraud or concealment.

2. See Commonwealth.

VERDICT.

1. A verdict may find generally for either party, dependent upon a single point of law presented to the Court, although such a verdict is not strictly a special verdict.

M'Michen v. Amos & others, 134

2. A special verdict must contain facts, and not evidence of facts.

Brown, &c. v. Ralston, &c., 504

VOLUNTARY CONVEYANCE.

1. A voluntary conveyance of personal property, by a party not indebted at the time, *is good against subsequent creditors, if the deed be duly recorded, or the possession remain solely and bona fide with the donee. Otherwise, it will be void by the Statute of Frauds.

Davis v. Payne's adm'r, 332

2. Such a deed cannot be recorded in a Corporation Court. Ibid.

WARRANT.

See Land, No. 2. Equity, No. 6.

WARRANTY.

By the common law, the vendor of personal property is not answerable for the quality of the thing sold, unless he either warrants its quality, or makes some false representation in respect to it, or knowing of the defect, omits to disclose it; and this is the law of Virginia.

Wilson v. Shackelford, 5

See Possession and Equity, No. 4.

WILLS.

1. The intention is to govern in the construction of a will. Therefore, where a testator, who devises his real estate to his children, and also a sum of money to one of them, so that his estate, both real and personal, not specifically given, shall be brought into estimate, and divided in such manner as to make their portions equal; the sum of money bequeathed as aforesaid, shall be taken into the general estimate, although the terms specifically given, and estimate, do not strictly apply to money; it being the plain intention, inferred from the whole will, to make all his children equal.

Calloway, &c. v. Langhorn & Wife, 181

2. In the construction of wills, the first object is, to gather the intention of the testator from the whole will; and this intention must prevail, unless it violate some rule of law.

Land, &c. v. Otley, 213

3. Where a testator leaves one half of his estate to his wife for life, and the use of the other half to her until his child or children come of age or marry, with directions that his children shall be supported and educated out of his latter half; the wife had no interest under this will, which, upon her death before the children attained their age or married, was transmissible to her representatives. THE OPINION OF CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL IN THE CASE OF GARNETT, EX'R OF BROOKE v. MACON, ET AL.

ADVERTISEMENT.

The subjects involved in the following Opinion, being of great and general concernment, wherever the principles of the Common and Chancery Law of England prevail; and the ability with which they are examined, induced me to believe that its publication would be acceptable to the profession.

The Opinion contains a full Statement of the Case, and of the positions and arguments of the Counsel.

Probably the following Abstract, will not be wholly unacceptable to the Reader.

What circumstances are indicative of an abandonment of a contract of sale, by a vendor. p. 12-3.

When the lands are charged with the payment of debts in the hands of the devisee; the creditor is bound to proceed against the Executor, and to exhaust the personal estate, before the lands become liable to his claim. p. 17, 18.

Since the proceeding against the personal representative, is, in substance, the foundation of the proceeding against the heir, or devisee; the argument for considering it as prima facie evidence against the heir, or devisee, may be irresistible; but it is not conclusive as an estoppel. pp. 17, 18.

A covenant never to put a bond in suit, is a release; and a release to one of several obligors, is a release to his co-obligors, whether they be bound jointly, or jointly and severally. But

A covenant not to sue one of several obligors, whether they be bound jointly and severally, or merely jointly, does not operate as a release to the others. pp. 21, 24, 27.

An Agreement by parol, cannot release an instrument of writing under seal. p. 29.

Where all the parties are before the Court, at the time of the Decree, and their several liabilities are clearly ascertained; it is the course of the Court, to Decree, in the first instance, against the party who is ultimately responsible. p. 30.

The creditor by receiving one moiety of his debt from one co-surety, does not thereby, injure the other;—nor can his liability be increased, nor his burthen augmented, by the agreement of the creditor, not to levy the remaining moiety, in any possible state of things, on the paying surety. p. 31.

Where a charge on lands is general, the purchaser is not bound to see to the application of the purchase money;—and there is no distinction, as to the operation of this rule, between a charge on lands which descend to the heir, or pass to a devisee, subject to the charge; and a devise to Executors, or other trustees, for the payment of debts. p. 34.

What degree of connivance on the part of the purchaser, in acts which may defeat the trust, will leave him responsible to the creditor. This question considered, and applied to the case—

Of a contract for the purchase of lands, equitably charged with the payment of debts, and notice of a debt given to the purchaser between the date of the contract, and the time when it is to be executed. p. 36, 37.

All persons acquiring property bound by a trust, with notice, are considered as trustees. p. 39.

A purchaser is subject to all the consequences of notice, if he receive it before payment of the purchase money. p. 39-40.

A purchaser with notice, must take the subject clothed with the trust, unless he can bring himself with the principle, that he is not bound to see to the application of the purchase money,—this principle examined. p. 39-42.

The purchaser of a chattel from an Executor, is not liable for the application of the purchase money, although such chattel be given in trust for a special purpose, or be itself a specific legacy. But if the Executor sells to a person who knows that there are no debts, or that all the debts are paid, or at such undervalue, as to indicate fraud, or for payment of his own debt, the purchaser will take the property subject to the trust. p. 44.

The principle of the cases which support this position, seems to be applicable to freehold estates charged with the payment of debts. p. 45, 49.

The principle by which a Court of Equity is governed, in enforcing the specific performance of contracts. p. 15.

A specific performance will not be decreed on the application of the vendor, unless his ability to make such a title as he has agreed to make, be unquestionable. This rule is not confined to cases of doubtful title. It applies to incumbrances of every description, which may, in any manner, embarrass the purchaser in the full and quiet enjoyment of his purchase. p. 51, 52.

The present doctrine of the Court of Chancery of England, and of the Courts of the United States, is, that where time is really material to the parties, the right to a specific performance, may depend upon it. p. 54.

A very great change in the value of the article, constitutes a serious objection to a decree for a specific performance, when claimed by the party whose fault it is, that the contract has not been executed. p. 57.

CIRCUIT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES,

FIFTH CIRCUIT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA, (EQUITY SIDE.)

OPINION OF THE COURT DELIVERED BY

THE HON. JOHN MARSHALL, CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Garnett, Ex'r of Brooke, v. Macon and Others.

Stanard and Leigh, for Plaintiff.

Call, Wickham and Wm. Hay, for Defendants.

This case was elaborately argued, May Term, 1825. On the 25th November, 1825, the following opinion was delivered by MARSHALL, Chief Justice.

Richard Brooke, by his last will, empowered his ex'rs, to sell his whole estate, and William Garnett, the plaintiff, alone proved the will, and took the executorship upon himself.

10 *On the 10th of June, 1818, William Garnett, sold the estate called Mantipike, to William H. Macon, the defendant, "for the sum of twenty-two dollars per acre; six thousand dollars of which are to be paid on the first day of January next, when possession will be given, and the balance in two equal annual payments from that date, which said two last payments, are to be secured by mortgage on the said land. The said William Garnett farther agrees to put the present corn-field land, in wheat, the said William H. Macon furnishing the seed. And it is farther agreed, that the said William H. Macon is to have power to make this agreement valid in one month from the date hereof, or to make the same null, and of no effect, by giving due notice to the said William Garnett, to that purport, within the time aforesaid."

On the 22d of August, William H. Macon, paid William Garnett, four thousand dollars, in part of the first payment; but having received notice afterward, that George Brooke, who devised Mantipike to Richard, had by his last will, charged his whole estate with the payment of his debts; and had in his life-time, become surety for Carter Braxton, in a large sum, to Robert Campbell, for which a Decree had been pronounced in the Court of Chancery, against Carter Braxton, Robert Price, ex'r of George Brooke, and against the representatives of Robert Page, who was also surety for Carter Braxton, which Decree was affirmed in the Court of Appeals, in October, 1799, and remains unsatisfied; and being advised by Counsel, that he, having notice thereof, the estate called Mantipike, would be charged with the said debt in his hands; he, on the 16th of December, addressed the following letter to the plaintiff:

"Sir, I am informed that Colonel George Brooke, the former owner of the 11 Mantipike tract *of land, became Carter Braxton's security for a large debt to Robert Campbell, and by his will, charged his lands with the payment of his debts; that the debt to Campbell is still due, and that the Mantipike lands are liable to be sold for the payment thereof. I, therefore, think proper to inform you, that I consider the contract, which I made with you, for the purchase of the said tract of land, as void; and request you, to return me the four thousand dollars, which I paid you, in part of the purchase money, with interest.

"I am Sir, very respectfully,
"W. H. MACON."

On the 26th of the same month, William Garnett, instituted his suit, in the Court of Chancery, of the State, against William H. Macon, and against the representatives of Robert Campbell, praying for a specific performance of the contract, and insists in his Bill, that the estate called Mantipike, would not be chargeable with the debts of George Brooke, in the hands of a purchaser, and insists also, for several reasons, which are dilated at length, that George Brooke, was not liable for the debts to Campbell, and that his devisees were not bound by the Decree against his Ex'r or estopped from contesting the claim.

The Chancellor was of opinion, that Brooke had been released by the conduct of Campbell, and that a specific performance of the contract ought to be decreed, and directed an account of the rents and profits of the state received by the Plaintiff, since the sale; but, information was received of Campbell's death, on which the suit abated, as to him, and was revived against William Keith, his representative, who appeared, and petitioned that the cause should be removed into this Court; which was ordered accordingly. Keith, as the representative of Campbell, has also filed a Bill against the representatives, heirs and devisees of George Brooke, praying that 12 *his debt may be paid; and to this Bill, William H. Macon, is made a Defendant; but this suit is not ready for trial.

In May, 1820, William H. Macon, filed his answer, in which he insists, that he ought to stand discharged from his contract, on account of the lands being incumbered with Campbell's debt, of which he had no notice, and that he purchased, "supposing the said Mantipike tract of land was free from incumbrances and charges of all kinds, except a mortgage by Richard Brooke to General Young, which was represented as of no great moment, and which the complainant was to pay off, before he made a deed for the land to this defendant, but has failed to do so, as this defendant understands."

He says, that on examining the records, which he did, in consequence of receiving notice of Campbell's debt, he found the question to be so perplexed and intricate, that the controversy would probably not be determined during his life, in consequence of which, he resolved to abandon the contract, and addressed a letter to the Plaintiff giving notice of his resolution. That in consequence thereof, as he presumes, the complainant kept possession of the tract of land, failed to tender a deed to the Defendant for it, or to demand the instalment in January, 1819; and paid for the seed wheat which Macon had purchased to seed the corn-field, according to the written contract; thus exhibiting every mark of a reciprocal abandonment of the contract on his part; and he gave no indication to the contrary till the institution of this suit, several months afterwards.

In argument, the first point which has been made by the Defendant Macon, is, that the contract was abandoned by both parties.

It is not pretended that there has been any express or formal abandonment on the part of the Plaintiff. The allegation is, that it is to be implied from his conduct.

To sustain this implication, the conduct of *the vendor, ought to be such, as to justify a reasonable man, in believing that he acquiesced in the decision of the vendee, to abandon the contract; it ought to be such as might reasonably influence the conduct of the vendee, and induce him to regulate his own affairs on the presumption that he was no longer incumbered by his contract. The attempt of the vendor to re-sell the estate, or the unequivocal exercise of ownership over it, unaccompanied with any explanation showing that he still considered the contract as binding, might be such an act; but there has been no attempt to re-sell the estate, or any unexplained act of ownership over it. On the contrary, a subpoena was taken out within ten days after the date of the letter of abandonment, and the Bill, since filed in consequence of this subpoena, claims a specific performance.

Had the Bill been immediately filed, and the subpoena executed, this point, it is presumed, would not have been made; but the Bill was not filed until June, 1819, and the subpoena was not returned executed, until January, 1820.

From these circumstances, the counsel for the Defendant, claim the same advantages to their client, as if the Plaintiff had acquiesced silently in his letter of the 16th December, 1818, until the service of the subpoena informed him, that a suit was depending. But I do not think this claim can be supported.

No laches are imputable to the Plaintiff. His determination to insist on the contract, seems to have been immediate; and the measures taken by him in pursuance of that determination were sufficiently prompt. A subpoena was issued, on the 10th day after the date of Colonel Macon's letter, but there was not time to execute it. New process was directed, and the law makes it the duty of the officers of the Court, to attend to that process. I do not think the delay which took place in executing 14 it, *can be justly imputed to Colonel Garnett, nor ought any forfeiture of right to be the consequence of that delay, unless some injury to Colonel Macon, had resulted from it. No injury is shown or alleged, nor is it probable that any can have arisen. From the vicinity of the two gentlemen to each other, their rank in life, the common conversations which grow out of such controversies, the interest which the parties took in it, and the enquiries they would naturally make, it is not reasonable to suppose, that while the vendor was in fact actively pressing his suit, and continually issuing new process, the vendee could act upon the presumption that he had abandoned his contract. But if these circumstances, which generally accompany transactions of this character, cannot be considered as belonging to this cause, the record, I think, furnishes satisfactory evidence, that Colonel Macon, was apprised of the determination of Colonel Garnett, to insist on the specific performance of the contract. Thomas G. Smith, deposes to a conversation with Colonel Macon, in which that gentleman said, that though, the counsel consulted by him had been of opinion that Mantipike was bound for Campbell's debt, the counsel consulted by William Garnett had advised otherwise, and that William Garnett said, he did not think himself at liberty, as a representative, to cancel the bargain.

The deposition of James M. Garnett too, though less explicit, bears on the same point. The very fact, that the vendee did not repeat his demand for re-payment of the four thousand dollars, he had advanced, shews, that he did not suppose the vendor had relinquished the contract.

Since then, the vendor did never in fact, relinquish the contract, but took early measures to enforce its specific performance; since the delay which took place in the service of process, did not proceed from him, and did not produce any real 15 *mischief to the vendee, I cannot think that the right to enforce a specific performance is in any degree affected by that delay.

It has been also argued, that the vendor ought to have done all that was required from him, by the contract. He ought to have tendered possession and a conveyance, on the first of January, 1819.

He certainly might have done so. But when it is recollected that previous to the first of January, 1819, he had received a letter from the vendee announcing his determination not to receive possession, or a conveyance, and had himself resorted to the laws for that remedy, which they afford for a broken contract, I cannot think that the omission, if it may be so termed, ought to vary that remedy, so far as respects a specific performance, whatever might be its influence on other questions which would arise in the cause, should the contract be carried into execution.

I come now to consider the validity of the objections made by the vendee, to a specific performance of the contract, supposing it not to be abandoned. He complains, that the title is incumbered and embarrassed with liens, of which he had no knowledge when the contract was made; and which would certainly have deterred him from making it, had they been communicated to him.

A Court of Equity, compels the specific performance of contracts, because it is the intention of the parties that they shall be performed. But the person who demands it, must be in a capacity to do, substantially, all that he has promised, before he can entitle himself to the aid of this Court. At what time this capacity must exist, whether it must be at the date of the contract, at the time it is to be executed, or at the time of the Decree, depends, I think, upon circumstances, which may vary with every case. There is no subject which more requires the exercise of a sound discretion. The enquiry in every case of the kind, must be, whether the vendor

16 "could at the time, have conveyed such a title, as the vendee had a right to demand? If he could not then, whether he can now? And if he can, whether there has been such a change of circumstances, that a Court of Equity, ought not to compel the vendee to receive it? The first and great objection to the title, is the lien supposed to be imposed on the Mantipike estate, by the will of George Brooke, for the payment of his debts.

In the year 1781, George Brooke, made his last will in writing, in which he devised as follows:—"After my just debts are paid, I give and dispose of the remainder of my estate, in the manner following" &c. The testator was then seised and possessed of Mantipike, which he devised to his son Richard. Richard Brooke, entered upon the property devised to him, and remained in possession of it, until his death, which happened in the year 1816. By his last will, he empowered his Executors, or such of them as might act, to sell his land. William Garnett the Plaintiff, alone qualified as Executor to the will, and sold the land to the defendant William H. Macon, without any intimation of the existence of Campbell's claim, or that George Brooke had charged his land with the payment of his debts.

He, now contends, that this claim constitutes no obstacle to a specific performance, of the contract, because:—First, it was not one of George Brooke's just debts, at the date of his will, or at the time of his death. Second, if it was a just debt, it does not charge the estate in the hands of William H. Macon.

First. Is the claim now made by Keith, on the part of Campbell, for a debt legally due from the estate of George Brooke, deceased?

As the suit for that claim is now pending, and is not yet ready for hearing, any positive decision respecting it, would, perhaps, be premature. It is, however, in the power of the Court, to form opinions

17 on some points of that case, subject, indeed, to future revision; because the facts on which those points must certainly depend, are in the record; and it may be proper to do so, because, if the claim be obviously unfounded, the course of the Court would be different from what it ought to be, if any strong presumptions exist in its favour.

The Defendants insist, that the Decree against the personal representatives of George Brooke, is conclusive evidence against his devisee, of the existence of the debt.

The cases cited by counsel, in support of this proposition, do not decide the very point. Not one of them brings directly into question, the conclusiveness of a judgment against the Executor, in a suit against the heir or devisee. They undoubtedly, show, that the Executor completely represents the testator, as the legal owner of his personal property, for the payment of his debts in the first instance, and is, consequently, the proper person to contest the claims of his creditors. Yet, there are strong reasons for denying the conclusiveness of a judgment against an Executor in an action against the heir. He is not a party to the suit,—cannot controvert the testimony,—adduce evidence in opposition to the claim,—or appeal from the judgment. In case of a deficiency of assets, the Executor may feel no interest in defending the suit, and may not choose to incur the trouble or expense attendant on a laborious investigation of the claim. It would seem unreasonable that the heir, who does not claim under the Executor, should be estopped by a judgment against him.

In the case against Munford's heirs, in this Court, the question was decided against the conclusiveness of such a judgment, and I am not satisfied that the decision was erroneous.

This case, however, varies from that, in a material circumstance. In that case, the heir was bound by the obligation of the ancestor, and was liable to 18 "the creditor directly. In this case, the creditor is bound to proceed against the Executor and to exhaust the personal estate before the lands become liable to his claim. The heir, or devisee, may indeed, in a Court of Chancery, be united with the Executor in the same action, but the Decree against him, would be dependant on the insufficiency of the personal estate. Since, then, the proceeding against the Executor, is, in substance, the foundation of the proceeding against the heir, or devisee, the argument for considering it as prima facie evidence, may be irresistible, but I cannot consider it as an estoppel. The judgment not being against a person representing the land, ought, I think, on the general principle, which applies to giving records in evidence, to be re-examinable when brought to bear upon the proprietor of the land.

It was said, but not pressed, by the counsel for the Plaintiff, that the Decree of the Court of Chancery, was not even prima facie evidence against the representatives of George Brooke. I do not concur with him in this proposition; but if I did, it would not, I think, materially affect this case. The Decree was against Braxton, as well as against the representatives of Brooke and Page; and is admitted to be conclusive against Braxton and his representatives. They could never be permitted to deny that Braxton owed Campbell the money specified in that Decree.

The undertaking, on which the Decree was pronounced against Brooke's ex'r is dated in 1775, and promises, under seal, to stand security for Braxton to Campbell, for the sum then due. This sum is fixed by the Decree against Braxton; and the defence now set up for Brooke, does not controvert that Decree as to Braxton, but insists on several circumstances which, as they contend, discharge Brooke from the liability incurred by his undertaking, as Braxton's surety.

19 *The first of these is, the release of Broad-neck, which had been mortgaged for the debt, in 1769, when the Bills drawn by Braxton and sold to Campbell, came back protested. William Aylett and George Brooke, became sureties to Campbell for this debt.

On the 21st day of May, in the year 1773, Campbell joined Braxton in a conveyance of the mortgaged premises to John Shermer, which it recorded in September of the same year. On the 15th of December, 1775, Aylett and Brooke transmit to Campbell an instrument of writing under seal, which after reciting a former undertaking as sureties for Braxton, contains these words: "We therefore, in consideration of our former agreement, do promise and oblige ourselves to stand security for the said Braxton to the said Campbell, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, for the sum of money now due from the said Braxton to the said Campbell."

It is contended for the Plaintiff, that this suretyship was probably undertaken, in the confidence that the mortgaged property was amply sufficient to discharge the debt, and that Campbell, by releasing this property without the consent of the sureties, discharged them.

There would be great force in this objection, had the release of the mortgaged premises been dated subsequent to the engagement made by Aylett and Brooke. But that engagement was dated in December, 1775, and the deed of conveyance by Braxton and Campbell to Shermer, was recorded in September, 1773. No evidence exists, that either the mortgage or its release, was communicated to Aylett or Brooke, other than the presumption arising from the notoriety of such transactions, and from the fact that both deeds were recorded. These circumstances are precisely as strong to prove a knowledge of the deed to Shermer, as of the deed to Campbell.

20 *were it even proved that the first bond of Aylett and Brooke, anteceded the deed to Shermer. The undertaking made in December, 1775, cannot be presumed to have been induced by a deed of mortgage which had been released more than two years, and although it is expressed to be made in consideration of the prior undertaking, yet that prior undertaking would not have been renewed, under circumstances, which, in the opinion of the parties themselves absolved them from it, both in law and conscience. The fair inference from this renewal is, that the parties being mutual friends, the conveyance to Shermer was with the knowledge and assent of all.

The second objection arises from a fact, which is considered as an implied release of Aylett from his joint obligation with Brooke.

On that instrument, is this indorsement, "August 6th, 1777, I do oblige myself to perform every engagement that Colonel William Aylett, was bound by the within, to perform, and to be considered as one of the securities of Wm. Braxton, in the room of Colo. Aylett. Witness my hand, this 6th day of Aug. 1777. "ROBERT PAGE."

It is contended, that this indorsement must be considered as made with the consent of Campbell, who, from its terms, and from suing the representatives of Brooke and not of Aylett, must be considered as having agreed to discharge Aylett.

The inference is, I think, a fair one. The instrument always remained in possession of Campbell, who must be presumed to have been privy and assenting to the indorsement; and who has avowed it, by his suit.

It is insisted, that the legal effect of this agreement is to discharge Brooke as well as Aylett, because the release of one joint obligor, releases the other.

It is obvious that the release of Brooke was not *contemplated by the parties. If such be the effect of the instrument; an operation is given to the words, which they do not naturally import, and which the parties could never have foreseen or intended. If a positive rule of law require such a construction, the Court must make it; but the construction can be justified only by a positive and well settled rule. The common rule of law, and it seems also, to be the rule of reason, is, that words shall subserve the intent; but when the reverse of this rule is to be adopted, and both the words and the intent of an agreement are to yield to a technical principle, that principle ought to be sustained by decisions of unquestionable authority, the application of which, cannot be doubted.

The principle is, that a covenant never to put a bond in suit, is a release; and, it is also settled, that a release to one of several obligors, is a release to his co-obligors.

Both these points, have been frequently decided; and the Plaintiff is certainly entitled to the benefit of those decisions, as far as they apply to his case.

The principle will be found in any abridgment, (a) or general treatises on the subject, with a reference to the cases, which establish it. In no one of them, does the obligation contain any other party, than him with whom the covenant is made. In all of them, the covenant, if broken, gives a right of action to the parties bound in the obligation, and the measure of their damages is given by the recovery of the obligee in his suit against them. If A. is bound to B. in an obligation, and they enter into a covenant, stipulating that it shall never be put in suit, notwithstanding which B. puts it in suit, this breach of covenant gives A. an action against B. in which he must recover in damages, precisely the sum to which the judgment obtained by B. may amount. To avoid circuity of action, this covenant may be pleaded as a release.

22 *Thus far the cases go; and if there be one which goes farther, I have not found it. To bring himself within their letter, Brooke, ought to show a covenant, in which Campbell stipulates with Aylett and himself, never to put their bond in suit. To bring himself within their spirit, he ought to show some agreement giving him an action against Campbell, in which his right would be commensurate with any judgment Campbell might obtain against him. In such a case, and in such a case only, would the principle of the decision relied on, apply; because, in such a case only, the sole effect of leaving the instrument to operate according to its language, would be to produce circuity of action. In such a case too, the parties can have no other intention than to defeat the obligation. It is the sole object and effect of their covenant. To construe such an instrument then, as a release, is to give it the effect intended by the parties.

I think the proposition may be stated, without fear of its being disproved by the books, that a covenant containing no words of release, has never been construed as a release, unless it gave to the party claiming that construction, a right of action, which would precisely countervail that to which he was liable; and unless also, it was the intention of the parties, that the last instrument, should defeat the first.

This general view of the precedents on which the plaintiff relies, would be sufficient to satisfy my mind, that they do not apply to the case under consideration, had not the contrary opinion been urged at bar, with all the earnestness of conviction, and been supported by an authority, given on the case itself, which is entitled to the utmost respect. I shall, therefore, look farther into the question, and examine some cases and principles, which are adverse to the construction claimed by the Plaintiff's counsel.

23 *Lacy v. Kynaston, (2 Salk. 575, 12 Mod. 551.) [2 Ld. Raym, 688.] was in substance this.—Articles were entered into by the members of a company of comedians, binding themselves, to pay one hundred pounds, to the representative of the Plaintiff's intestate, who was a member of the company, within three months after his death, should he continue to act during his life. The action was brought against Kynaston, who was also a member of the company, and the declaration avers, that Plaintiff's intestate, did continue to act during his life. The Defendant pleads in bar, articles subsequently entered into, by the same parties, including the Plaintiff's intestate, stipulating jointly and severally, that if the Defendant, Kynaston, should give notice of his intent to give over acting in said companies he should be free and discharged of and from all debts, &c. entered into by him, on account of the company, and that the Plaintiff's intestate, and the rest, should save harmless and indemnify the Defendant, from all such debts, &c. or any matter or thing relating to the company. To this plea, the Plaintiff demurred and the only question was, whether the articles amounted in law to a defeasance or release, or were to be construed only as a covenant. The Court was of opinion, that it was only a covenant, for several reasons, which are assigned in the opinion. In discussing the question, the principle, that a perpetual covenant amounts to a release, was particularly considered, and the reason given for construing such a covenant as a release, is to avoid circuity of action, "Because" says the Court, "there, one should precisely recover the same damage that he had suffered by the others suing the bond. A. is bound to B. and B. covenants never to put the bond in suit against A., if after B. will sue A. upon the bond, he may plead the covenant, by way of release. But if A. and B.

24 be jointly and severally *bound to C. in a sum certain; and C. covenants with A. not to sue him, that shall not be a release, but a covenant only; because the covenants only, not to sue A. but does not covenant not to sue B. for the covenant is not a release in its nature, but only by construction, to avoid circuity of action; for when he covenants not to sue one, he still has a remedy, and then it shall be construed as a covenant, and no more." The same point was determined in Dean v. Newhall, (8 T. R. 168,) in which the authorities were reviewed at length, and a decision of great importance was taken, between an actual and a constructive release.

It has been insisted by the Plaintiff's counsel, that these cases do not apply, because they relate to obligations which were joint and several; whereas, the obligation of Aylett and Brooke was joint.

This objection merits consideration.

It is admitted to be law, that a release to one of several obligors, whether they be bound jointly, or jointly and severally, discharged the others, and may be pleaded in bar, by all. (2 Saund. [48 a] note; 2 Salk. 574; 12 Mo. 550.) That the obligation is joint, or joint and several, then, can make no difference, if there be an actual release. The difference, if there be any, consists in the construction of the instrument. The same words, it may be contended, would amount to a release of a joint obligation, which would not release one which was joint and several.

Has this ever been so determined? I can only say, if it has, I have not found the case. In the absence of authority, the proposition must rest upon its reasonableness, and on analogy.

The reason assigned by the Plaintiff in support of this distinction, is that which is given by the Court in Lacy v. Kynaston. In case of an obligation which is several as well as joint, the Plaintiff may still sue 25 the obligor, to whom the covenant does not apply, *without violating his engagement, or subjecting himself to a suit; whereas, if the obligation be joint only, both obligors must be joined in the action. There is certainly much in this argument, which deserves consideration.

Without admitting its conclusiveness, which I am far from doing, it is necessary, as an indispensable preliminary to its application to the cause at bar, to shew that the indorsement on the bond of Aylett and Brooke, amounts to an agreement on the part of Campbell, not to sue Aylett, on which agreement Aylett might recover damages equivalent to those he had sustained by the suit.

I do not think this is shown. Aylett is no party to the indorsement, and it is only upon the intention, that Campbell can be considered as coming under any stipulation to him. What, then, was his intention? Certainly not to discharge the obligation. The indorsement supposes the obligation to remain in full force, and is received in the confidence, that it does remain in force. It may well be doubted, whether a destruction of the obligation would not also destroy the indorsement; for, Page agrees only to stand in the place of Aylett, in the obligation, and if that be annulled, it is by no means clear, that Page is bound to any thing. Were this even otherwise, it is very certain, that Page would be placed in a situation entirely different from what he intended. If the indorsement is to be considered as a substantive agreement, referring to the obligation, for the sole purpose of ascertaining the sum for which he was bound, and remaining in force after the destruction of that obligation, then Page would be liable to Campbell for the whole debt, without retaining that recourse against Brooke for a moiety of it, which Aylett certainly possessed. He would not then stand in the room of Col. Aylett, as the indorsement imports, but in the room of both Aylett and Brooke, which the indorsement does not import. To construe

26 Campbell's* assent to this indorsement, then, as an agreement not to sue Aylett, if the effect of that agreement would be to destroy the obligation, would be to defeat the plain intention of the parties, and effect an object they designed to guard against. This is not to be tolerated, if the act can be otherwise construed. I can perceive no difficulty in doing so. The intention of the indorsement, being to secure Col. Aylett, against the claim of William Campbell, and to transfer his liability to Mr. Page, leaving Mr. Brooke still bound, the indorsement must be so construed, as to give full effect to the whole of this intention, so far as its words will justify. Now, if by supposing an agreement on the part of Campbell not to sue Aylett, we plainly defeat the intention of the parties, and probably annul the instrument itself, we ought not to suppose such an agreement, but some other more congenial to their views. Their object would be effected by joining Aylett in the suit on the obligation, and either not proceeding to judgment against him, or not using the judgment when obtained. If it were true, that the suit could never be brought against Brooke without joining Aylett, in the writ, it would be much more rational to suppose that an agreement for his security, omitting to describe the mode by which it was to be effected, was to be carried into execution by means consistent with other objects plainly intended by the parties, than by means which must defeat those objects.

The respect which the law, in all such cases, pays to the intention with which an instrument is executed may receive some illustration from the difference between the construction of a perpetual and of a temporary covenant, not to put a bond in suit. Precisely the same words, which, in a perpetual covenant, is a bar to an action, cannot, if used in a temporary covenant, be pleaded to an action brought during the suspension. Why is this? If the perpetual covenant can bar the action for ever 27 why may* not the temporary covenant be pleaded to an action brought while the suspension exists? The reason of the distinction is founded in the principle, that a personal action once suspended, is gone for ever. Although, therefore, it is the intention of the parties to suspend the action, and although this intention is expressed by their words; yet as the consequence of giving effect to this intention would be to destroy another more important object;—the validity of an instrument not designed to be destroyed,—such a covenant is not allowed to constitute, even a temporary bar, but the party injured by its breach must take his remedy by a cross action upon it.

On general principles, then, I should, in the absence of express authority, be led to the conclusion, that a covenant with one of several joint obligors not to sue him, could not be pleaded as a release. But the very case, has, I think, been decided.

In Hutton v. Eyre (1 Marshall, 603, [6 Taunt. 289,]) which was cited by Mr. Call, the action was brought for money paid to the use of the Defendant. The Plaintiff and Defendant being partners, entered into a deed on the 26th August, 1809, to dissolve their partnership, on the 1st of January, 1810; and agreed that neither would in the meantime, contract any debt on the credit of the firm. On the 27th of October, 1810, the Defendant executed an assignment of all his property to Trustees, for the benefit of his creditors; in consideration of which, the creditors covenanted and agreed with the Defendant not to sue him, on account of any debt due to them from him; and that in case they did sue him, the deed of assignment should be a sufficient release and discharge for him. The Trustees sold the property assigned to them, and paid five shillings in the pound, to the creditors, after which, the Plaintiff paid the residue of certain debts, contracted by the defendant between the date of the agreement and the time of dissolution, on the credit 28 of* the firm, for which this suit was brought. It was contended for the Defendant, that the covenant not to sue him, being perpetual, was a release, not only to him, but to his partner also; and that the payment, being voluntary, gave no cause of action.

It is observable, that this case, is stronger than that under consideration would be, did the indorsement made by Page, on the bond of Aylett and Brooke, even contain a stipulation that no suit should be brought against Aylett, because, the instrument provides expressly, that in case suit should be brought, the deed of assignment should be a sufficient release and discharge.

In delivering the opinion of the Court, Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, noticed the cases of Lacy v. Kynaston, and Dean v. Newhall; but observing the circumstance, that those cases were on joint and several obligations, and were therefore, not direct authority for the case before the Court, he added, "we must look at the principle on which the rule has been applied, that a covenant not to sue, shall operate as a release. Now, where there is only A. on one side, and B. on the other, the intention of the covenant by A. not to sue B. must be taken to mean a release to B. who is accordingly, absolutely discharged from the debt, which A. undertakes never to put in suit against him. The application, therefore, of the principle, in that case, not only acts in prevention of the circuitry of action, but, falls in with the clear intention of the parties. But in a case like the present, it is impossible to contend that, by a covenant not to sue the defendant, it was the intention of the covenantors, to release the Plaintiff, who was able to pay what his partner might be deficient in. It would have been an easier and a shorter method to have given a release, than to make this covenant. The only reason, therefore, for their adopting this course, was, that they did not choose 29 to execute "a release to the Defendant, because, that would also, have operated as a release to the Plaintiff; whereas they considered that a bare covenant not to sue the Defendant, would not extend to his partner. As, therefore, the terms of the covenant do not require such a construction, and as such construction would be manifestly against the intention of the parties, we are decidedly of opinion, that it ought not to be permitted so to operate."

I can add nothing to the language of Chief Justice Gibbs, to show farther the direct application of this case to that under the consideration of the Court. That this, was not a joint obligation, but a joint assumption, constitutes, I think, no difference in the cases.

In considering a principle of construction, which rests entirely on a technical and positive rule, as defeating a plain intention it may not be altogether improper to consider the action of other technical principles on the case.

It is clear, that if this indorsement be construed as an agreement between Campbell and Page, who is a stranger to the bond, it cannot release Brooke, the obligor. This is expressly stated by the Court in the case of Lacy v. Kynaston. But if it be considered as an agreement between Campbell and Aylett, still, it is an agreement by parol only, and an agreement by parol, cannot release an instrument of writing under seal. This subject is discussed in 2 Saunders, 47 in a note of Mr. Williams. Brooke does not allege satisfaction of the contract, but a discharge from it. He does not allege performance, but that he is not bound to perform. The instrument which will sustain such a defence, must be of equal dignity, with that which it professes to dissolve.

According to the best view I can take of the question, I cannot consider the indorsement made by Page on the bond of Aylett and Brooke, as implying any 30 *agreement on the part of Campbell, which could be used by Brooke in Law or Equity as a release.

The next objection to Campbell's claim is, that the estate of Robert Page, ought to be exhausted, before recourse is had to Brooke; because in June, 1792, Braxton mortgaged sundry slaves to Page and White, to indemnify Page, on account of his suretyship, and White, for suretyships entered into by him. Braxton was afterwards taken in execution at the suit of Richard Adams, upon which, Page and White, agreed that a sufficient portion of the mortgaged property should be sold to discharge the execution. It is contended on the part of Brooke that he has an equal interest with Page, in this mortgage, that it was the duty of Page, to see to its application to the discharge of the debt, for which they were both bound, and that he is liable first, for his negligence in allowing the property to be wasted; and secondly, for having allowed a part of it to be applied to a different object.

As Campbell was not party or privy to this transaction, it can give Brooke no claim on Campbell, were it even admitted to give him an equity against Page. It is undoubtedly the course of the Court, to Decree in the first instance, against the party who is ultimately responsible; but this is only done where the parties are before the Court, at the time of the Decree, and their several liabilities, are clearly ascertained. It would be alike unprecedented and unreasonable, to anticipate, in this action, the liability of Page to Brooke, for a transaction not before the Court; and to compel Campbell to resort to that liability, and to forego his direct claim on his immediate debtor, and that without any proof of the competency of Page's estate, to satisfy the unascertained equity of Brooke. The unreasonableness of such a pretension seems so obvious, that I presume it is brought forward only on account of its connection with a subsequent transaction between Page and Campbell.

31 *On the 6th of June, 1821, articles of agreement were entered into between the representatives of Page, and the Attorney in Fact, of Campbell, in which Campbell agrees in consideration of one moiety of the whole debt paid by Page's representatives, not to proceed against them, for satisfaction of any part of the Decree which might be obtained against the representatives of Page and Brooke; but this agreement is to be without prejudice to his right to pursue the other Defendants, till the other moiety of the debt should be satisfied, "and the said Campbell farther covenants, that the representatives of Page, shall never be made to contribute any thing to the estate of George Brooke, on account of any payment, the said Brooke's estate may be Decreed to make to the said Campbell."

This agreement not to levy the Decree, which might be obtained against the representatives of Brooke and Page, upon the estate of Page, which had already paid one moiety of the whole debt, is in terms, which exclude the idea of being technically a release of the action, for that is to proceed, as if the agreement had not been made. The representatives of Brooke, can avail themselves of it so far only, as it raises an equity in their favour, against Campbell. What is this equity? It cannot be contended, that receiving one moiety of the debt from Page, is an injury to Brooke; Ex Parte, Gifford, (6 Vesey, jun. 805;) nor can he be injured by the agreement, not to levy Brooke's moiety, in any possible state of things, on Page. The liability of Brooke cannot be increased, nor his burden augmented by this transaction. It may be diminished, because his possible liability for more than a moiety of the debt, is removed. Can the covenant that the representatives of Page shall never be made to contribute any thing to the estate of George Brooke on account of any payment the *said Brooke's estate may be decreed to make to the said Campbell, give Brooke an equity against Campbell?

To sustain this, it will be necessary to prove, that the estate of Brooke has an equity against that of Page, and that it is deprived of that equity, by this agreement. The amount of this injury, is the precise extent of Brooke's claim upon Campbell.

Brooke's equity against Page, is founded on the agreement that a part of the property mortgaged to White and Page, might be applied in payment of the debt due from Braxton to Adams, and on the failure of Page to apply the mortgaged property to Campbell's debt.

This mortgage was obtained for the benefit of Page and White, in proportion to their respective responsibilities, and it will not, I presume, be denied, that they are to be completely exonerated, before any equitable claim on the fund, can accrue to Brooke. How far Mr. White may have been relieved, does not appear, nor is it shown that one cent arising from this property, has ever been applied to the use of Mr. Page. Admitting him to be responsible for the sum paid to Adams, his responsibility can be only for the excess of that sum, over the debts the mortgage was intended to secure, and Brooke ought to show that excess. Its existence is not, and cannot be pretended.

As little foundation is there for the claim growing out of the alleged negligence of Page.

It will scarcely be pretended, that one of two sureties who obtained an indemnity for himself, becomes thereby responsible to the other, for that other's moiety of the debt, however insufficient the thing given as an indemnity may be, even to secure himself. If this cannot be pretended, it will certainly be required from the person who claims the residue, to show, that there was a residue, and that it has been lost to him, by the fault of the party whose responsibility *he alleges. His difficulties would not, even then, be overcome. The enquiry would still be, why did he not himself proceed to assert his equity, by calling on the mortgagee and mortgagor to apply the fund to its proper object, and thereby relieve him to the extent of his right. But I enter not into this enquiry because the subject is not, and probably never will be, before the Court. It is enough to say, that this equity cannot be assumed in this suit, to the discharge of Brooke's debt to Campbell.

I will barely add, to prevent my being understood as deciding any thing, which might affect a point, not strictly before the Court, that I do not mean to indicate any opinion whether the contract between Campbell and Page, could, or could not, influence any claim of Brooke on Page, growing out of the conduct of Page respecting the mortgage of 1792. In deciding on the right of the Plaintiff to demand a specific performance of his contract with Macon, that question must be considered as remaining open.

An additional objection to Campbell's claim on the Mantipike estate, is derived from the length of time which has elapsed, since the Decree, by which his debt was established.

The Decree of affirmance, was entered on the 3d of March, 1800, in the Court of Chancery; and on the 29th of September, in the same year, all attempts to find the mortgaged property having failed, executions were directed by the Court to issue against the estate of Brooke and Page, respectively, in the hands of their respective representatives, who, on the 18th of March, 1801, were ordered to settle their several accounts of administration, before a Commissioner of the Court. From that time, till the 27th of October, 1820, when the supplemental bill was filed, no step whatever has been taken, against Brooke's estate. By this gross negligence, the Plaintiff alleges, that his testator has been greatly injured, if Campbell be now permitted to charge his debt upon Mantipike.

*There is undoubtedly, great weight in this objection; but, the extent of its influence on Campbell's claim, depends on circumstances, the testimony concerning which, is not to be found in the record before the Court. It will form a very material part of the case, in which Keith is Plaintiff. That case being not ripe for a hearing, the claim of Campbell upon Mantipike, even while it remained in the hands of the devisee, must, for the present, be considered as uncertain. Previous to any discussion of the effect of such a claim, on this contract, the Court will proceed to the second point, made by the Plaintiff, in the argument, which is, that Second. If Campbell's is one of George Brooke's just debts, and is chargeable on his lands, still, it cannot charge Mantipike, in the hands of William H. Macon.

In considering this point, I shall assume for the present two propositions:

1st. Had Keith's suit, praying a sale of Mantipike for Campbell's debt, been instituted before the contract between Garnett and Macon, was entered into, the subsequent sale, made by the Executor, without the assent of the Court or creditor, could not have relieved the land from the charge created by George Brooke's will.

2d. Had the conveyance been made, and the purchase money been paid, before notice of the claim, the purchaser would not have been affected by it.

It is unquestionably true that, whatever doubts may exist, respecting the liability of a purchaser, for the application of the purchase money, to schedule debts, with which lands are charged, he is exempt from all liability for its application to debts generally. Had the contract then, been fully executed before this claim was asserted, Mantipike would have been clearly exonerated from it.

These propositions are stated, for the purpose of clearing the way, to the very case before the Court; *the case of a contract for the purchase of land, equitably charged with the payment of debts, and notice of a debt given to the purchaser between the date of the contract, and the time when it is to be executed.

In considering this case, the question immediately occurs, whether there is any distinction between a charge on lands, which descend to the heir, or pass to a devisee, subject to the charge; and a devise to executors or other trustees, for the payment of debts.

In Moseley, 96, [Anonymous] and in Nelson's Ch. Rep. 36, this question was answered in the affirmative by the Court; and it was determined, that where lands were charged with debts generally, they remained liable to creditors in the hands of a purchaser. This distinction was, however, overruled in the case of Elliott v. Merryman, (Barnard, Ch. R. 78, 81-2) in which The Master of the Rolls determined, that in such a case the purchaser was not liable for the application of the purchase money, and said that "otherwise, whenever lands are charged with the payment of debts generally, they could never be discharged, without a suit in Chancery, which would be extremely inconvenient."

There are many circumstances in the case of Elliott v. Merryman, showing, that the creditors acquiesced in the sales and looked to the vendor for their money, which might have had great influence on the mind of the Judge; and, if that case stood alone, the question might not be considered as settled. But it does not stand alone. The principle laid down by The Master of the Rolls, appears to have been followed ever since; and in Walker v. Smalwood, (Amb. 676,) which was a charge on land for debts generally, the Chancellor said, "the Court has established it as a rule, that where the charge is general, the purchaser is not bound to see to the application of the purchase money." This rule has been pursued invariably in the English Courts for near a century, and may *therefore, be considered as well settled. Although the charge creates no legal estate, it manifests a clear intent that the person in whose favor it is made, shall receive so much out of the land, which a Court of Equity considers as a trust, and converts the owner of the legal estate, into a trustee. The heir or devisee, being once considered as a trustee, and the charge considered as a trust, public convenience, and uniformity of decision, would lead to an assimilation of these charges, or implied trusts, to those which are express; and, in general, where no other question arises, than that what relates to the construction of the trust, and the respective duties it imposes on a vendor and vendee, in a case attended with no peculiar circumstances, a Court of Equity perceives no ground of distinction between them. But, if it be admitted as a principle, that in a case of direct and culpable, or of negligent and constructive collusion between the vendor and vendee, by which the trust may be defeated, the purchaser may become responsible for the application of the purchase money; or, in other words, the land may remain charged in his hands; it is possible that there may be a difference in the testimony required to establish this constructive collusion, in the one case, and in the other.

If lands be devised to trustees or executors, to be sold for the payment of debts, the devisee possesses a legal, but not a beneficial estate in the premises. He can sell for the purposes of the trust only; and the vendee can consider him as acting no otherwise, than in the execution of a trust for which he has been selected by the owner of the property. This confidence being placed in him, by the person who had the sole right to dispose of the property, at his will, no other can question the correctness of his proceeding, or can be justifiable in suspecting any intention to violate the trust. The *payment of the purchase money, therefore, to the trustee, is an act, which is the regular consequence of the contract; and, if that be made fairly, the purchaser has no right to enquire in what manner the residue of the trust will be executed. He has no right to suspect, that the person who has been selected by the Testator, for its execution, will violate the trust reposed in him, and no collusion between him and the trustee, ought to be implied from equivocal acts. The existence of a debt, is the very circumstance which justifies a sale, and notice of its existence, can never excuse the purchaser for withholding the payment of the purchase money.

But where lands descend to the heir, or pass to the devisee, he does not necessarily sell, in execution of the trust, but for his own purposes. The trust is, in a great measure, the creature of a Court of Equity; and the heir, or devisee, is made a trustee by the Court. When he sells, he is not executing a power confided to him for the purpose of paying debts, but is parting with an interest vested in himself, for his own use, which interest is charged with debts. The purchaser does not consider the seller as executing a trust, nor does he so consider himself; but each considers him as acting for his own benefit. If in such a case, the charge still remains unsatisfied, the purchaser, who has notice of it, may be considered as aiding in, and conniving at, a violation of the trust, under circumstances which would not justify the same conclusion, if the trustee professed to act in the execution of his trust.

It becomes, therefore, material to inquire, what degree of connivance on the part of the purchaser, in acts which may defeat the trust, will leave him responsible to the creditor.

It is scarcely necessary to say, that positive fraud, or direct collusion for the purpose of defeating the trust, will charge the purchaser. It is unnecessary to urge this proposition, because the principle is, I 38 believe, conceded by all, and because too, the transaction before the Court, has no taint of that description. Its moral fairness is not questioned; and the sole enquiry is, whether the purchaser by proceeding with the contract, and paying the purchase money, would have exposed himself to the hazard of such a constructive collusion as to leave him subject to the claim of the creditor.

In pursuing this inquiry it is proper to recollect, that Mantipike, was devised by George Brooke, to his son Richard, charged with the payment of his debts. This devise gave Richard, an absolute estate at Law, subject to an Equity, which could be asserted only in a Court of Chancery. Richard Brooke, would be considered, in this Court, as a trustee for the creditors of his Father, and had they applied to a Court of Equity, a sale of the property would, if necessary, have been decreed. Richard, survived his Father upwards of thirty years, during which time, no claim was asserted on Mantipike; and in his last will, devised his estate to be sold, and the money divided among his children. One clause is supposed to charge his real, as well as personal estate, with his debts.

Although a Court of Equity, will consider the trust with which Mantipike was chargeable in the hands of Richard, as passing with the land, to his devisee, yet the devisee might naturally consider himself as acting under the express trust, contained in the will of his immediate testator. The purpose of his sale, would be, to comply with the will of Richard, and any presumption, that he might possibly hold himself bound to pay the debts of George, is prevented so far as respects Campbell's claim, by the fact, that he denied all liability for that claim. If the purchaser should, after receiving notice of that claim, proceed to pay the purchase money to the seller, who contested its validity, and did not hold himself responsible for it, 39 the question arises, whether payment under such circumstances, might not be considered in a Court of Equity, as so far implicating the purchaser in an act tending to defeat the trust, as to charge him, in the event of a failure on the part of the trustee, with the amount of the debt, so far as the purchase money was liable for it. With full notice of the claim, he pays the money to a person, who receives it, not for the avowed purpose of applying it to the objects of the trust, but of applying it to distinct trusts created by the Will of which he is executor.

This state of things, presents a case entitled to very serious consideration.

It is an old rule, that all persons acquiring property bound by a trust, with notice, shall be considered as trustees. The ancient cases on this point, are collected in Equity Cases Abridged, under the title Notice; and the modern decisions, maintain the principle. The purchaser is subject to all the consequences of notice, if he receives it before payment of the purchase money. In one case, Wigg v. Wigg, (1 Atk. 382, 384) this rule has been carried so far, as to affect the purchaser who had paid his purchase money, but had not received his conveyance. Whatever may be thought of the rule, as applying generally to cases of this description, it has, I believe, never been doubted, that notice after the contract, and before the payment of the purchase money, made the purchaser a trustee.

That the charge created by the clause in George Brooke's will, which subjects his lands to the payment of his debts, is a trust in the view of a Court of Equity, is admitted, and the purchaser, with notice, must take the land clothed with that trust, unless he can bring himself within the principle, that he is not bound to see to the application of the purchase money.

I have, certainly, no disposition to contract this principle within narrower 40 limits than have been heretofore assigned to it. On the contrary, I am strongly inclined to the opinion that, if the instrument by which the trust is created, contains no provision contradicting the presumption, that the person who is to make the sale, is also to execute the trust throughout, it will be found difficult to maintain the dicta which are scattered thick through the books, declaring the purchaser bound to see to the application of the purchase money, in cases of scheduled debts, or legacies. The principle, however, which supports this opinion, must be examined, to determine how far it will carry us. The person creating the trust, has confided its execution to the trustee, where he has named one; and it is a part of his duty to sell the trust property, and, generally, to receive the purchase money, and dispose of it for the purposes of the trust. The trust could not be executed without a sale, and sales would be very much embarrassed, if the purchaser, by the mere act of purchase, became a trustee. In all cases, therefore, where the objects are not so defined, as to be brought, at once, to the view of the purchaser, it is settled, that he is not affected by them, and has only to pay the purchase money. The same rule is established in the case of a charge, where the lands descend, or are devised, liable to the payment of debts. In such case, a Court of Equity considers the heir, or devisee, as a trustee, and exercises the same controul over him, as over a trustee named by a testator.

In either case, if there be nothing to show that the trustee is acting in violation of his trust, the purchaser must consider him, as acting in pursuance of it; and as the sale may be a necessary part of it, the purchaser has done every thing incumbent on him, when he pays the purchase money, and is, consequently, relieved from the necessity of enquiring into the conduct of the trustee.

But trusts, whether express or implied, are the peculiar objects of care to 41 Courts of Equity, and are *guarded from abuse, with great vigilance. In the exercise of this vigilance, they extend their control, not only over the trustees themselves, but over all those who have transactions with the trustees. Their endeavours to secure the faithful execution of trusts, would often be defeated, if their regulations could not comprehend and bind those who contract for the trust property. To prevent the abuse of trust by the trustee, it is necessary to annul his acts, so far as they constitute an abuse; or, in other words, to consider the property in the hands of a purchaser, who has aided in the abuse, as still charged with the trust. In affirmance of this principle, The Master of the Rolls said, in a late case, [Balfour v. Welland,] (16 Ves. jun. 156.) "Where the act is a breach of duty in the trustee, it is very fit, that those who deal with him should be affected by an act, tending to defeat the trust, of which they have notice."

Plain as this principle is, and strictly conformable as it is to the general doctrines of a Court of Equity, there is some difficulty in applying it to particular cases. It is not easy to mark the precise act, which constitutes such a breach of duty in the trustee, as will affect the purchaser. If William Garnett be considered in this Court as a trustee for the execution of George Brooke's Will, by the sale of Mantipike, it would defeat the trust, to sell that estate for the uses described in Richard Brooke's Will, unless the debts of George Brooke, are to be considered as the debts of Richard Brooke, provided for by that clause in his will, which respects his own debts: And if William Garnett, sold with the avowed purpose, of excluding the debts of George Brooke, or if he should proceed to distribute the money according to the will of Richard Brooke, disregarding the claims of George Brooke's creditors, if there be any, the trust, so far as respected those claims, would be defeated; and a purchaser intending to aid in thus 42 defeating the trust, could *not be perfectly secure. But if William Garnett sold with the intention of paying George Brooke's creditors first, and then of distributing the residue of the money according to the will of Richard Brooke; the act of sale would be no breach of trust, since a sale would be necessary for its performance. A purchaser therefore, of the Mantipike estate might be placed in some peril. After receiving notice from a creditor George Brooke, he might be considered, if he proceeded with the contract, as taking upon himself a responsibility for the subsequent transactions of William Garnett, which was no part of his engagement, and which he did not mean to take.

I very readily admit, that if a trustee sells for the payment of debts generally, he is at liberty to contest any particular debt, and no notice to the purchaser can involve him in the contest. But, in such case, the trustee is in the fair execution of his trust, and regular performance of his duty; and the purchaser, having no right to intrude himself into the trust, cannot be made responsible for its execution. But if the trustee, not professing to seil under the trust, holds himself absolved from it, and this is made known to the purchaser, the question, whether by completing the purchase, he assists in defeating the trust, and will be held responsible in a Court of Equity, becomes a much more serious enquiry. In pursuing it, all the circumstances must be considered, in order to determine, whether they prove satisfactorily, that the trustee is not acting in pursuance of the trust, but under the opinion that it does not bind him.

In this case, William Garnett is the immediate trustee of Richard Brooke, charged with the execution of his will, which directs the sale of Mantipike for the benefit of his children, and probably for the payment of his own debts. Although a Court of Equity will consider the land as charged with any debt due from George

43 Brooke, and treat the devisee *of Richard Brooke, as a trustee for such creditor; yet the devisee would assume a very great responsibility, were he to undertake to pay this debt, without the direction of a Court. If the existence of the debt might be presumed, of which great doubts have been suggested at the bar, the extent of his testator's liability for it, is far from being certain. The personal estate of George Brooke ought to have been exhausted before his real estate became chargeable, and the proportion of the debt with which Mantipike ought, under all circumstances, to be charged, could not safely be settled by the Executor. No counsel could have devised William Garnett, to incur this responsibility. No Court could censure him, for not incurring it. Wm. H. Macon, then, who purchased without suspicion that any creditor of George Brooke remained unsatisfied, had great reason for the apprehension, that Mr. Garnett, not considering himself, as a trustee for the benefit of such creditor, would apply the money to the uses prescribed in the Will of Richard Brooke. This apprehension could not be removed by any enquiry. The bill filed by William Garnett, to enforce a specific performance, alleges expressly, that Campbell's debt was not due from George Brooke, and that if it was, Mantipike is not charged with it. Whether any direct communication took place, between the parties, on the subject, is unknown; but as none is stated, none can be presumed. The fact, however, is sufficiently obvious, that any enquiry respecting it, must have been answered, by the assurance, that the justice of the claim was denied. Whether going on to complete the contract, by paying the purchase money, under these circumstances, would be considered by a Court of Equity, as such a concurrence in "an act tending to defeat the trust" as would affect the purchaser, is a question of real difficulty. Some light may be thrown upon it by analogies drawn from the liability of the purchaser *of lease-hold estates. It is well settled, that the purchaser of a chattel from an Executor, is not liable for the application of the purchase money, although such chattel be given in trust for a special purpose, or be itself a specified legacy. [Elliott v. Merryman] (Barnard, Ch. R. 78, 81.) [2 Atk. 42:] [Ewer v. Corbet,] (2 P. Wms. 148; [Burting v. Stonard,] (2 P. Wms. 150.) The reason is, that no man can exempt his personal estate from the payment of his debts, or make any disposition of it, which shall prevent its passing to his Executors, to be sold by them, if his debts require it. Consequently, whenever an Executor sells, in execution of his trust, the purchaser takes the property, freed from any charge with which the testator may have burthened it by his will. But if the sale be a breach of trust, and the purchaser have notice of the fact, he is affected by it. If the Executor sells to a person who knows that there are no doubts, or that all the debts are paid, and that the sale is not a fair execution of the trust, the purchaser may take the property, subject to the trust. (2 P. Wms. 148, 150.) So too, if the Executor sells at such undervalue, as to indicate fraud; or for payment of his own debt. [Crane v. Drake, et al.] (2 Vern. 616, Ed. Raithby; [Scott v. Tyler,] (2 Bro. C. C. 433, 477; [Andrew v. Wrigley,] (4 Bro. C. C. 125, 130; [Hill v. Simpson,] (7 Ves. jun. 151, 167; [Lowther v. Ld. Lowther,] (13 Ves. jun. 95; [M'Leod v. Drummond,] (17 Ves. jun. 169.)

These cases proceed upon the principle that the executor does not sell in pursuance of his trust, but in violation of it; and, that the purchaser knowing this fact, aids him in its execution by making the contract. The purchaser is not bound to make any enquiry. The general power of the executor to sell, protects him in buying; but if he buys with notice that the sale is a breach of trust, the property remains charged with it.

45 *I feel much difficulty in resisting the application of this principle, to freehold estates charged with the payment of debts. It would seem to me, as if the enquiry must always be into the fact. The question must always be,—is the sale, taking its object into view, a breach of trust? And are the circumstances such as to charge a purchaser, having express notice with a participation in the breach? The purchaser of a chattel, from an executor, with notice that no debts are due, or in payment of his own debt, seems to me to present the same questions.

Two cases have been cited by the counsel for the Plaintiff, as bearing very strongly on that, under consideration of the Court. The first is, Walker v. Smalwood, (Amb. 676.) John Smalwood devised his estate to his son Thomas, charged with the payment of his debts; and Thomas, afterwards, mortgaged the estate, and then devised it to his wife, charged with the payment of debts. The bill was brought by bond creditors of John and Thomas Smalwood, against the wife, and mortgagee. Pending the suit, they joined in selling the land to Yeomans, against whom, a supplemental bill was filed, to set aside the sale. It was set aside, upon the principle, that the execution of the trust had been taken out of the hands of the trustee and transferred to the Court. The Chancellor said, "Though a general charge does not make a purchaser before the suit see to the application of the money, yet after a suit commenced, I should hold him bound to it; and I hold it as a general rule, that an alienation pending a suit is void." He also states, that actual notice was admitted.

The propositions stated by Lord Camden, in this case, have not, I believe, been questioned, but those propositions do not reach the point now in controversy. A part of the purchase money was applied to the mortgage made by Thomas Smalwood, *and the case does not inform us, that any objection was made on this account; but the case does not inform us either, whether this mortgage was made in satisfaction of a private debt due from Thomas, or for money generally, which might have been applied to the debts of the Father, or for a debt actually due by the Father. Notice was admitted, but of what? Probably, of the application of the money, and of the pendency of the suit. But these facts do not imply a breach of trust, since it is not shown that the mortgage itself, which is an alienation pro tanto, was made under circumstances, which could involve the mortgagee in the application of the money. This case then, has no positive application to that at bar.

The other case is, Hardwick v. Mynd, (1 Austr. 109.) William Mynd, devised considerable estates to his son Wm. Mynd, charged with certain legacies to his daughters. He also devised other estates to George Mynd and John Roberts, in trust for payment of debts, and appointed them his executors. George Mynd and John Roberts renounced the executorship, and conveyed their interest in the freehold estates to William, the son, subject to the trusts of the will. William mortgaged great part of the estate for his own debts; and about eleven years after the death of his Father, became a bankrupt.

The creditors of the father, then filed this bill, for the satisfaction of their demands; and it was admitted, that, the most considerable of the mortgagees took, with notice of the situation of the property.

Eyre, Chief Baron, said, (and it is to be presumed the Court concurred with him)—"If the trustees had made these mortgages, they would not have been disturbed; in fact they are made by them; for they have assigned their whole interest to William Mynd to act for them in trust."

If the case stopped with this opinion, it would be, perhaps, conclusive, certainly very strong, in *favour of the Plaintiff. The mortgagees took with notice of the misapplication of the purchase money, and were yet not held responsible for that misapplication. This decision would certainly go far in showing, that a purchaser, knowing that the sale was made not for the purposes of the trust, but of the trustee, would yet hold the land discharged from the trust. But other points were determined which deduct considerably from the application of this opinion to the case at bar, if they do not entirely destroy it, the Court held the trustees liable to make good the whole deficiency arising from the misapplication of the fund.

This case then, considering the two points which were decided in connexion with each other, amounts to nothing more than this. Where there has been a collusion between the trustee and purchaser, which results in an abuse of the trust, the trustee shall be chargeable in the first instance; but the case does not decide on the ultimate responsibility of the purchaser, should the trustee prove insolvent. Applying it to the case at bar, it would prove, that had William H. Macon, proceeded, after notice, to complete the contract, and to pay the purchase money; and a suit been brought by the creditors of George Brooke, William Garnett, would have been liable in the first instance; but does not, I think, prove that William H. Macon, would not have been liable, in the event of the trustee's insolvency. The Court professed to found its opinion on the case of Burt. v. Dennet, (2 Bro. C. C. 225.)

Dennet, was trustee in a mortgage deed from Godfrey to Burtenshaw, by which an annuity of £30 per annum, was secured to the Plaintiff. Dennet having transactions with Burtenshaw, assigned the mortgage to him, without the privity of the Plaintiff; and afterwards assigned his property to trustees for payment of his debts.

48 Burtenshaw paid the annuity of the year 1784, after which he stopped *the payments, upon which the Plaintiff filed her bill against Dennet. The Chancellor said, "the Plaintiff ought to have made Burtenshaw and the assignees of Dennet's estate parties, by which she might have gotten the mortgage-deeds: he then should have decreed Burtenshaw to have paid the annuity, and Dennet to stand as a security, for having broken the trust."

This case is not supposed to be applicable to that at bar, for the assignee of the mortgage, was undoubtedly responsible for the annuity. It is cited solely, because it was referred to by the Court, as an authority for the opinion given in Hardwick v. Mynd, and may, therefore, tend to explain that opinion. It would countenance the idea, that in the case in which it was cited, the Court did not suppose that the liability of the original trustee discharged the assignee.

Taking together the two parts of the opinion given in Hardwick v. Mynd, I cannot consider them as showing what would have been the decision of the Court, with respect to the mortgagees, had the trustees been insolvent. The report is very unsatisfactory, in as much as it assigns no reason for the decision, nor does it give the principle on which it stands. If the bill was dismissed as to the mortgagees, because the receipts of the trustees, or of their agent, even under the circumstances of the case, amounted to an absolute discharge, it would be an express authority for the Plaintiff in the case at bar. If the bill was dismissed, because the trustees were liable in consequence of their breach of trust, and were able to make up all deficiencies, it does not affect this case. If the Court meant to say, that if the trustees had made these mortgages to secure a debt due from themselves, the mortgagees would yet have held the property discharged from the trust, the decision would appear to me, to be in direct opposition to the principle settled in the sales of chattels 49 *by an executor, and to the general principle, that where the act is a breach of duty in the trustee, those who deal with him knowing the fact, are affected by it. To mortgage the property to secure their own debt, would seem to me, to be a direct and palpable breach of duty in the trustees, in which the mortgagee must have fully participated; and, I cannot conceive, that the Court meant to say, that such a transaction could be innocent. I must therefore suppose, that the decision turned upon the fact, that the trustee himself, who was before the Court, was of himself unquestionably competent to pay the money, and ought to pay it. It is true, that if the Court proceeded on this idea, the land ought to have been held still responsible; but the report is too defective and unsatisfactory to warrant any confidence in its being full, as to this point.

These cases then, though they have a strong apparent bearing on that under consideration, are too loosely, and too carelessly reported, to satisfy the Court that they were decided on principles which they are cited to support. I cannot consider them as proving that land sold for other objects, in exclusion of a debt charged upon it, is relieved by the sale, from that mortgage, if the purchaser pays with notice of the intended misapplication of the purchase money. I repeat then, that it is a question of fact. Did the circumstances under which Mantipike was sold, prove that the purchase money was to be diverted from the payment of George Brooke's debts, to other objects, with such reasonable certainty, as to leave it probable that a purchaser with notice, would be liable for the application of the purchase money; or, in other words, that the land would, in the event of misapplication, and the insolvency of the trustee, remain charged in his hands?

These circumstances have already been stated. The most prominent are, that William Garnett was the immediate trustee of Richard Brooke's Will,

50 *though considered in a Court of Equity, as being also a trustee for George Brooke's creditors, whose claim was prior to that of Richard Brooke's creditors or legatees, but whose claim the vendor not only did not, but could not safely, mean to satisfy, unless directed by a Court of Equity, so to do. The purchaser had, certainly, reason to believe, that the sale was not made with a view to satisfy the charge created by George Brooke's Will, and that the purchase money, if paid before the institution of a suit by Campbell's representative, would be applied to the purposes of Richard Brooke's Will. If a suit should be instituted before the purchase money became due under the contract, or before it was paid, the whole affair would then be transferred to the Court of Chancery, and he would no longer be master of his own conduct. In the one event, he would take upon himself the hazard of paying with full notice of the charge, money which he had reason to believe, was to be diverted to different objects; in the other, he would be involved in a Chancery suit, the course and duration of which, he could not anticipate. Do these difficulties constitute a valid objection to a decree for a specific performance?

It cannot be doubted, that these difficulties, if presented to the mind of a prudent man, contemplating the purchase of an estate, and desirous of performing his contract according to its terms, might have a serious influence on his conduct, and might deter him from making the purchase. If informed of them, after making the contract, but before its execution by the paying of the purchase money and receiving a conveyance, he would have such strong motives for stopping entirely, or at least, for pausing, until the impediments could be removed, as would, I think, justify him, for so doing, in the opinion of any reasonable man. Had this suit come to a hearing as between the vendor and vendee only, on the day on which it was instituted, 51 could a *Court of Equity have pronounced the objections to the title so frivolous, as to decree that Macon should take it, without having those objections removed? Is the exoneration of the land from Campbell's debt, by a sale to a purchaser, with notice of all the circumstances which had come to the knowledge of Col. Macon, so perfectly clear, that a Court of Equity ought to decree him to take the land and pay the purchase money, without any security against the future demands of Campbell's representative?

Both on principle and authority, I think it very clear, that a specific performance will be decreed on the application of the vendor, unless his ability to make such a title as he has agreed to make, be unquestionable: [Marlow v. Smith,] (2 P. Wms. 201;) [Rose v. Calland,] (5 Ves. jun. 186, 189;) [Roake v. Kidd,] (5 Ves. jun. 647;) [Stapylton v. Scott,] (16 Ves. jun. 272;) [Sloper v. Fish,] (Ves. and Beam. 149;) and it is equally clear, that a purchaser, under such a contract as that between Garnett and Macon, had a right to expect that an unincumbered estate in fee simple would be conveyed to him. [Omerod v. Harde-man,] (5 Ves. jun. 722, 734;) [Flureau v. Thornhill,] (2 Wm. Bl. R. 1078.) In a contract for the purchase of a fee simple estate, if no incumbrance be communicated to the purchaser, or be known to him to exist, he must suppose himself to purchase an unincumbered estate, and a Court of Equity will not impose its extraordinary power of compelling a specific execution of the contract, unless the person demanding it, can himself do all that it is incumbent on him to do. It has been said at the bar, that the declarations of the Chancellors to this effect, have been made in cases where the title itself was doubtful, not where there was a money charge upon the estate, which would not materially affect the purchaser, and which might be paid off by him, without any material change in his contract, and without inconvenience.

52 *This allegation is not, I think, entirely correct. The objection is not entirely confined to cases of doubtful title. It applies to incumbrances of every description, which may, in any manner, embarrass the purchaser in the full and quiet enjoyment of his purchase. In 5 Ves. jun. 189, [Rose v. Colland,] the property was stated to be free of hay tithe; and there was much reason to believe that the statement was correct. But the point being doubtful, the bill of the vendor, praying a specific performance, was dismissed. There is, certainly, a difference between a defined and admitted charge, to which the purchase money may, by consent, be applied, when it becomes due, and a contested charge which will involve the purchaser in an intricate and tedious law suit of uncertain duration. There can, I think, be no doubt, that Campbell's claim, controverted as it necessarily was by Brooke's representative, is of this character, and that the continuance of the charge on the land in the hands of a purchaser with full notice of that claim, and of all the circumstances under which the sale was made, was too questionable to be disregarded as entirely frivolous, if alleged in a suit between Garnett and Macon only, for a specific performance. If it could not be entirely disregarded by a Court, Macon was certainly justifiable in refusing to proceed while this cloud hung over the estate. He was certainly justifiable in refusing to take the title which could have been made in January, 1819.

But although it was not in the power of Garnett to make a perfectly secure title, previous to a Decree which would dispose of Campbell's lien, it is undoubtedly now in his power. All the parties are now before this Court, and, if a specific performance should be decreed, the title which can be made to Macon, will undoubtedly stand clear of Campbell's lien. The question, therefore is, whether the contract ought now to be enforced.

53 *It has been repeatedly declared, both in the Courts of England and of this country, that time is not of the essence of a contract; and, that a specific performance ought to be decreed if a good title can be made at the time of the decree.

This principle is sustained by many decisions, and by the practice of the Court of Chancery in England to refer it to a Master, to report whether the title be good at the time. But, I do not think that the English Court of Chancery has ever laid down the broad principle, that time was never important, and that an ability to make a clear title at the time of the Decree, arrested all enquiry into the previous state of things. On the contrary, if a person sell an estate, to which he has no title, he cannot, though he should afterwards acquire it, enforce the contract. There is an implied averment in every sale made without explanation, that the vendor is able to do what he contracts to do. If he is not, and the vendee sustains an injury in consequence of this inability, it would seem unreasonable, that the contract should be enforced; it would be the more unreasonable, if the amount of the injury should not be the subject of exact calculation. It is a general rule, that he who asks the aid of a Court of Equity, must take care that his own conduct has been exactly correct. It would be strange, if this general rule should be totally inapplicable to time, in the execution of a contract. If the day be carelessly or accidentally passed over without making a conveyance, and no serious inconvenience result from the omission, the objection would be captious, and would very properly be discountenanced; but if the vendor was unable to clear up the title, until such an alteration had taken place in the state of things, as materially to affect the parties, time I think, cannot in reason be deemed unimportant. It is settled, that mere inadequacy of price, is not a sufficient ground for a Court of Equity, to re-54 fuse its assistance, unless the "difference between the sum to be given and the value of the land, be so enormous, as to countenance the idea of fraud or imposition. Yet, if an unreasonable contract be not performed according to its letter, equity will not interfere. (Sugd. on Vend. & Pur. 190) [2 Am. Ed.] Between a contract which is unreasonable when made, and one which has become so before it can be executed, if the application be made by the person in fault, for the aid of the Court against the party who has suffered by his inability no clear distinction is perceived.

In the case of Gibson v. Patterson et al. (1 Atk. 12,) Lord Hardwicke, is reported to have paid no regard to the negligence of the vendor in producing his title deeds. But that case is said by subsequent Judges, who have inspected the record, to be misreported; and if it were not, it does not appear that there was any incumbrance on the estate, or that the condition of the parties had been affected by the delay.

In Morgan v. Shaw, (2 Meriv. 140,) The Chancellor said, "The inclination of my opinion is against the old doctrine, that time is in no case of the essence of the contract," and in 4 Bro. C. C. [Fordyce v. Ford, 498.] The Master of the Rolls said, I hope it will not be supposed, "that a man is to enter into a contract, and think that he is to have his own time to make out his title." In Harrington v. Wheeler, (4 Ves. jun. 686;) and Lloyd et al. v. Collet, (4 Bro. C. C. 469.) time was held material.

I think that the present doctrine of the Court of Chancery of England, is clearly in favour of the opinion, that where time is really material to the parties, the right to a specific performance may depend upon it; and I think that the same doctrine prevails in the Courts of the United States. Hepburn and Dundas v. Colin Auld, (5 Cranch, 262,) was a suit for a specific performance, which was objected 55 "to by the vendee, because 6,000 acres of land, sold by Hepburn and Dundas, was not held by a title in severalty, but was an undivided interest in a much larger tract, and that the time of executing the contract was, in that case material. On that point the Court says, [p. 276.] "It is not to be denied that circumstances may render the time material; and the Court does not decide that this case is not of that description. But the majority of the Court is of opinion, that the estate is to be considered as an estate held in severalty." It was also said in Pratt et al. v. Law and Campbell, (9 Cranch, 456, 494,) that time is made material to the specific performance of a contract, whenever, from the change of circumstances, a specific performance, such as would answer the ends of justice between the parties, has become impossible.

In Brashier v. Gratz et al. (6 Wheat. 528,) the case was this: Michael Gratz residing in Philadelphia, sold in March, 1807, to Walter Brashier, residing in Kentucky, a tract of land lying in Kentucky, which Gratz had purchased, and for the title to which a suit was then depending, Brashier gave his notes for the purchase money, and agreed to attend to the prosecution of the suit, for which service an allowance was made him in the price of the land. The land was sold at 22 dollars 50 cents by the acre, and it was agreed, that if any part of the land should be lost by the decision of the Court, Gratz should repay 11 dollars 25 cents for each acre that might be so lost.

The suits were not pressed to a decision, and in 1811, the fees were demanded from Gratz, and were paid by him. In 1811, Brashier came to Philadelphia and his notes being protested for non-payment, Gratz required that they should be paid, or that the contract should be rescinded. Brashier was unwilling to do either, and the question, whether, Gratz was still bound by it, was left to Arbiters, 56 who decided that he "was. Brashier became insolvent, and Gratz took the management of the suits into his own hands, which were decided in his favour, in 1813. About this time, the lands rose suddenly in value, on which Brashier tendered payment of his notes, and demanded a conveyance of the land. Gratz refused and the bill was brought for a specific performance. It was dismissed in the Circuit Court, and the Plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court, where the Decree was affirmed.

It will be readily admitted, that the case of Brashier and Gratz, was a strong one, against the Plaintiff—much stronger—than that now before this Court; but the principles laid down in its decision, apply to all cases where the party demanding the aid of the Court, has failed to perform his part of the contract, and a change in circumstance, unfavourable to the party resisting the demand has taken place. The Court says, [p. 533-534.] "The rule, that time is not of the essence of a contract, has certainly been recognized in Courts of Equity; and there can be no doubt that a failure on the part of a purchaser or vendor, to perform his contract on the stipulated day, does not, of itself deprive him of his right to demand a specific performance at a subsequent day, when he shall be able to comply with his part of the engagement. It may be in the power of the Court to direct compensation for the breach of contract in point of time, and in such case, the object of the parties is effectuated by carrying it into execution. But the rule is not universal. Circumstances may be so changed, that the object of the party can be no longer accomplished, that he who is injured by the failure of the other contracting party, cannot be placed in the situation in which he would have stood, had the contract been performed. Under such circumstances, it would be iniquitous to decree a specific performance, and a Court of Equity will leave the parties to their remedy at Law."

57 "If then, a bill for a specific performance be brought by a party who is himself in fault, the Court will consider all the circumstances of the case, and decree according to those circumstances."

In re-viewing the circumstances of the case, the Court says, [p. 539-540.] "Another circumstance which ought to have great weight, is the change in the value of the land. It was purchased at 22 dollars 50 cents per acre. Mr. Brashier failed to comply, and was unable to comply with his engagements. More than five years after the last payment has become due, the land suddenly rises to the price of 80 dollars per acre. Then he tenders the purchase money, and demands a specific performance. Had the land fallen in value, he could not have paid the purchase money. This total want of reciprocity, gives increased influence to the objections to a specific performance, which are furnished by this great alteration in the value of the article."

The change in the value of the article in the case which had been cited, between the time when the money ought to have been paid, and the time when the money was tendered, was certainly enormously great, much greater than can take place in ordinary times; but the principle does not depend entirely on the excessiveness of that change. The principle undoubtedly is, that a very great change in the value of the article, constitutes a serious objection to a decree for a specific performance, when claimed by the party whose fault it is, that the contract has not been executed.

In the case under consideration, a considerable change has taken place, in the value of the article; and that change has been produced by a general declension in the price of lands. It must therefore materially affect the arrangements to be made by the purchaser for a compliance with his contract.—The same property which,

58 if sold in time, would *probably have enabled him to pay for Mantipike, would not on any reasonable estimate, now enable him to do so. If, then, William Garnett was unable to convey a perfectly safe title in January, 1819, Mr. Macon has sustained an injury by the suspension of his proceedings, the amount of which admits of no certain calculation, and which is probably equivalent to the difference in the value of Mantipike at that time and at this.

Although I am entirely satisfied that there is no moral taint in this transaction, that the omission to give notice of Campbell's debt was not concealment to which blame in moral point of view, can be attached; yet a Court of Equity considers the vendor as responsible for the title he sells, and is bound to inform himself of its defects. The purchaser in making a contract may be excused for relying on the assurance of the vendor, implied in the transaction itself, that he can perform his agreement.

As I think Campbell's claim, was a cloud lowering over the title Garnett could convey to a purchaser with notice, which justified Macon in refusing to go on with the contract, which cloud cannot be dissipated but by the Decree of a Court of Chancery, and as before such a Decree was attainable, the value of the article has greatly changed, that circumstance creates a strong objection to a specific performance. At the same time, it must be perceived that the vendor, who has committed no moral wrong, and who is now able to perform his contract, will sustain all the loss arising from the depreciation of the property, which he might have sold to another, had not Macon purchased. I felt some hesitation between a Decree dismissing the bill, and a Decree for carrying the contract into execution, considering the vendor who has retained possession of the property as entitled to the profits, and the vendee who was justifiable for not proceeding with his contract, as exempt from the payment 59 *of interest. But on reflection I have come to the opinion, that as there is no fault in the purchaser, and as there was some remissness in the seller in not communicating Campbell's claim, that the whole disadvantage ought to fall on the vendor, and that his bill ought to be dismissed.

The point which has weighed heaviest on my mind, and about which I have felt the greatest difficulty, concerning which I have indeed at different times inclined to different opinions, is whether the sale under the Will of Richard Brooke, is, under all the circumstances of the case, to be considered as such a breach of trust, as respects the creditors of George Brooke, as will involve a purchaser, having notice before the contract of sale is carried into execution, in the consequences. I am rather disposed to the opinion that it is such a breach of trust. At all events, I am satisfied that it wears such a serious aspect, as to justify a purchaser in refusing to proceed.

Decree, Bill dismissed,—each party to bear his own costs.

CASES

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

Green v. Judith, &c.

March, 1837.

Demurrer to Evidence—What It Should Contain, &c.—The practice of inserting in a demurrer to evidence, the evidence on both sides, is established by repeated decisions, in this State.

Same—Effect—Rule Stated.—In such case the demurrant must be considered as admitting all that can reasonably be inferred by a jury from the evidence given by the other party; and as waiving all the evidence on his part, which contradicts that offered by the other party, or the credit of which is impeached; and all inferences from his own evidence, which do not necessarily flow from it.

Same—Rule Examined.—The propriety of this rule examined.

Same—Error—Effect.—If a party finds out, after a demurrer to evidence, that he ought not to have demurred, but should have left his cause to a jury, the Court cannot award a venire de novo. By two Judges.

This was an appeal from the Superior Court of Law for Culpeper County.

Judith and her children and grand-children, brought an action to recover their freedom. The usual issue was joined; and at the trial, the defendant Green, demurred to the evidence, which was joined in 2 by the plaintiffs. In *this demurrer, the evidence on both sides was spread upon the record. This evidence is stated with sufficient minuteness in the opinions which follow, and particularly in that of Judge Cabell; so that it will be unnecessary to insert it again in this place. The cause was submitted without argument.

Demurrer to Evidence.—See on this subject monographic note on "Demurrer to the Evidence" appended to Tutt v. Slaughter, 5 Gratt 364.

†Same—What It Should Contain.—To the point that a demurrer to the evidence should contain the evidence on both sides, the principal case is cited in Muhleman v. National Insurance Co., 6 W. Va. 514; Adkins v. Fry, 33 W. Va. 555, 18 S. E. Rep. 740.

‡Same—Effect—Rule Stated.—The rule set out in the principal case—that, on a demurrer to the evidence, the demurrant must be considered as admitting all that can reasonably be inferred by a jury, from the evidence given by the other party, and as waiving all the evidence on his part, which contradicts that offered by the other party, or the credit of which is impeached, and all inferences from his own evidence, which do not necessarily flow from it has repeatedly met with approval in subsequent cases. March 2. The Judges delivered their opinions. §

JUDGE CARR.

The plaintiffs in the Court below brought their suit against the appellant (an agent of the Commonwealth) to recover their freedom. Judith, the mother and grand-mother of the others, was once the property of Ball. The State insists that they are still slaves, belonging to Ball's estate, and subject to her judgment against Ball. They claim to be free, either under the will of Barrow, or of Hackley, and their chain of title is this: that Ball, some 45 or 50 years past, sold or gave Judith (then a girl) to Mr. and Mrs. Barrow, his brother and sister: that Barrow, after many years possession, sold Judith and her descendants to his nephew Hackley, reserving his and his wife's life in them: that Hackley, by his will, set them free at the death of Mr. and Mrs. Barrow; and that Barrow, by his will, confirmed to them their freedom. On the trial of the cause, the defendant demurred to the evidence. The Court gave judgment on the demurrer for the plaintiffs, and the defendant appealed. The demurrer contains all the evidence on both sides. This, I believe, is not in conformity with the practice in England or our sister States; but it has long been the settled practice of this State, sanctioned by decisions of this Court. I have always understood a demurrer (whether to pleadings or to 3 *evidence) as raising a question of law purely; the demurrant alleging that the pleading or the facts demurred to, are not sufficient in law to sustain the adversary. These indeed are the express terms of the demurrer. As the law arises upon the facts, it cannot arise until the facts be settled; and this is exclusively the province of the jury. I have seen this subject nowhere treated with more perspicuity or ability, than in the opinion of Ch. J. Eyre, in Gibson v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 187. He says, "In the first stage of that process under which facts are ascertained, the Judge decides whether the evidence offered conduces to the proof of the fact, and there is an appeal from his judgment by a bill of exceptions. The admissibility of the evidence being established, the question how far it conduces to the proof of the fact which is to be ascertained, is not for the Judge to decide, but for the jury exclusively. When a jury have ascertained the fact, if a question arises whether the fact thus ascertained maintains the issue joined between the parties, or in other words, whether the law arising upon the fact is in favor of one or other of the parties, that question is for the Judge to decide. Ordinarily, he declares to the jury what the law is upon the fact which they find, and then they compound their verdict of the law and fact thus ascertained. But, if the party wishes to withdraw from the jury, the application of the law to the fact, and all consideration of what the law is upon the fact, he then demurs in law upon the evidence, and the precise operation of that demurrer is, to take from the jury, and to refer to the Judge, the application of the law to the fact. In the nature of things, therefore, and reasoning by analogy to other demurrers, and having regard to the distinct function of Judges and of juries, and attending to the stage of the proceeding in which the demurrer takes place, the fact is to be first ascertained." The opinion, from which this extract is made, is of the very highest authority, and all the books acknowledge it as settling the law. This Court has, in several cases, referred to it as the ablest exposition "of the doctrine on this subject. The misfortune is, I think, that we have not acted up to the rules it establishes. One of these is, that the demurrant "shall distinctly admit upon the record every fact and every conclusion, which the evidence demurred to conduced to prove." Our practice has been to put all the evidence on both sides into the demurrer, and then to consider the demurrer, as if the demurrant had admitted all that could be reasonably inferred by the jury from the evidence given by the other party, and waiving all the evidence on his part, which contradicts that offered by the other party. or the credit of which is impeached, and all inferences from his own evidence which do not necessarily flow from it. I confess the English practice seems to me much the safest and best. In the first place, it is the simplest. The facts being settled one by one, the parties distinctly see the naked case, and understand precisely on what facts the Court will act; and passing these facts thus in review, the demurrant can more clearly see, before the step is irrevocably taken, whether he can safely demur; and the adversary is likewise enabled to discover, whether there be not some weak point in his evidence, which he has it in his power to strengthen. This analysing process, reducing the case to its elements, would also have a strong tendency to discourage demurrers to evidence; an effect, which Courts have generally thought would be beneficial. When the evidence merely is all put into the demurrer, and no facts settled, the parties can have little idea from this confused mass, what the case will be when the Court shall come to act upon it; and the Court itself (it seems to me) is inevitably led to assume the functions of a jury. I have thought it not amiss to express this opinion, thought I have not the slightest idea, in the present case, of attempting to disturb the practice.

§The PRESIDENT and JUDGE GREEN absent; the latter being a nominal party.

I must also be permitted to regret, that it has been settled by the cases in this Court, that in demurrers to evidence, all the evidence on both sides is to be put into the record. It is a departure from the settled practice elsewhere; and

5 "this alone, I think, is a solid objection, unless it could be clearly shewn, that by such a change a material advantage was gained. But here, the change seems to me to be much for the worse. I can conceive few cases, in which the insertion of the demurrant's evidence can be proper; few, in which it does not tend to confuse, perplex, and complicate the case. When a defendant demurs to the plaintiff's evidence, he says, admitting it all to be true, it is insufficient in law to maintain the action. Putting himself thus, upon the law of the case, and thus withdrawing it from the jury, what propriety is there in his introducing evidence on his part? The practice of putting the evidence on both sides into the record, is calculated to mislead the country. They suppose, that it must be for some purpose that the demurrant's evidence is inserted; and they naturally conclude that the purpose is, that the Court, from the whole evidence, shall collect the facts of the case, and then pronounce the law arising on them. I have very little doubt that the demurrer in the case before us was filed under this delusion; and it seems to me a strong illustration of the mischief of the practice; for, it has lost a cause to the defendant, about which, I believe, there would have been little doubt with a majority of the Court, if the same facts had appeared in the form of a special verdict, or a case agreed; and I have no doubt they would have appeared in one of these forms, or have been left to the jury, had the counsel supposed that by demurring he was to give up every title of his evidence. This however is the effect, as that evidence is considered as contradictory to, or making out a case inconsistent with, that of the plaintiffs. So strongly persuaded am I of the injustice of this decision, that I have looked carefully through the record for some circumstance which might avert it; and I thought that I had found one in the agreement of the counsel filed in the record. That agreement authorised us (it seemed to me) to consider the record of the judgment of the Commonwealth against Hackley's executor,

6 as if pleaded "in bar; and then I should have had but little difficulty. But, it is discovered on a closer inspection, that the agreement bears date prior to the demurrer. Its terms, which to me seem doubtful, are regarded by my brethren as amounting only to a waiver of formal exceptions to the use of the papers filed, as evidence; and its effect is considered as done away by the demurrer subsequently filed. This is all perhaps correct; but I confess that my mind assents to it with great reluctance. I should have been much better satisfied to have awarded a venire de novo, as is sometimes done, when "the evidence is so uncertain, or of such a nature, that the Court feel doubtful what facts to infer." This, I feel assured, would have been a more probable means of obtaining the real justice of the case. The rest of the Court, however, think differently, and with them I leave the cause.

JUDGE COALTER.

This is an action by the appellees against the appellant, in forma pauperis, to recover their freedom. The declaration is the usual one of false imprisonment; to which the defendant pleads that the plaintiffs are slaves, on which issue is joined.

The plaintiffs being negroes, and it being admitted by them that Judith, the mother and grand-mother, was originally a slave, the property of one Ball, they place their title to freedom on this ground, that she was sold by Ball to Barrow, who had married his sister, and by whom she and her children were sold to his nephew Hackley, by whose will they were set free. The onus probandi was thus at once thrown on them to prove these facts.

They accordingly produced evidence of such facts and circumstances as it was in their power to do; and the only matter of controversy which this evidence did not fully establish in their favor, was, whether Judith was a gift of sale or a mere loan to Barrow. If the former, then,

7 *without doubt, the title passed to Barrow, and from him to Hackley; by whose will they are free. If the latter, then it might have been a question, whether, as Barrow had possessed Judith and her children, without claim or interruption for twenty years or more, before the alleged sale to Hackley, he (Hackley) had such knowledge of the original loan, as that he could not acquire title, as it regarded Ball or his creditors, or rather the latter; for neither Ball in his life-time, either before or after the death of Hackley, nor his executor since his death, although 30 or 40 years had elapsed from the time he parted with Judith, ever asserted any claim to her or her issue.

Considering the case then as depending merely on the nature of the first transaction, and whether that was a sale or gift, or only a loan, the evidence on both sides, consisting of a variety of circumstances pro and con, was before the Court and jury. How the jury would have decided as to this matter, we cannot say. I will only observe, for my own part, that had they found for the plaintiffs, I think the Court would not have been justified in setting aside their verdict as contrary to evidence. Suffice it, however, at present to say, that the counsel who conducted the defence withdrew the question from them, and demurred to the evidence; and, according to what was supposed to be the law of this State, included in the demurrer all the evidence, as well that of the plaintiffs as of the defendant. This course has been sanctioned by many cases in this Court; but, this is the first one that has come under my notice, which brings the propriety or impropriety of that practice, as a general and universal one, directly and in most of its bearings, to the view of the Court. It is necessary, therefore, that the propriety and effect of this practice should be examined into, at least so far as it touches this particular case; and that it should be settled, so far as a bare Court can do so. Any remarks, therefore, which I may make, and which may seem to go farther than such a case as this, will only be considered as incident to 8 the enquiry *we are at present bound to make, and not as intended to oppose the former cases, further than must necessarily result from the present decision. I feel the less restraint too on this subject, because as to mere matters of practice, the quo modo in which justice shall be administered, they can hardly be judged of except as cases arise. Any dictum or broad proposition, therefore, which may be laid down, and which, in the particular cases, may not trench on the great and leading principles on which our judicial system is founded, can have no weight, whenever found in conflict with those principles.

The position that the jury alone must find the fact, whilst it is the province of the Court to pronounce the law, is a first principle, a maxim in our system. A jury may find a special verdict, or the parties may agree a case, or move for instructions to the jury; or, there may be a demurrer to evidence, Syme v. Butler, &c. 1 Call, 105; in which case, if the evidence is positive, the demurrant must admit its truth; if circumstantial, he must admit, and if called upon must put on the record all the inferences which a jury might draw from it; and in this way ascertain the fact, without possible injury to the other party, and without any invasion of the trial by jury, Stephens v. White, 2 Wash. 203; and the facts being ascertained in either of these ways, the law remains open to be decided by the Court.

But, here is a case in which the whole evidence, consisting of both sides partly of written documents and partly of the oral testimony of a great number of witnesses, detailing many facts and circumstances tending on the one hand to prove a sale or gift of Judith, and on the other hand, a loan, is put into the record; and the question is, what are we to do, according to the decisions of this Court, with this mass of testimony? If we weigh it in equal scales, as a jury would, and say, on the whole, what it proves, it seems to me that we at once assume the province of a jury.

If we reject the evidence of the demurrant, or, *(which is the same thing,) give it no weight at all, then the question is, do we conform to the decisions of this Court?

Again: If there is a case in which any part of the demurrant's evidence ought to be considered as a part of the case, though other parts ought not, as some of our decisions seem to indicate, it would seem to follow that as all the evidence ought to be in the record, the Court may judge what ought, and what ought not, to be considered by them. There is certainly a want of precision and clearness in our decisions on this point, calculated to mislead the country, and which has mislead the counsel in this case, the consequences of which ought to be obviated as far as possible.

I have looked into all the cases which have been before this Court on this subject, and it seems to me that few or none of them, in practice, at least, have gone the length we must go in this case, if we weigh any portion of the demurrant's evidence.

In Hoyle v. Young, 1 Wash. 150, an action of slander on the plea of not guilty, the defendant, after introducing evidence in mitigation of damages, tendered a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence. This was objected to, because he had examined witnesses; and the Court sustained the objection. In this Court, that point was given up by the counsel, as properly decided. But this Court take it up and say, the proper rule is to allow a demurrer to evidence at any time before the jury retire, although the demurrant may have examined witnesses on his part, the whole evidence on both sides being stated, (which in all cases ought to be done,) unless the Court think the case clear against the demurrant; in which case, the books agree that the Court may refuse to receive the demurrer. This is the first case in which this doctrine of stating all the evidence is laid down. There was no argument pro or con from the bar. It was a case, too, in which the evidence did not conflict with 10 but was "merely to weigh in mitigation of damages, in case his evidence supported his declaration. The jury were to assess damages, either conditionally, before the trial of the demurrer, or on a writ of enquiry afterwards; and this evidence merely related to those damages. If put in the record, it could have no weight on the question, whether the declaration was supported, and but for the requisition to put it in the record, (the reason for which I cannot perceive, in that case,) I see no objection to that decision.

The cases of Hyers v. Green, 2 Call, 554, and Hyers v. Wood, 2 Call, 574, were writs of right, and the defence, in both cases, was non tenure, which was not pleaded, but offered in evidence to the jury on the mise joined. If this had been pleaded, and the evidence offered in support of the plea had not been such as it was proper only for a jury to weigh, being evidence of boundary, depending on surveys and a variety of facts and circumstances, no one would have doubted the right of the demandant to demur to the evidence adduced to support the plea. But, in the first place, here was no plea, and one question, and the main one, was, whether it was proper evidence on the general issue. In the first case, the demandant sought to try this question merely, by a demurrer to the evidence; and this demurrer, after stating the evidence of the tenant, says, to which the demandant demurred, &c. and produced in support of his right a copy of a patent, &c. and an Act of Assembly, &c. and a copy of a will, &c. (all written documents of record,) and prays judgment, &c. The tenant objected to join in demurrer, but for what reason is not stated; and the objection was sustained. The District Court reversed, because it was improper to permit the evidence to go to the jury, and because the Court refused to receive the demurrer.

The other case was like this in all respects, except that, in addition to offering a demurrer, the demandant objected to the evidence, which was also overruled, and except also, that the demurrer was objected to on the ground that it

11 *contained the evidence on both sides. There was a similar judgment in the County and District Courts.

The first case was argued altogether, at first, on the question whether the evidence was proper on the mise joined. The Court afterwards directed the point, whether, in a demurrer to evidence, it was necessary to state all the evidence on both sides, to be spoken to.

Call, of counsel for the demandants, argued ably and at length that it was proper. Williams, on the other side, said he did not contest the doctrine. In this case, the Court give no reason for their opinion, but simply reverse the judgment of the District Court, and affirm that of the County Court.

In the last case, Judge Roane says, "As to the first objection stated by the tenant to the demurrer, I shall only say, that in the case of Hyers v. Green, this Court were of opinion, on consideration of the case of Hoyle v. Young, and other authorities, that the plaintiff ought, especially in a writ of right, also to set out his own evidence; and, in that case, justified the rejection of the demurrer, on the ground that the demurrant had not stated a title to recover, in respect of his own identity. I am not certain," he says, "whether the Court, in Hyers v. Green, considered the ground of the second objection, although the demurrers in the two cases are, in that respect, substantially alike; but, I take the rule to be, that though the Court ought to award a joinder in demurrer, where the evidence demurred to is in writing, or, being parol, is explicit, and will not admit of variance, yet that when the parol testimony is loose, indeterminate, and circumstantial, the party offering it shall not be compelled to join in demurrer, unless the party demurring will distinctly admit every fact and conclusion which such evidence or circumstance may conduce to prove;" and he adds, "the evidence in question, respecting the boundaries, the understanding of the country, &c. is entirely of this kind. The demurrer, therefore, may be thrown out of the case."

12 *Here, it would seem that the Court looked into the evidence of the demurrant, to see whether he had identified himself with his title, and thought he had not. Had the case turned on that point, it would seem to me, with great deference, that the Court would have invaded the province of the jury, in weighing the evidence.

But, in both cases, it was a mere question of boundary, as to the fact of the case; and as to the law, a mere question, whether such evidence was proper under the general issue; and all that is decided on the point now before us, is, that in a writ of right, if the plaintiff demurs, he must also set out his own evidence, so far at least as to identify himself with his title. The case before us is not a writ of right, nor is the demurrer offered by the plaintiff.

In the Case of Harrison v. Brock, 1 Munf. 22, which was an action of assumpsit, the plaintiff proved that Brock owed him a sum of money for work and labor. Brock introduced a witness to prove that his agent had paid the debt. The plaintiff introduced witnesses to discredit this evidence, and to prove that the agent cheated him,

&c. The defendant demurred, and stated all the evidence on both sides. The plaintiff refused to join in demurrer, but was compelled to do so by the County Court, who finally gave judgment for him on the demurrer. The District Court reversed this, because of an award pendente lite, &c. This Court decided that there was no ground for a reversal, and affirmed the judgment of the County Court. Judge Roane says, "In a demurrer to evidence, it has been decided that the whole evidence must be stated, and thereupon the judgment of the Court is to be pronounced."

"The question, therefore, becomes important, whether, in the case before us, the Court rightly ruled the appellant to join in demurrer? It is admitted that a discretion exists, at least in cases depending on loose or contradictory testimony, and the question is, was the discretion rightly exercised here? The appellee's testimony is contradictory to, and in conflict with, that of the appellant. It is true it is 13 *not opposed to the testimony originally adduced by him, but to that which came out, if I may be permitted so to say, in the replication. But, in principle, that can make no difference. If the right of the appellee to compel his adversary to join, be absolute, what is it but to give credit to his own witness, or at least to carry it to be adjudged by an improper tribunal? This would be intolerable, and a good reason itself, to refuse to compel a joinder." He proceeds; "As the County Court compelled the appellant to join in demurrer, without an explicit admission on the part of the appellee of the truth of the appellant's testimony, so far as it conflicted with his own, or, what is the same thing, without a waiver of his own conflicting testimony," he thinks the judgment was erroneous. But, as the error was in favor of the appellee, in compelling the plaintiff to join in demurrer, and as the final judgment would have been, a fortiori, for the appellant, if the appellee's conflicting testimony had been excluded, and would, in that case, have been altogether correct, he affirms the judgment of the County Court. This case shews that, where the demurrant has offered evidence which conflicts with that on the other side, it ought to be waived; and if it is not, still it is not to be weighed at all. But, if the evidence of the party demurred to is sufficient to maintain the action or plea, judgment shall be given accordingly. Possibly, if the party had not demurred, but had taken his chance before the jury, he might have succeeded; but by demurring, he virtually waived his evidence.

It would seem, however, from other parts of Judge Roane's opinion in this case, that he confines the doctrine to cases of credibility of evidence. When that is assailed, as was that case, he must waive such evidence; so that "whilst it does not confer on the Court," says he, "the power of judging of credibility, it does not take from it the power of inferring the facts admitted to be true." The idea intended does not seem expressed with the usual perspicuity of that learned Judge; for, if ference from them would seem unnecessary. I presume, therefore, he must have intended inferences from circumstances proved by witnesses, whose credit is not impeached by opposing testimony. That would be very much the case now before us; and I think it will not be difficult to shew that such case is within the reasoning of the Judge on the main point, as I shall attempt thereafter. But that was a case of credibility, and when the Judge came to apply the rule, that all the evidence, on both sides, must be in the demurrer, it was soon found that it could not be weighed in that case, as I think it will be found that it cannot in this.

The case of Biggers v. Alderson, 1 Hen. & Munf. 54, was in detinue for slaves. The plaintiff had been long in possession; which the defendant seemed at once to admit, and that it threw the onus probandi on him; and he accordingly offered in evidence an attested copy of a bill of sale from the plaintiff to Joseph Smith, under a clause in whose will the defendant claimed them. This bill of sale was all the evidence offered by the defendant. It was objected to, because a copy was offered; but the objection was overruled. The plaintiff then offered parol testimony to prove an implied verbal release by Smith, of his right under the bill of sale: which was objected to by the defendant, but admitted. The defendant excepted, and also demurred to the plaintiff's evidence; inserting also the bill of sale, which was all the evidence he produced. The demurrer was argued and overruled in the County Court, and judgment entered for the plaintiff. On removal to the District Court that judgment was reversed, and the cause retained there; and finally, a verdict and judgment were rendered for the plaintiff.

The question argued in this Court was, as to the admission of the plaintiff's parol evidence. But it was deemed admissible. The judgment of the District Court was reversed, and that of the County Court affirmed. Here there was no dispute about the execution of the bill of sale, which 15 *had been recorded. The only controversy was about the evidence going to prove the verbal release; and though the bill of sale was put in by way of inducement, the implied release was the only matter of dispute. It was not a case in which to try the merits of the matter now before us, and may, in fact, have been a proper case for a demurrer, inasmuch as the effort to prove a release admitted the bill of sale, and went in avoidance.

So in the case of Hyer v. Shobe, 2 Munf. 200. It was an ejectment; and the evidence of the plaintiff demurred to, and that of the defendant put in also. The plaintiff claimed as devisee of A. who was heir at law of B. who had a lease for lives of himself, two sons, and a grand-son, renewable forever. The defendant claimed under the grand-children of B. who, after his death, sold the land to him, A. the heir at law, being then in captivity with the Indians, but afterwards returning, devised it to the plaintiff. The plaintiff was bound to make out a good title, whether the defendant had any or not. This being the case, there was nothing more natural, than by a demurrer to evidence, to submit the questions of law; one of which was, whether it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove that the lives had not expired, or that the lease had been renewed; and also, whether, being out of possession, the heir could devise. In short, the plaintiff was to prove title in himself, or he could not succeed; to that the deed of the defendant, which was the only evidence offered by him, might have been thrown out of the case.

The case of Norvell v. Camm, 2 Rand. 68, was a writ of right, before a Special Court of Appeals, and which had formerly been before a like Court, and came up again after the second trial. The demandant offered a demurrer to evidence, which the tenants objected to join in for various reasons, and amongst others, that they would contend that the jury might infer from their evidence, that a patent had issued to some one under whom they claimed; also, because the demandant's title did not cover the land in controversy, *and contested both the credit and sufficiency of the proof as to that.

It was contended on the other side, that the Court, and not the jury, had, in that case, a right to infer a patent, if one could be inferred; and the authorities pro and con, were before the Court on that point. As to the difference between the witnesses, it was said to be unimportant; and as to the credit and sufficiency of the demandant's evidence to prove that his patent covered the land in controversy, it was said, the parties were directly at issue, and it being a question for the Court, the tenants ought to have been compelled to join in demurrer. The Court was of opinion, that the evidence offered by the tenants, and by the demandant to rebut it, made a proper case for a demurrer: that the evidence of the demandant was consistent with that of the tenants, from the whole of which the conclusions of law would be more correctly drawn by the Court than the jury; and as to the uncertainty in regard to the identity of the land in controversy, if the demandant is entitled to recover as much of the 433 acres described in the count, as his patent for 669½ acres will include, the Court was of opinion that it sufficiently designates that quantity by metes and bounds, to enable the Court to identify it, upon the final decision of the cause.

As to this case, I will in the first place observe, that it was a case before a Special Court, which, from its organization, does not admit of that time for deliberate consideration, which justifies us in holding those decisions of the highest authority, in case there shall appear any substantial objections to them. This too, as before said, was a writ of right, and had been formerly before a similar Court; and it was complained that the decision of that Court had been evaded by the proceedings on the second trial. But, on the subject of the conflicting evidence, as it regarded the power to infer a patent from it, if it was decided that the Court were the proper tribunal to infer, if inference in that case could be made, then the evidence

17 "to rebut that presumption would, of course, be before the Court. But, if the inference was one which might be made, and it was proper that it should be made by the jury, and not the Court, then it seems to me, that this is a case, in which, by reason of the demurrer, the Court was considered as invested with the power to examine the circumstances on both sides, and to find as if it were a special verdict. So too, as to the boundary; there may have been something in the case, as doubtless there was, to take it out of the principles established in Hyers v. Green and Hyers v. Wood, where it was settled that contrariety of evidence, &c. on a subject of this nature, was not proper for a demurrer, but for the jury.

Whittington v. Christian, 2 Rand. 353, is the last case in this Court, and seems to place this question perhaps on a clearer ground, than any of the preceding cases, and to combine in it the whole doctrine, under our practice, which could be fairly extracted either from the decisions themselves, or the principles recognized by the Court in former cases; and perhaps ought to have saved me the trouble of so minute an examination of those cases. There may be this excuse, however, for my doing so. It will be found that most of the doctrines there laid down, on this subject, were merely dicta, and so may be considered obiter, so far as they touch the case now before us. That was an ejectment by Christian against Whittington; and the Reporter having given no statement of the case, it does not clearly appear what evidence was adduced on the one side, and what on the other. The defendant, however, demurred to the evidence of the plaintiff; in which the plaintiff refused to join, but was overruled by the Court, who finally gave judgment for him. The ground why he objected to join, is not stated. One thing, however, seems certain; that at least the patents to Norvell, under whom Whittington claimed, were put in the record. So far as this, it is seen that evidence on the part of the demurrant was in the record; and so far the case was like that 18 of Hyer v. Shobe above mentioned.

If this was all, and if the naked possession of the defendant would have protected him equally unless the plaintiff shewed title, then it was no more, in substance, than a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, as in the case of Hyer v. Shobe. But this was not all. The plaintiff claimed under an ancient patent, on which judgment of forfeiture had been pronounced by the Old General Court for non-payment of taxes; and although the long possession and other circumstances detailed in the evidence, might have been sufficient to sustain an ejectment against any one not claiming under the Commonwealth; yet as Norvell, by the patents aforesaid, and those claiming under him, did so claim, it was necessary that the patents should appear in the case, in order to raise and try the question of law, whether lands so situated could be granted by such patents as those produced; and instead of moving for an instruction on this point, the course by demurrer to evidence, and placing the patents, which alone constituted the defence as to this matter, on the record, was resorted to. This case, then, was not like the one before the Court, but presents one of a peculiar kind, of which I will say something hereafter.

The dicta then, in this case, will only apply to the case before us; and if they are not a correct summary of the law as contained in previous cases, could hardly be taken as a decision overruling those cases. But, as this case may overrule any, if any there be, against it, it became necessary to review them.

Judge Green, in his opinion, goes into the doctrine generally, and his views seem to have been concurred in by the other Judges; at least so far as concerned that case. He says, "the authorities on this subject, shewing the original practice of the English Courts, have been brought to the attention of the Court, and ably commented on. From these it appears, that the former practice was, to require the party demurring to admit upon the record the 19 existence of all facts, which the evidence offered by the other *party conducted to prove. Those facts were to be ascertained by the Court, and in this respect, the Court might err in opinion, and if it did, and the other party refused to make the admission, he lost the benefit of his demurrer; or if he made the admission on record, it bound him irrevocably," &c.

"To avoid this inconvenience, the modern practice is, especially in Virginia, where it has been sanctioned by repeated decisions of this Court, to allow either party to demur, unless the case be clearly against the party offering the demurrer, or the Court should doubt what facts should reasonably be inferred, from the evidence demurred to, in which case, the jury is the most fit tribunal to decide: to put all the evidence, on both sides, into the demurrer; and then to consider the demurrer, as if the demurrant had admitted all that could reasonably be inferred by a jury from the evidence given against him, and had waived all the evidence on his part, which contradicts that offered against him, or the credit of which is impeached; and also all inferences from his own evidence, which do not necessarily flow from it. With these limitations," he says, "the party whose evidence is demurred to, has all the benefit of the ancient practice, which it was intended to give him, without subjecting the other party to its inconveniences; and no disputed fact is taken from the jury, and referred to the Court."

Now, I am free to admit that this modern practice, especially in this State, where, in the hurry of jury trials, the party might be called on to admit facts which a jury ought not to infer, or lose his demurrer, is a very reasonable one, so far as it is considered independent of, and apart from, the practice, peculiar to this State I believe, of putting all the evidence on the record, the object and bearing of which practice is now under consideration. As to this practice, so far as it submits evidence to the Court which the party demurred to refuses so to submit, insisting on his right to a trial by jury, unless the demurrant will, according *to ancient practice, confine himself to objections to the sufficiency of his evidence, it is certainly an innovation; and the question is, whether it trenches on the trial by jury. If it does, or so far as it does, it cannot be supported.

20 In regard to this matter, it seems to me, that until cases from time to time arise, by which that practice can, in each case, be brought to the unerring standard, recognised by all, that the law is for the Court, the fact for the jury, we may err in laying down any general rule. Thus, according to the case just cited, where the demurrant introduces evidence on his side and then demurs, what part of his evidence is he to be considered as waiving? 1st. All that contradicts that which is offered by the other party. That is, for instance, where a fact is proved circumstantially on one side to be so, and on the other side, to be otherwise; this latter, being the demurrant's evidence, must be waived. 2d. He must waive all his evidence, the credit of which is impeached; as well where the witnesses are in conflict as to the fact, each standing fair, but one clearly mistaken; as where the party demurred to produces evidence impeaching the character of the witness. 3. He is also to waive inferences from his own evidence, which do not necessarily flow from it. This seems to imply that he may have the benefit of parol evidence on his part, from which inferences may be drawn, the witness not being impeached. Who then is to decide, whether the inference necessarily flows from the fact proved by such a witness? This dictum, if it goes as far as I have supposed, would perhaps cover the case before us; and if correct, enable us to look at some of the evidence. Has the party demurred to a right to say that the inference does not necessarily flow from it, and I will not admit it, or will he be compelled to admit it? And if not, must the demurrant waive it, although the Court may think with him, that it does necessarily flow from the fact? If it was left to the jury, could the Court tell them, they must infer the fact? If

21 they could, probably the Court itself might *infer it. But as I understand, unless perhaps as to what may be termed a conclusion of law, the Court could only tell the jury that they might, not that they ought, to infer the fact. But how comes this primary evidence, from which the fact is to be inferred, to be put into the record, without the party demurred to admitting it such, and assenting to it? Can the Court say to a jury, "an unimpeached witness has proved so and so, from which you ought to infer so and so?" I presume not. If the Court could not thus instruct as to the weight of evidence, it would seem to follow that they could not weigh it when presented by demurrer; and the demurrant would be obliged to waive every inference that the other party would not admit. This would reduce the cases in which the demurrant's evidence would have any avail, to a few indeed. But, if the party demurred to voluntarily admits the inference, it is then not a demurrer to evidence, which coerces him, but a case agreed. He may be coerced to join in demurrer, because the other party admits all he can ask, and so makes a reference to a jury unnecessary; but he cannot be coerced to admit any thing, which it is his right to have tried by a jury. Nor will the bare fact of his joining in the demurrer, enable the Court to infer any thing against him, which they could not, had he refused. This new practice cannot have the effect to do away all the principles hitherto governing in cases of demurrers to evidence. According to this view of the matter, then, the demurrant cannot say in this case, "It is true, according to the evidence against me, I ought to admit so and so, as you demand; but my evidence shews I ought not; for, according to it, the fact is otherwise, and my witness is not impeached." He must waive his evidence, or the Court must do it for him, as to this matter. Nor will he be permitted to set one set of circumstances against another, from which opposite conclusions may be drawn; but must go before the jury, who are to compare 22 them and draw the inference one way or *the other; or he must surrender such evidence, and it is to have no weight in the cause.

But, say that his evidence may be such as, if true, sets up a matter of avoidance, altogether consistent with the fact proved by the party demurred to, and which, admitting that fact, shews that he is nevertheless not responsible. What is to be done in this case? Here the demurrant would have no hesitation in admitting the fact as proved on the other side; his whole defence depends on avoiding it, by a substantive and distinct fact. The facts proved by the party demurred to, we will say, then, are set down on the record, as admitted; and the demurrant then proceeds to insert his evidence in the demurrer. The demurrer, then, will not conclude in the usual form, "that the matter so offered by the plaintiff," for instance, "is not sufficient to maintain his action;" and that "he (the demurrant) is not bound by law to answer to it;" but precisely the reverse, to wit, that it is sufficient, and that he is bound to answer, and does answer thereto, by shewing in evidence so and so. If he can do this in substance, though it may not assume this precise form, then it will be thrown on the plaintiff to say, (also in substance, if not in form,) either that the fact is not so, "your evidence is not true, and I put myself on the country," or he will say, "your evidence of this new fact is circumstantial, loose, &c. and I will admit no inference from it." Or, if it is not circumstantial, but direct, he will say, "I have impeached the credit of the witness, either by assailing his general character, or by shewing that though I cannot impeach his general character, he must be mistaken, the thing itself being incredible;" or, "I have proved such and such facts, which are inconsistent with those supposed to be proved by your evidence." What can the demurrant answer to this? He will be deluded, if he supposes that his evidence is to be weighed by the Court in equal scales, against that of his 23 opponent. On the contrary, he will be *called on to waive his evidence, and admit the facts which destroy his defence; for, if this would not be the course, the Court is to be put, as to both parties, in the place of a jury, and to find in fact a special verdict.

I believe the above investigation of the cases in this Court will shew, whatever dicta there may be, that the principles recognized have not gone this far, so as thus to sanction the invasion of the jury trial. A practice, then, which might thus delude, ought not to prevail, except under proper guards and explanations.

But, suppose this substantive and independent defence consists of an undisputed fact, such, for instance, as the patent in the case of Whittington v. Christian, about which the jury ought not to hesitate, and the only doubt is, whether in law, it is a defence. It may be said, that if the Court are called on to instruct the jury, they may, nevertheless, differ with the Court as to the law, and the party may have no remedy but a new trial; and, after two such verdicts, he could, by our law, get no other trial. This is an argument, rather of inconvenience resulting from our law as to new trials, than one which answers the objections urged from the very nature of a demurrer to evidence, to shew the dangerous tendency of innovations upon it. Other means, perhaps, less dangerous, might be devised to obviate the inconvenience above stated. And if nothing better could be done, ought not the law as to new trials to be changed, so as not to prevent fifty, if necessary, in such a case, and that at the costs of the party thus persisting to insist on a general verdict? Whilst I would protect the trial by jury from invasion, I would equally protect the right of the Court to pronounce, what belongs to them, the law of the case. I am not to be understood as saying what ought to be done; but surely such a case as last put, seems to me more proper for an instruction to the jury as to the law, than for a demurrer to evidence. However, as a demurrer has been sustained 24 in the case of Whittington v. Christian, it may be that in "such cases as that, and Hyer v. Shobe, and Biggers v. Alderson, above referred to, (where the demurrant's evidence consisted altogether of matter of record,) that no harm would be done. Such cases would be few; but surely where the jury may find the fact differently even from what seems to be proved by the witnesses, the trial ought not to be withdrawn from them, but on terms that he who does withdraw it shall admit every thing which a jury might infer or find against him, and waive every thing disputed, though the evidence is in his favor, and perhaps not disputable. Such a practice well understood, would restrict to a few cases this complicated kind of demurrer to evidence, which, it seems to me, has hitherto not been defined with sufficient accuracy, and of which, the more I think, the more I doubt.

This case, however, is one about which there can be no doubt. The whole of the demurrant's evidence consists of a train of circumstances, the only object of which is to shew a state of things precisely opposite to that which is to be inferred from the evidence on the other side, and not to set up a distinct defence consistent with it.

The judgment, then, must be affirmed, unless there is some ground on which this Court could award a venire de novo. It seems to me, that we cannot do this.

Suppose that the plaintiff introduces a witness, who is discredited, but as to whose evidence, if taken to be true, there are doubts whether it would support the issue on the part of the plaintiff. The defendant demurs, and puts his evidence in the demurrer. This is taken to be waived, and the demurrer overruled, and judgment for the plaintiff. Would it be a ground for a new trial in the Court below, that he had been mistaken, had been deluded by this practice, and had been obliged to waive his best defence, and to rest his case on the sufficiency of the plaintiff's evidence to prove the issue? Perhaps not; but if it would; this Court cannot hear an original motion for a new trial. We must 25 say, whether the issue on the *part of the plaintiff is supported or not; that must be our judgment, as decided in the case of Humphreys' adm'r v. West's adm'r, 3 Rand. 516. If it is, we must affirm; if it is not, then we may reverse and enter judgment the other way. Here the defendant had a clear right to demur to the plaintiff's evidence, subject to the rule that his must be waived, &c. It was not the business of the Court below to apprise him of his danger in doing so; and it does not appear to me that we can relieve him from the consequences, and give him another chance before the jury.

As that Court, then, could not have refused a demurrer to the evidence, nothing was left for them, nor is there any thing left for us to do, but to pronounce the law on that demurrer. It is true that Court might have heard a motion for a new trial, and I will not say that it would have been wrong to have granted it; but we cannot do it.

This would be our course, it seems to me, in a case of property; and surely we ought not to go farther in a case for liberty.

On the whole, I think the judgment must be affirmed.

JUDGE CABELL.

Judith and her descendants were plaintiffs in the Court below, suing for their freedom. Green, as agent for the Commonwealth, claimed them as slaves belonging to Ball's estate, and subject to the payment of a debt due from that estate to the Commonwealth. The plaintiffs admitted that Judith was, at one time, the property of Ball; but they claim now to be free, on the ground that Ball either gave her, or sold her, when a small girl, to Barrow and his wife, who was Ball's sister: that Barrow, afterwards, sold Judith and such of her descendants as were then born, to Hackley, who, by his last will and testament, emancipated them, at the death of Barrow. It is admitted that the situation of Judith determines that of the other plaintiffs. If she is free, they are free also.

26 *The defendant demurred to the testimony of the plaintiffs; putting, however, his own testimony also, into the demurrer.

As this is a demurrer tendered by the defendant, the first subject of consideration, must be the evidence of the plaintiffs; for, if that be insufficient, the plaintiffs must be cast, on the ground of that insufficiency; and there could be no necessity for looking at the testimony of the defendant.

Although it is not the practice in England, to compel a joinder in demurrer, unless the demurrant will distinctly admit on the record, every fact, which the evidence demurred to conduces to prove, yet even there, after a demurrer has been joined, it is always considered that the demurrant admits, by the demurrer, every fact which the jury could have found upon the evidence demurred to. (See the opinions of Lord Mansfield, and of Buller, Justice, in Cocksedge v. Fanshaw, Douglas, 132, 134.) This is, a fortiori, the case in this country, where it is not the practice to require admissions to be made on the record, before the party can be compelled to join in demurrer.

Let us apply this principle to the case before us.

The plaintiffs proved by a witness, Field, that he boarded with Ball, two years, about the years 1770, 1771, and 1772; and went to school to Barrow: that Barrow had in his possession, during these two years, a negro girl about 10 or 11 years of age: that he knows not by what title Barrow held her, but supposes it was by loan from Ball, as Barrow was insolvent: that Barrow had no other negro in his possession: that Ball was a man without children, possessed of much property, and very kind to his relations. The plaintiffs also proved by Cardwell and Gray, that Barrow had undisturbed possession of Judith and her descendants, for thirty years previous to his death, which happened in the year 1809. They also gave in evidence, without objection on the part of the defendant, a statement in the hand-writing of Barrow, in which

Barrow says, that in the year 1767, or 27 1768, Ball gave to him and his *wife a negro girl by the name of Jude, then about 6 or 7 years old, to go under the denomination of his wife's servant, in order to prevent her from being sold to pay his debts, he being much involved: that he raised her and her children, and had peaceable possession of them, from the time of the gift to the time of making the statement, viz: in 1808, without interruption from any person whatever: that at the time of the gift, Ball was in flourishing circumstances, and had no children; and that there was great friendship existing between him and Barrow. Strode proved that Ball told him he had sold Judith to Barrow; and that Barrow told him he had sold her and her descendants to Hackley, on consideration of Hackley's paying his debts. Gray also said that Barrow was always considered insolvent. Two of the witnesses for the plaintiffs speak of a report of Judith and her children then born, having been sold in the year 1788, or 1789, on an execution against Ball's property, and having been bought by Hackley; but they were not present at the sale, and knew nothing of it, of their own knowledge. Hackley died before Barrow and Ball. His will is in the demurrer, and by it he emancipates the plaintiffs at the death of Barrow. Barrow's will is also in the demurrer, and by it he confirms to them their freedom. This, as I understand it, is the sum and substance of the evidence of the plaintiffs.

What conclusions would a jury have drawn from this testimony? If it be considered alone, unaffected by the testimony of the defendant, it would be impossible to raise a doubt about it. It proves unquestionably that Judith was given or sold by Ball to Barrow: that Barrow had uninterrupted possession, under that gift or sale, for 30 years, to the day of his death; and that he sold her and her children to Hackley, who emancipated them by his will. If there had been no other testimony, no body could have questioned the propriety of overruling the demurrer.

But the important question in this case is, what effect shall be allowed to the evidence of the defendant, inserted in the demurrer?

28 "Before we proceed to the solution of this question, it is proper that we should determine with precision, the nature of the testimony relied on by the defendant. I have examined it with great care, and have come to the conclusion that the whole of it is in conflict with the evidence of the plaintiffs. The evidence on the part of the plaintiffs clearly shews a gift or sale of Judith by Ball to Barrow, and a sale by Barrow to Hackley. The whole of the testimony of the defendant goes to prove only a loan from Ball to Barrow, and a fraudulent purchase by Hackley from Ball. The facts relied on by the defendant cannot be true, if those relied on by the plaintiffs be true. They are inconsistent with each other, and cannot stand together.

The real question then, in this cause, is, what shall be done in a case of such contradictory testimony? The opinion delivered by Judge Green, in the case of Whittington v. Christian, 2 Rand. 357, in which opinion, (so far as relates to this point) I understood the whole Court to concur, furnishes a ready answer. Although it is the practice in this country, sanctioned by repeated decisions of this Court, to allow the whole of the evidence on both sides to be inserted in a demurrer, yet we are "then to consider the demurrer, as if the demurrant had admitted all that could reasonably be inferred by a jury from the evidence given by the other party, and waived all the evidence on his part, which contradicts that offered by the other party, or the credit of which is impeached; and all inferences from his own evidence, which do not necessarily flow from it." I do not perceive in the case before us, any direct impeachment of the credit of the witnesses. But, evidence is not necessarily exempt from the charge of being contradictory, merely because there is no direct impeachment of the credit of witnesses; nor because the witnesses are not found to give contradictory accounts of the same transaction.

That evidence is clearly contradictory, which seeks to establish a case, not only different from, but inconsistent with, the case already proved. It is unquestionable, *that the demurrant would not be permitted, after demurrer, to rely on testimony directly disproving the case proved by the other party, and admitted by the demurrer. It is equally clear to my mind, that he cannot be permitted to rely on testimony, which indirectly disproves it, by proving a case inconsistent with it.

This principle is decisive of the case before us. The plaintiff's testimony shews a good cause of action. The defendant has shewn nothing, which, admitting the truth of the plaintiffs' testimony, is calculated to avoid it. His whole testimony is contradictory of that of the plaintiffs; and being of that character, the demurrer is to be considered and decided, as if he had "waived" it. The demurrer was, therefore, rightly overruled, and judgment entered for the plaintiffs.

Whether the defendant ought, in regard to his own interests, to have demurred under the circumstances of this case, was a matter for his own consideration, and with which we can have nothing to do. He surely had a right to waive the benefit of his own contradictory testimony, and to rely on the supposed insufficiency of the testimony of his adversary. If he has been mistaken in the estimate which he formed of the evidence of his adversary, or even if he has been mistaken in the opinion he entertained of what he would be considered as waiving by the demurrer, and has, in consequence of that mistake, adopted a course injurious to his interests, it is not for us, when there is no error in the judgment of the Court, to remedy the inconvenience by reversing the judgment. It would be beyond the legitimate powers, even of a Court of Chancery, to grant relief in such case, by means of a new trial. Oswald, Deniston & Co. v. Tyler, 4 Rand. 19.

If it be said that the demurrer should be set aside and a venire de novo awarded, under the authority of the case of Taliaferro v. Gatewood, 6 Munf. 320, I reply that that case was very unlike this. There, the Court saw that a fact had been omitted, "which it judicially *knew had existence, and for want of which, a decision contrary to the right of the case may have taken place;" and it was held error in the Court, not to have called for the insertion of the fact. As to that case, I would farther observe, that the Court were not unanimous in the decision; and although was of the majority, yet I am, on subsequent reflection, inclined to doubt the correctness of the decision.

If, in the case before us, the defendant's testimony, instead of contradicting the evidence of the plaintiffs, had admitted its truth, and, as in the case of Whittington v. Christian, 2 Rand. 353, had merely set out a different case, not inconsistent with that made out by the plaintiffs, but presenting a question whether, on the whole evidence, the plaintiffs had exhibited a cause of action, it would be a fit occasion for discussing the propriety of the practice of introducing into the demurrer, the evidence on both sides. When the case shall really occur, I hope we shall have a fuller Court, when the question may be put at rest.

Judgment affirmed.

31 *Caton & Veale v. Lenox, &C.
Two Suits.

March, 1827.

Evidence—Testimony at Former Trial—Witness Dead.—Where a witness has given evidence in a suit, in which a new trial is granted, and the witness dies before the second trial, the substance of his testimony may be proved on the second trial, and it is not necessary to repeat his very words.

Nonnegotiable Notes—Suit by Assignee.—Where a note, not negotiable, is endorsed by several persons in succession, the last assignee could only sue the maker and his immediate assignor, and not a remote assignor, before the Act of Assembly of 1807.

Same—Same—Witnesses—Remote Assignee.—And therefore a remote assignor might have been a competent witness, before that Act, to prove that the immediate assignor was discharged, in a suit between him and the last assignee.

Evidence—Witnesses—Competency—Interest.—It seems, that if the interest of the witness was apparent on the face of the paper, and he was not objected to on the first trial, but on the contrary, was cross-examined, it is too late to make the objections, on the second. Per CARR. Judge.

Assignments—Suit by Assignee against Assignor—What Necessary to Sustain.—In general, due diligence must be used by the assignee, in bringing suit against the maker before the assignor can be sued; but there are many cases in which no suit need be brought against the maker, as where the note was a forgery, and the assignor has received the money from the maker, or where the assignor

Nonnegotiable Notes—Suit by Assignee.—In Long v. Pence, 93 Va. 587, 25 S. E. Rep. 593, it is said: "Prior to the statute authorizing a recovery from an assignor, an assignee had the right, upon the principles of the common law, to recover from his immediate assignor, under the contract implied from the assignment, that the assignor would repay the consideration he had received for the chose in action assigned, if payment thereof, by the use of due diligence, could not be obtained from the obligor or maker. This implied promise was not considered, however, to extend at law to any other than the immediate assignee, and consequently no assignee could recover at law from a remote assignor." Mackie v. Davis, 2 Wash. 219; Caton & Veale v. Lenox, 5 Rand. 31, 42; Mandeville & Jameson v. Riddle & Co., 1 Cranch 200; Yeaton v. Bank of Alexander, 5 Cranch 40. But although not assignable at law, the implied contract was deemed transferable in equity, and a court of equity would enforce it. Riddle & Co. v. Mandeville & Jameson, 5 Cranch 322; Bank of U. S. v. Weisiger, 2 Peters 381. See on the same point the principal case cited in Drane v. Scholfield, 6 Leigh 396.

†Assignments—Suit by Assignee against Assignor—What Necessary to Sustain.—In Morrison v. Lovell, 4 W. Va. 350, it is said "as a general rule, the assignee cannot recover from the assignor the amount paid for the assignment, unless due diligence is used, without effect, against the debtor; but it is in no case necessary to pursue the debtor, if it be clear that such pursuit would be unavailing; as, if the obligor be insolvent at the time of the assignment; or when the note falls due; or where the note is a forgery; or where the maker is a married woman." Mackie v. Davis, 2 Wash. 219; Violett v. Patton, 5 Cranch 142; Brown v. Ross, 6 Munf. 391; Caton & Veale v. Lenox, 5 Rand. 31; Burrill v. Smith, 7 Pick. 391; Erwin v. Downs, 15 N. Y. 575. And in Shifer v. Howell, 9 W. Va. 307, it is said: "the contract of assignment of what is commonly called 'cash paper,' has undergone judicial investigation, and the obligation of the assignor is well defined and understood. It is that he warrants the solvency of the debtor and the existence and justice of the debt. Upon the assignee using or exercising due diligence to collect the debt, and failing, because of the inability of the debtor to pay, or because the debtor shows that he ought not, in law, to be required to pay the same, and thus defeats a recovery; then the law raises an implied promise, on the part of the assignor, to repay the price which he received for it. A suit is not always necessary to entitle the assignor to recover back, but he must show that a suit would be unproductive of good, and that the assignor has suffered no loss from the want of such suit; such as the notorious insolvency of the debtor, or some reason why a judgment could not be had." Mackie v. Davis, 2 Wash. 219; Caton & Veale v. Lenox, 5 Rand. 42, and many other cases in Virginia.

Instructions—Abstract Point of Law.—A Court cannot be called upon to give an instruction on an abstract point of law.

Assignments—Suit by Assignee against Assignor—What Necessary to Sustain.—There is no obligation on the assignee to pursue the ball of the maker, before the assignee can sue his assignor.

These were two suits brought in the Borough Court of Norfolk, by Lenox and others, against Caton & Veale. As the two cases are exactly alike, only one of them will be noticed.

An action on the case was brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants, as endorsers of a promissory note in these words:

"Norfolk, May 8th, 1806.

"Sixty days after date, I promise to pay to Caton & Veale, or order, at the Office of Discount and Deposit of 32 *the Bank of the United States at Norfolk, (without offset,) six hundred and fifty dollars. Value received."

(Signed)

"William Hartshorne, jun'r."

Caton & Veale assigned this note, by a blank endorsement, to Robert Gibson, who assigned it by a like endorsement back again to Caton & Veale, who assigned it in blank to the Bank of the United States. This note was protested on the 12th of June, 1806, for non-payment. Suit was brought against Hartshorne, the maker, on the note, in December, 1807; and judgment was obtained in June, 1809. A ca. sa. was issued, and returned non est inventus. Before this time, Hartshorne had removed to Baltimore; and the Bank brought suit against Caton & Veale, as endorsers of the note. The defendants pleaded non assumption, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs. The Court granted a new trial.

At the second trial, William A. Armistead was examined as a witness, to prove what Robert Gibson had deposed at the first trial, the said Gibson having died since the first trial. Armistead had been a jury-man on the former trial. The defendants objected both to the competency of Gibson to give evidence at all, in that suit; and that if he were competent, it was not proper for Armistead to give evidence as to the substance merely of what Gibson had said on the former trial. But, the Court over-ruled the objection, and admitted the evidence. The defendants excepted.

The defendants then moved the Court to instruct the jury, that there is no difference in point of law, between the responsibility of the endorser of a promissory note for money payable at Bank, and the assignor of a bond for money, not payable at Bank. This instruction was given by the Court.

The Court refused to instruct the jury, signor has suffered no loss from the want of such suit; such as the notorious insolvency of the debtor, or some reason why a judgment could not be had." Mackie v. Davis, 2 Wash. 219; Caton & Veale v. Lenox, 5 Rand. 42, and many other cases in Virginia.

The principal case is also cited with approval on this subject in Smith v. Triplett, 4 Leigh 600, 603; Thompson v. Govan, 9 Gratt 600. See further, monographic note on "Assignments" appended to Ragsdale v. Hagy, 9 Gratt. 409.

that the law did not imply a promise of the defendants, as endorsers of the 33 *two notes of Hartshorne, to pay the money to the plaintiffs as assignees, on the failure of the maker to pay them; but imposes on them, as endorsers, an obligation to pay if the money were not recovered of the maker, due diligence being used by the holder to recover the money of him. To this refusal, an exception was taken by the defendants.

The third instruction asked for by the defendants, was, that the plaintiffs, as assignees were bound to bring suits on the notes, against the maker, (Hartshorne,) unless he were insolvent, or could not be found. This instruction was refused, and the defendants excepted.

Fourth. The defendants moved the Court to instruct the jury, that the failure or stoppage of payment of Hartshorne, while he remained in possession of valuable property which was his own, was not, in law, such an insolvency as excused the plaintiffs from suing Hartshorne. This instruction was given.

Fifth. The defendants moved the Court to instruct the jury, that if they should be of opinion on the evidence, that there was not due diligence, but improper delay, in instituting or prosecuting the plaintiffs' suit against Hartshorne, the defendants are discharged from their liability as endorsers. This instruction was refused, as moved for, but given with this addition: "unless it appeared to the jury, that the notes were exchanged notes, in which case the Court consider due diligence unimportant."

The sixth instruction asked for, was, that if the jury should be of opinion on the evidence, that Thomas Seaman, the special bail of Hartshorne, was able to pay the amount of the judgment obtained by the plaintiffs against Hartshorne, who was out of the country, it was the duty of the plaintiffs to pursue legal measures to recover the money from the bail; and if the plaintiffs have failed to use due diligence against Seaman, the defendants are not liable in this action. The Court refused to give this instruction.

34 *The seventh instruction asked for, was, that it is not competent to the plaintiffs, in this action, to go into an enquiry into the consideration for which the notes were given by Hartshorne to the defendants, nor into the state of accounts between Hartshorne and the defendants, and that they are to disregard so much of the evidence as is intended to prove that the notes now sued on, were exchanged notes, or that they were given by Hartshorne, in consideration of other similar notes given by the defendants to him. This instruction was refused by the Court.

An eighth instruction was asked for by the defendants, that if, from the evidence, it appears to the jury, that the notes now sued on were exchanged notes, the nature and degree of the liability of the defendants as endorsers thereof, to the plaintiffs, is the same as if the notes had been given for money or other valuable consideration. This instruction was also overruled.

The plaintiffs then moved the Court to instruct the jury: 1st. That if they should be of opinion that the notes in question were given by Hartshorne to the defendants, in exchange for two other notes of cotemporaneous date, and for the same sums given by them to him, which latter notes have never been paid, but were stolen and lost; then the doctrine of diligence has nothing to do with the case, inasmuch as the defendants could not, in that event, be injured by any negligence on the part of the plaintiffs. 2d. That if the jury should be of opinion, that Hartshorne was insolvent in May or June, 1806, and that the plaintiffs could not have recovered the amount of these notes from him, even if they had brought suits against him when the notes became payable, then the omission to bring these suits at that time, is not such negligence as discharges the defendants.

These instructions were given by the Court, and the defendants excepted.

The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs, and judgment was given accordingly. The defendants appealed to the Superior Court of Law, who affirmed the judgment of "the Borough Court; upon which they took an appeal to the Court of Appeals.

These causes were ably argued in this Court, by Wickham for the appellants, and Tazewell for the appellees. But, as all the points of argument are fully examined in the opinions which follow, the topics discussed at the bar will be found in those opinions.

March 3. The Judges delivered their opinions.*

JUDGE CARR.

It being agreed that the two suits between these parties are precisely alike in all their parts, I shall, for brevity, notice but one. The following is a copy of the note, which is the foundation of the proceeding: "Norfolk, May 8th, 1806. Sixty days after date, I promise to pay to Caton & Veale, or order, at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States at Norfolk (without offset) six hundred and fifty dollars. Value received. (signed,) William Hartshorne." Caton & Veale passed this note by a blank endorsement to Robert Gibson, who passed it by a blank endorsement, back to Caton & Veale, who then endorsed it in blank to the Bank of the United States. On the 12th of June, 1806, the officers of the Bank had this note protested for non-payment. In December, 1807, they sued Hartshorne on the note. In June, 1809, judgment was obtained, a ca. sa. issued, and returned non est inventus; Hartshorne having, before that time, removed to Baltimore. The Bank then brought an action of assumpsit against Caton & Veale, as endorsers of the note. Upon the plea of non assumpsit, a jury was sworn, who found a verdict for the plaintiffs. A new trial was granted. At the second trial, the plaintiffs introduced Armistead, a juror in the first trial, to prove what Robert Gibson, since dead, had testified to at that trial. Armistead stated, at some length, and with considerable minuteness, "the evidence of Gibson; but said he did not pretend to repeat his words, but to give the substance of his testimony, to the best of his recollection. Thereupon, the defendants' counsel moved the Court to exclude the evidence, on two grounds: 1st. That Armistead ought not to be received to prove the substance of what Gibson had said. 2dly. That Gibson himself, at the time he had given evidence, was interested and incompetent.

*The PRESIDENT and JUDGE CABELL absent.

The first is an important question upon the law of Evidence. It was contended in the argument, that what a witness, (since dead) had sworn to at a former trial, could not be given in evidence, unless the very words he had used could be repeated and sworn to; and the dictum of Lord Kenyon, in Rex v. Jolliffe, 4 Term Rep. 290, was cited. That was a case of this kind. An information had been granted against the defendant for a misdemeanor as a magistrate. The case was sent down to be tried at Nisi Prius. Just before the trial was to come on, the defendant distributed several papers, vindicating his character, and charging the prosecutor with malice. On affidavits to the Judge of this fact, the trial was put off; and a motion was made in the Court of King's Bench, to which the affidavits had been returned by the Nisi Prius Judge, for a rule nisi, for another information against the defendant, for this attempt to prejudice the jury who would try the cause. The rule was granted. In shewing cause against it, the counsel contended that the affidavits taken at Nisi Prius could not be taken into consideration, because they were not taken in the same Court, nor in the same cause. To this position, Lord Kenyon was entirely opposed. Among other things, he remarked, "It has been said, that in no case whatever, can the proceedings in one cause be made use of in another; but the contrary is every day's practice. In the Court of Chancery, depositions taken in one cause are frequently read in another, saving all just exceptions, &c. So in Courts of Law, the evidence which a witness gave on a former trial, may be used on a subsequent 37 "one, if he die in the interim; as I remember was agreed on all hands, on a trial at bar, in the instance of Lord Palmerston; but, as the person who wished to give Lord Palmerston's evidence, could not undertake to give his words, but merely to swear to the effect of them, he was rejected." Here, we see a clear and explicit recognition of the rule. Lord Kenyon refers to a particular case, where it "was agreed on all hands" to be the rule. He then adds, in the most general manner possible, the reason why, in the case referred to, the witness was rejected. Now, it would seem very strange, that Lord Kenyon should lay it down as a general rule, admitted on all hands, and annex to it, in the same breath, a restriction which would, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, prevent its application; which would, in truth, destroy it as a rule; and yet this would be the effect, if we understand him to say, that what a witness (since dead) swore to in a former trial, cannot be given in evidence, unless the precise, identical words which he spoke, can be proved. A man who has listened attentively to a witness, especially a jury-man, (as here,) whose oath binds him to listen, may, if called upon within twelve months, (as in our case,) give substantially a correct detail of what the deceased witness stated. But, if you call upon him to repeat the words, and to swear that they are the very words, no man, who had the least respect for his reputation, would venture to do it; unless he had written down the words at the moment of their delivery. Thus the restriction would destroy the rule. I should not believe that Lord Kenyon meant this, if there were no other cases establishing the rule; but there are many, which lay it down without any such restriction. I will state a few of them.

Buckworth's Case, Sir Thomas Raymond's Rep. 170, (decided about 1668.) Information against Buckworth, &c. for perjury in Ejectment. One was produced to prove what one that is since dead, swore upon the first trial; and by Kelyng, C. J., it shall not be allowed, because 38 "betwixt other parties; but Twisden and Morton contra; and it was allowed. I understand from this brief note, that in a trial in a case of ejectment, Buckworth committed perjury: that in prosecution for this, a witness was called to prove what one (since dead) had sworn to in the ejectment case (hence Kelyng's objection that it was "betwixt other parties;") but the evidence was received.

Pyke v. Cranch, 1 Lord Raym. 730, (about 1697.) It was resolved in a trial at bar, that "if a man was sworn as a witness at a former trial, and gave evidence and died, the matter that he deposed at the former trial, may be given in evidence at another trial, by any person who heard him swear it, at the former trial." Here we find the rule very clearly expressed; and in such a manner as to exclude the restriction contended for. It is said that the matter (not the words) of the deceased witness, may be given in evidence.

Coker v. Farewell, 2 P. Wms. 563. There had been an issue directed out of Chancery, which was tried at law, and found for the plaintiff. A motion was made to the Chancellor for a new trial. He sent it to the law Judge to certify whether it was proper to be tried again; who certified that he should have thought it proper to be tried again, but that one of the witnesses examined for the plaintiff was since dead, by means whereof the plaintiff might suffer on such new trial; and that, therefore, he rather inclined against a new trial.

After this certificate, another motion for a new trial was made; when, the Master of the Rolls being in Court, the Chancellor desired his thoughts on this matter, and the Master said, "the only objection to the new trial appeared to be the death of the witness; and though it had been said that the weight of a living witness would be greater than depositions, yet it was his opinion, that since this witness had been examined in the cause, and was dead, the depositions might be read; also, as the testimony which the witness had given at the former trial, might be given 39 *again in evidence against the same parties, he should rather think that the other side had suffered by the death of the witness, since they had thereby lost the advantage of cross-examining;" and the Court ordered a new trial accordingly. Here we find the rule laid down again, without any qualification as to proving the words; and further, we see, that though a witness may have given a deposition in a Chancery suit, yet if the Chancellor directs an issue at law, and the witness is examined on that trial, and dies, the testimony which he then gave, may be proved in another trial of the issue.

Mayor of Doncaster v. Day, 3 Taunt. 261. A new trial was given, and counsel moved for a rule of Court, that if any of the witnesses should die, or become unable to attend, their evidences given on the former trial might be read on the next. Mansfield, C. J. "You do not want a rule of Court for that purpose. What a witness since (dead) has sworn upon a trial between the same parties, may, without any order of the Court, be given in evidence, either from the Judge's notes, or from notes that have been taken by any other person, who will swear to their accuracy; or the former evidence may be proved by any other person who will swear, from his memory, to its having been given." This case, seems to me, to lay down the rule as broadly as any of the former. A Judge's notes will furnish proof of the evidence. These notes, we know, never pretend to contain the very words of the witness. The Judge notes the substance only of the facts which he deems material. The same doctrine is also distinctly laid down as settled in White v. Kibbling, 11 Johns. Rep. 141, and Miles v. Ohara, 4 Binney's Rep. 111. I think, upon the whole, that it is the doctrine both of reason and authority, that where a witness, who has been examined in a cause, dies, his evidence may be proved in any subsequent trial of the cause, if the person proving it will swear, that he gives the matter substantially; though he does not pretend to repeat the words of the witness.

40 *If we examine Armistead's testimony, we shall find that it comes clearly within this rule. He stated distinctly the facts to which Gibson had deposed: that the two notes given by Hartshorne to the defendants, were in exchange for two notes of the same dates and for the same sums, given by the defendants to Hartshorne: that these last notes, after Hartshorne's failure, were received by Gibson as one of his trustees: that Gibson was afterwards robbed of them, and that neither of the said notes had ever been paid by the defendants: that on his cross-examination, Gibson stated that the reasons which induced him to say that the notes were exchange notes, were, that as well as he could recollect they were the same in sums and dates, and he moreover well knew, that Hartshorne and the defendants were in the constant habit of exchanging notes for their mutual accommodation; but that he spoke of sums and dates from memory only. Armistead also stated, that he himself did not pretend to use the language of Gibson, but had given the substance of his testimony, to the best of his recollection. I conclude that the Court did not err in admitting this evidence; unless it should be, upon the ground, that Gibson himself was an interested and incompetent witness. Let us examine that point.

The defendants, the payees of the note, endorsed it in blank to Gibson; he, again, to the defendant; and they, to the plaintiffs. Was Gibson liable on this endorsement, to either the plaintiffs or the defendants? If not, he was a good witness. We know, there are two classes of paper among us; the one governed by the law merchant, the other, by the common law as contradistinguished from it. To the first class belong bills of exchange, and negotiable notes; to the second, bonds, notes of hand and other obligations. Bills of exchange (as Judge Roane says in Norton v. Rose, 2 Wash. 249) were always assignable. "They did not owe this quality to statutory provisions," but to the law merchant. From the same source spring those other rules, which distinguish commercial paper from all other; as 41 first, that the holder has a right to resort to the drawer, and every person whose name is on the paper, each endorser being, as to him, a new drawer. Secondly, that the innocent holder of a bill holds it free from any equity existing between any of the former parties to it, (except in cases of usury and gaming,) this being necessary to its quality as a currency. The Statute of Anne, having declared promissory notes, assignable in like manner as bills of exchange, has placed them in England on the same high ground. Lord Mansfield says, (in Peacock v. Rhodes,) "The holder of a bill of exchange or promissory note, is not to be considered as the assignee of the payee. An assignee must take the thing assigned, subject to all the equity to which the original party was subject. If this rule applied to bills and promissory notes, it would stop their currency." The law merchant, as part of the common law, is in force with us, where it is unchanged by Statute. As regards bills of exchange, our Statutes have taken up the subject, and fixed them on the basis of commercial law. The Statute of Anne was never in force with us. Promissory notes, therefore, which derive their commercial qualities from it, are left, with us, to stand on common law ground; except that the Statutes incorporated the Farmers' Bank, (1812,) extending the charter of the Bank of Virginia, (1814,) and establishing the North Western Bank and Bank of the Valley, (1817,) enact, "that all bills or notes, negotiable at these Banks, shall be placed on the footing of bills of exchange." At common law, we know, that bonds, notes, and other evidences of debt, were considered as mere choses in action, not capable in their nature of being assigned, so as to transfer the legal title. The assignee acquired an equitable interest, but subject to all the legal and equitable defences which could have been set up against the obligee or payee. Turton v. Benson, 1 P.

Wms. 497. By Act of Assembly in 1705, it was enacted, that any person might assign a bond or bill for debt; and that the assignee might prosecute *suit in his own name, allowing all discounts, &c. In 1730, this power of assignment was extended to promissory notes, classing them, in this respect, with bonds and bills. These Statutory provisions have been continued to the present day. Their effect on bonds, notes, &c. was very ably discussed and settled in the early cases in this Court. See Mackie v. Davis, 2 Wash. 219; Norton v. Rose, 2 Wash. 233, and other cases, both in this and the Federal Court. "These cases decided, that it was not the intention of the Legislature, to place bonds and notes on the footing of commercial paper; but merely so far to change the common law, as to enable the assignee to sue in his own name; taking the paper subject to all the equity of the obligor or maker."

There is another striking difference between common and commercial paper. Upon refusal of the drawee to accept, or of the acceptor or maker of a bill or negotiable note, to pay, the holder had only to get the paper protested, give due notice, and might immediately resort to any name upon it. With respect to bonds and common notes, it was seriously contended that there was no resort at all to any assignor; it being like the sale of any other personal chattel; but the Courts, on solemn argument, decided, that though the Act of Assembly gives no action against the assignor, yet that such action results (on common law principles) from the debt which the assignment implies, and the promise which the law raises by the assignor to the assignee, that if the assignee (using due diligence) fails to recover of the obligor or maker, the assignor will re-pay him the consideration which he received for the paper. This implied promise, however, is decided to extend only to the immediate assignee, and to give to no other a right of action against the assignor; so that no assignee could sue a remote assignor. See in addition to the cases before cited, Mandeville v. Riddle, 1 Cranch, 290; Yeaton v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Cranch, 49.

43 *Having thus pointed out some of the distinctions which characterize these two classes of paper, let us examine to which of them we must assign the note before us; and here there is no difficulty. It is a promissory note, payable to Caton & Veale, or order, at the office of discount and deposit of the United States' Bank at Norfolk, dated May, 1806, and payable in sixty days. At this date, all promissory notes in this State were mere common law choses in action; evidences of debt, and nothing more; and subject to all the common law doctrines before stated. This is evident from all the cases, both those before cited, and many others in our books. In some of these cases, the notes were exactly like the one before us. In others, they were made negotiable at Banks. Yet this could not change the law. This is shewn, not only by the judicial decisions, but also by the laws creating Banks, in 1812-14-17. These Acts expressly place notes made negotiable at the Banks created by them, on the footing of bills of exchange; which would have been a vain and nugatory thing, if such notes already occupied that ground. This, then, was a common note of hand, and the assignee could maintain no action at law on it, against any, but his own immediate assignor. Caton & Veale were the immediate assignors of the plaintiffs, and Gibson a remote assignor. Against Gibson, then, the plaintiffs could bring no suit at law; and, if there were no other resort, he would, unquestionably, be a disinterested witness. But, it may be said, that though not at law, the plaintiffs might recover of Gibson in equity; and the case of Riddle v. Mandeville, 5 Cranch, 322, may be cited. That was a case of a note very like the one before us; on which, the endorsee had first sued a remote endorser at law; and failing in that action, on the ground before stated, had filed a bill in equity against the same remote endorser, and obtained a decree. But, this was expressly on the ground, that the remote endorser was fairly proved by the evidence, to be liable to his immediate endorsee; and the Court considered, 44 that this liability was *transferred in equity, though not at law, by the endorsement of that endorsee; and that this being an equitable interest, equity would, of course, afford a remedy. But the Court expressly declare, that in such case the defendant may defend himself as effectually in equity against the holder, as he could against his immediate assignee, in a suit at law. Under this decision, and indeed upon the broad ground which distinguishes common from commercial paper, Gibson could not be liable to the suit of the plaintiffs, unless he would have been liable to Caton & Veale, his immediate assignees; and that to them, he would not have been liable is most clear, when we look at the note and observe, Caton & Veale were the payees, and that they endorsed it to Gibson. They were then the endorers of Gibson before he was their endorser; and the one liability balanced the other. Gibson, then, being liable to nobody on this note, was a competent witness.

Having shewn this, it may seem unnecessary to discuss the matter further; yet as the point was ably argued, I will add, that I doubt exceedingly, whether, under the circumstances of the case, the evidence could be objected to now, even admitting that there was such an interest in Gibson, as would have excluded him, if objected to at the first trial. His interest (if any) was apparent on the face of the paper. He stood on it as endorser. With this fact before them, the defendants suffered him to be examined, and made him their own witness by cross-examining him. If, on this cross-examination, they had drawn from him evidence the most conclusive in their favor, they would have had the full benefit of it. Ought they then to be permitted, because they could not turn his evidence to their own account, to bring forward this objection, with a full knowledge of which they had made him their own witness, and thereby given him credit? See Turner v. Pearte, 1 Term Rep. 717. Again. If, at the first trial, the objection had been made, the plaintiffs, as the record shews, were ready to have released Gibson, and 45 had given him notice that they were ready; but no objection was taken. He has died since; and if what he swore then, cannot now be proved, the plaintiffs are clearly deprived of his evidence, by the admission of the defendants, at the first trial, that he was above exception. Whether, if Gibson had lived till the second trial, his evidence might then have been objected to, is a question which I have not considered, and which stands on somewhat different ground; for, then, the plaintiffs might still have executed a release. But after his death, there could be no release; for, it could not look back to the evidence formerly given. Upon this question, I give only the present inclination of my mind. The case does not call for an opinion.

Before quitting this subject, it may not be amiss to remark, that the Act of 1807, giving the right to assignees to sue any previous assignor, does not apply to this case; and if it did, would not vary the result, as it gives to the remote assignor the same defence which he would have, against his immediate assignee.

We come now to the other bills of exception; of which my examination will be brief, as the principles already discussed, will, in a great measure, govern them.

The Court instructed the jury, that there was no difference between the responsibility of the endorser of a promissory note payable at Bank, and the assignor of a bond for money not payable at Bank: that the failure of Hartshorne, while he remained owner of valuable property, was not such insolvency as excused the plaintiffs from suing him; but, that if he was insolvent when the note became due, no suit was necessary. These instructions were not excepted to. It may be enough to say of them, that as general, abstract propositions, they are true.

The Court further instructed the jury, that if they should be of opinion that the notes were exchange notes, and that the one given by Caton & Veale, to Hartshorne, had never been paid, but was stolen and lost, due diligence had nothing to do with the case. This was excepted to.

46 *Was it erroneous? I think not. Due diligence implies a suit against the obligor, except in cases where it can be proved that a suit would be useless. We have seen that insolvency is one case. Suppose it could be shewn that the note was a forgery; that the assignor had received the money, &c. These cases would equally put the question of due diligence aside; because they would equally shew, that a suit would have been fruitless. Suppose it could be shewn, that in the assignment, the assignor practised a fraud on the assignee. This, I have no doubt, would make him immediately liable to the assignee, without any resort to the obligor. If we consider the passing these exchange notes as a fair transaction, the one is the consideration of the other; and not being commercial paper, the equity arising from the failure of the consideration, follows the note. If then, the note which Caton & Veale gave Hartshorne for his, was lost, so that they could not be called upon to pay it, this would be a good defence for Hartshorne, in a suit brought against him by the assignees of Caton & Veale; and therefore, such suit would be useless. If it be objected, that Hartshorne had assigned the note, before its loss, to his trustees, and that they might recover the money of Caton & Veale, as on a lost note, the answer is, that they took the note with full notice of the nature of the transaction: that Gibson, one of the trustees, is the witness, who proves these facts, in order to charge Caton & Veale, on their assignment; and that they could never afterwards come on Caton & Veale. This is all predicated on the hypothesis, that the passing exchange notes is a fair transaction; and if these had been bills of exchange or negotiable notes, there is no doubt that the transaction would have been considered fair. See Rolfe v. Caslon, 2 H. Bl. Rep. 570; Cowley v. Dunlop, 7 Term Rep. 565; Bucker v. Buttivant, 3 East. 72; Sarrate v. Austin, 4 Taunt. 200; Bayly on Bills, 298. It is laid down in these cases, that counter acceptances are good mutual 47 considerations for such "acceptances.

Therefore, if two traders exchange acceptances, and afterwards become bankrupt, each may prove the other's acceptances under his commission, though the acceptances of neither be due at the time of such bankruptcy. I have not formed a decided opinion, whether in common paper, the passing of these exchange notes should be considered a fraud upon the public, so as to estop the maker from setting up the want, or failure, of consideration, against the innocent holder. My brethren think it should have that effect. If so, it would not follow that Caton & Veale could say to their assignees, "go upon Hartshorne. He and we have practised a fraud, and therefore, though he might resist us, he cannot defend himself against you." The law does not tolerate, that any person, from his own fraud, should raise up to himself a right; or by that fraud, should transfer to another a right, which he has not himself, and thereby protect himself. Taking it as a fraud, therefore, Caton & Veale would be immediately liable to the plaintiffs, and thus, either way, the Court were right.

The Court refused the second instruction asked for by the defendants, and rightly. It is an abstract proposition, not universally true; and, as I have just shewn, not true in this case.

The third was properly refused, because it was neither true, nor applicable.

The fifth instruction might have been wholly refused, for the reasons already given. The Court, however, gave it with a restriction, to which the defendants could not object.

The sixth instruction asked, was, "that if the jury should think the bail of Hartshorne was able to pay, the plaintiffs ought to proceed against the bail, and if not, that the defendants were not liable." The instruction, thus generally asked, was properly refused; for, if it was unnecessary to sue Hartshorne, it could not be necessary to pursue his bail to insolvency.

48 The question, whether, "where a suit is necessary against the maker of the note, it is also necessary to pursue the bail to insolvency, is one of some importance; on which, as it was earnestly argued at the bar, I will give my present impressions. It does not seem to me necessary to take proceedings against the bail. All that is requisite to give the assignee recourse to his assignor, is to ascertain the insolvency of the maker. This, we have seen may be done without any suit. But, if it were necessary to pursue the bail to insolvency, it would, on the same ground of reason, be necessary to ascertain, in all cases, whether the debtor could not give bail; and this could only be by suit. It would be still more clearly necessary, in every suit brought, to require bail; but this Court decided, in Harrison's adm'r v. Raine's adm'r, 5 Munf. 456, that the assignee of a bond may recover of the assignor, after suing the obligor, and getting judgment, and a return of nulla bona, although the attorney endorsed on the writ in the first suit, that no bail was required. All the cases tell us, that a return of no effects, fixes the liability of the assignor; and yet in all cases, proceedings might be had against the bail. In the record before us, a ca. sa. was taken out, and a return of "not found;" with full proof that the debtor had left the country insolvent. Nothing could have established the fact of his insolvency, more clearly than this. But it is said, this fixed the bail. What then? It imposed no obligation on the plaintiffs to pursue him. They had gone far enough in ascertaining the insolvency of Hartshorne.

The next instruction asked, is, "that the plaintiffs had no right to go into an enquiry, as to the consideration of the note." The answer is, that the plaintiffs had an unquestionable right to go into such enquiry. The subject of the last instruction has been already discussed. The Court were right in refusing to give it.

I am clear, upon the whole case, that the judgment must be affirmed.

49 *JUDGE GREEN.

Gibson was clearly a competent witness. The note endorsed by him, not being negotiable, neither the Bank nor Caton & Veale could, in any possible event, claim any thing against him; and as it was competent to the party to prove, upon the second trial, what he swore at the former trial, (he being then dead,) the substance of that evidence might be proved. For, if it were indispensably necessary to prove positively the very words of the witness, it would hardly be possible to do so in any case.

The question as to what diligence is necessary to be used by an assignee of paper not negotiable, turns upon the enquiry, whether a failure in that respect on the part of the assignee, could, by possibility, do an injury to the assignor.

If no such injury is or can, by possibility, be done, then no diligence is required, as if the debtor be insolvent, or the debt has been paid to the assignor. In this case, there being no consideration for the notes exchanged, but the notes themselves mutually given, whilst the notes remained in the hands of the parties respectively, no action could have been maintained upon them by either party against the other. When Caton & Veale assigned Hartshorne's note to the Bank, for a valuable consideration, Hartshorne was bound to pay the note to the Bank, because the note being given expressly for the purpose of enabling Caton & Veale to raise money by discounting it, the advance of money by the Bank to Caton & Veale, was virtually at the request of Hartshorne; and as between him and the Bank, there was a valuable consideration. This right on the part of the Bank, was not derived from Caton & Veale's assignment, they having no right to demand the amount of the note against Hartshorne, who retained in his hands Caton & Veale's exchange note, without using it, for nearly two years after these notes were given. If, therefore, Caton & Veale had paid the amount of the note to the Bank, 50 "at maturity, they would only have re-paid the money advanced to them upon the note; and every thing being in the state it was, when the notes were exchanged, they could have maintained no action against Hartshorne; and if the Bank had recovered in an action against Hartshorne, and he had paid the money, he could have recovered against Caton & Veale, either upon their note in his hands, or as for money paid for them. The privilege on the part of the Bank to claim against Hartshorne, being their's, and not Caton & Veale's assigned to them; and it being impossible that they could suffer any injury by a failure to assert this claim, no diligence against Hartshorne was necessary, in order to subject Caton & Veale as assignors. Nor does the assignment by Hartshorne, of Caton & Veale's note to Gibson, in trust to pay his debts, near two years after the note was protested, at all vary the case. The moment the note was protested, Caton & Veale became liable for its payment to the Bank: and that liability was an equity, on the part of Caton & Veale, against their note in the hands of Hartshorne; and if the money had been paid by Caton & Veale, as it ought to have been, would have been a legal set-off against their note then in the hands of Hartshorne; and if this equity would not have attached to it in the hands of a bona fide subsequent assignee, for valuable consideration, and without notice, it certainly would against an assignee with notice, as Gibson was. Indeed, he was not an assignee for valuable consideration. Neither he nor any other advanced any money or other thing, upon the credit of the note.

There was no obligation on the part of the Bank, to pursue Hartshorne's bail. If they had, and he had paid the money, he would have had the right, by substitution, to stand in the shoes of Hartshorne, the principal, for whom he paid the money, and to recover it from Caton & Veale.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

JUDGE COALTER concurred, and the judgment was affirmed.

51 *Coleman, Administrator De Bonis Non of Wernick, v. M'Murdo and Prentis.

March, 1827.

Administrator D. B. N.—Right to Sue for Devastavit of Former Administrator.—An administrator de bonis non cannot sue the representative of a former executor or administrator, either at law or in equity, for assets wasted or converted by the first executor or administrator; but such suit may be brought directly by creditors, legatees, or distributees.

Same—Same—Statute.—This remedy was given to the administrator de bonis non by the Act of 1661; but that Act was repealed by the Act of 1711.

Practice—Long Prevalence of—Effect.—The long prevalence of a practice which is not sanctioned by law, will not give it validity, if it affects the rights of persons.

This was an appeal from the Richmond Chancery Court.

The suit was brought by William Coleman, administrator de bonis non of Wernick, against M'Murdo, administrator of Douglas, and Prentis. As the merits of this suit are not now in question, it will suffice briefly to state, that Wernick died intestate in the year 1783, and Marks qualified as his administrator, and the complainant, Coleman, became one of his sureties in the administration bond: that Coleman, being apprehensive that he might suffer by this engagement, pressed Marks for counter-security; whereupon the said Marks deposited in the hands of a certain William Douglas about $1500, to cover any deficiency which might appear in his administration of the estate of his intestate: that Marks afterwards died intestate and insolvent, having left no effects whatsoever, except the sum above mentioned, and his estate was committed to Prentis, Sergeant of the town of Petersburg: that Douglas died, leaving the said M'Murdo his executor; and the complainant, Coleman, became administrator de bonis non of Wernick. This suit was brought against M'Murdo and Prentis, to obtain accounts of their administration of the estates of Douglas and Marks, respectively, and to have satisfaction for the balance due to the estate of Wernick for the said Marks. The Chancellor dismissed the bill, and Coleman appealed. Pending the appeal, 52 *William Coleman died, and Thomas Coleman became administrator de bonis non of Wernick. He obtained a scire facias to revive the appeal.

Johnson, for the appellant.

Stanard, for the appellee.

This case was twice argued very elaborately, on the question whether an administrator de bonis non was competent to maintain a suit against the representatives of the first administrator, for assets of the first intestate, which had been wasted or converted to his own use, by the first administrator. But the ample discussion which the question received from the Court, supercedes the necessity of giving the arguments at the bar.

March 14. The Judges delivered their opinions.†

JUDGE CARR.

This case brings before us, for the first time, the question whether an administrator de bonis non can, by bill in equity, call the representative of the first administrator to account, for assets of the first intestate, wasted or converted by the first administrator. This is a question, not of practice, but of sheer law; depending on the extent of the commission of the administrator de bonis non, what are his powers, and how far he represents the estate of his intestate.

Before I enter on the consideration of this subject, I will say a word with respect to the practice of the country, so much relied on. If it had been a general practice for administrators de bonis non, to bring such suits, I should have thought that during an attendance at the bar of fifteen

53 *years, and a service in the Court of Chancery of twelve, I should sometimes have met with bills of this kind. Yet this is the first that I have the least recollection of ever having seen. I am equally free to admit, that I have never known a suit brought by creditors against the representative of an executor or administrator, for waste committed by him. In stating my own experience, I would by no means be understood to doubt the accuracy of those, who say they have known this practice, but merely to question whether it has been of such wide extent, or frequent occurrence, as to entitle it to be called the settled practice of the country. But, admit that such is the practice; yet, when this tribunal is called upon to declare the law, I apprehend that such practice deserves so much weight only, as to insure a close and attentive examination of the foundation on which it rests, and a determination not to disturb it, unless we are convinced that it is in violation of law. But, if we be so convinced, then, I hold, that however general, however ancient the error, we are bound by the highest *Administrator D. B. N.—Right to Sue for Devastavit of Former Administrator.—In Hinton v. Bland, 81 Va. 595. it is said: "In Wernick v. M'Murdo, 5 Rand. 51. the question as to the rights of an administrator de bonis non was elaborately discussed, though the point decided was, that an administrator de bonis non cannot sue the representative of a former executor or administrator for assets wasted or converted by the first executor or administrator, but that suit may be brought directly by creditors, legatees or distributees. The administrator de bonis non 'is appointed,' it was said, 'to finish a business already commenced. It is not, therefore, a full and immediate administration which is committed to him, such as is granted to a temporary administrator, but an administration de bonis non administratis; that is to say, he is entitled to all the goods and personal estate which have not been converted by the former executor or administrator." To the same effect the principal case is cited in Salling v. McKinnay, 1 Leigh 53; Heffernan v. Grymes, 2 Leigh 523; Frazier v. Frazier, 3 Leigh 649; Allen v. Cunningham, 3 Leigh 400; Cheatham v. Burfoot, 9 Leigh 594, 595, 597; Tyler v. Nelson, 14 Gratt. 223, 224, 225; Livesay v. Helms, 14 Gratt. 444; Burwell v. Fauber, 21 Gratt. 454; Harman v. Harrison, 2 Leigh 534, JUDGE CABELL takes issue with the statement by JUDGE CARR in the principal case (p. 55), that there is no privity between an administrator de bonis non and his predecessor, and JUDGE CABELL states that that question was not before the court. In this same case (Bishop v. Harrison), JUDGE CARR (p. 537) explains his proposition above referred to, and admits that his statement was too broad; he says that the statement taken as he intended it is correct, but that it is not correct in its broadest sense.

The principal case is also cited in Paup v. Mingo, 4 Leigh 177, 182; Burwell v. Burwell, 78 Va. 582.

†The PRESIDENT absent.

of all sanctions, to correct it with an unshrinking hand; for, to this Court is confided the duty of expounding the law in the last resort.

In the discussion of this question, I will enquire: 1st. What is the law in that country from which we derive the general features of our system. 2d. Whether our own statutes have altered the law as settled there.

1. Testaments are of high antiquity, coeval with the first rudiments of the law. When a person dies without disposing of his personal property, he is said to die intestate; and in such cases, it was said (though this is doubted in 1 Com. Dig. 491,) that by the old law, the King was entitled to seize upon the goods as patres patriæ. The Crown invested the prelates with this branch of its prerogative, upon the intendment of law saith Perkins, that spiritual men are of better consciences than laymen, and have more knowledge what things would conduce to the benefit of the soul of the deceased. The 54 goods of intestates *being thus vested in the ordinary, he might give or sell them, and dispose of the money in pious uses, being, as to this the King's Almoner. For their conduct in the discharge of this solemn trust, the reverend prelates were accountable to God and their own consciences only. They abused their trust most iniquitously; taking to themselves the whole of the property, after the partes rationabiles (two thirds) of the wife and children were deducted, and leaving the debts unpaid. To remedy this abuse, the Statute of Westminster, 2d Chap. 19, enacted, that the ordinary should be bound to answer the debts of the intestate, so far as his goods would extend. Though this bound them to pay the debts, the residuum still remained in their hands, till the Statute of 31st Edw. 3, chap. 11, took that, together with the administration, from them; enacting, that in cases of intestacy, the ordinary shall depute the nearest and most lawful friends of the deceased, to administer his goods; which deputies the statute places on the same footing with executors, with regard to suits and accounting. This is the origin of administrators, who were only the officers of the ordinary, appointed in pursuance of this statute.

The 21st Hen. 8, chap. 5, enlarges a little the power of the ordinary, permitting him to grant administration, either to the widow or the next of kin, or both, at his discretion; and where two or more are in the same degree, to appoint which he pleases. An executor being the creature of the will, and his power founded on the special confidence of the deceased, he is allowed to transmit that power to another, in whom he has equal confidence. The executor of A's executor, therefore, is to all intents and purposes, the executor and representative of A. himself. But the administrator, being merely the officer of the ordinary, prescribed to him by law, and in whom the deceased had reposed no trust at all, could not transmit his office to another; but, if he died before closing his administration, it resulted back to the ordi-

55 nary to appoint him a successor. *So, too, when an executor died intestate, his administrator did not represent the testator; and in this case also, it devolved on the ordinary to commit administration afresh, with the will annexed. It is the officer thus appointed, whose powers we are now to examine.

He is appointed to finish a business already commenced. It is not, therefore, a full and immediate administration which is committed to him, such as is granted to a temporary administrator; but an administration de bonis non administratis. Between himself and his predecessor, there was no privity. His commission gave him power to act, and to represent the testator or intestate, so far, (and so far only,) as there remained unadministered "goods, chattels and credits, which were of the testator or intestate, at the time of his death." This definition turns our minds at once to the question, what amounts to an administration of assets, so far as regards the administrator de bonis non. Executors and administrators took the legal title to the goods and chattels of the deceased; nor were they, before the Statute of Distributions, 22d and 23d, Char. 2d, (1670,) bound to distribute the surplus after the payment of debts and legacies. Both held in autre droit; and therefore, neither could dispose by will of the property remaining in specie; but both had the power, while living, of changing, altering, and converting the property; and whatever was thus altered or converted, became their own goods, and descended, on their deaths, to their own representative. Such change or conversion of the goods, was, (so far as regarded the administrator de bonis non,) a complete administration, and put them as effectually beyond the reach of his commission, as if they had never belonged to the testator or intestate. To shew that this is so settled in England, I will cite a few out of a vast multitude of cases.

In 2 P. Wms. 340, Attorney General v. Hooker, Lord Chancellor King said, "As to what has been urged, that if an executor dies intestate, all the personal estate, the property whereof is not altered, shall 56 go to the administrator de bonis non*, and not to the next of kin of the executor. This is true; because, from the time the executor dies intestate, the first testator dies intestate also, and it was the executor's own fault, that he did not, as he might, alter the property."

In Rutland v. Rutland, 2 P. Wms. 210, the same doctrine is explicitly laid down.

In 1 Bos. & Bull. 310, Tangry v. Brown, C. J. Eyre, and the Court say, "that every thing is unadministered, which has not been reduced into actual possession, and converted by the administrator."

3 Bac. Abr. 20, tit. "Executors," it is said, "that an administrator de bonis non is entitled to all the goods and personal estate, such as terms for years, household goods, &c. which remain in specie, and were not administered by the first administrator; as also, to all debts due the intestate."

In Wankford v. Wankford, 1 Salk. 306, C. J. Holt, after laying down the rule that the same hand having to pay and to receive, is an extinguishment. puts this case: "If the executrix of the obligee take the obligor to husband, that is no extinguishment; for he may pay her money, as executrix, and she lay this money so paid her by itself, the administrator de bonis non of her testator, (if she die intestate,) shall have that money, as well as any other goods that were the testator's; for, (says he,) if the goods of the testator remain in specie, they shall go to the administrator de bonis non, because in that case, it is notorious, which were the goods of the testator, and they are distinguishable; and there is the same reason where money is kept by itself, and the husband permits it so to be; but if the husband seizes it, it will be his, and will be a devastavit."

Barker v. Talcot, 1 Vern. 473. If A. die intestate, and his son take out administration to him, and receive part of a debt being arrear to the intestate, and accepts a promissory note for the residue, and then dies intestate; this acceptance of the note is such an alteration of the property, 57 *as vests it in the son, and therefore, on his death, it shall go to his administrator, and not to the administrator de bonis non."

Beaumont v. Long, Sir W. Jones's Rep. 248. "Baron and Feme, administratrix of a former husband, recover a debt due to the intestate; the Feme dies and the Baron sues out a sci. fac. to which the defendant demurs. Per Curiam. The action does not lie, because the recovery does not convert this to the proper debt of the Baron; as it would be, if the Baron and Feme recovered a debt due to the Feme, and then the Feme had died; for there, by the recovery, it has become the proper debt of the Baron, if he survive; but here it remains the debt of the intestate, and of him who shall be his administrator."

These are a few of the many cases scattered through the Reports of the last three centuries, shewing the settled course of the law. I might bring to my aid many others, where the contest was between the representative of the administrator, and the administrator de bonis non; and the question uniformly turned upon the point of conversion; all agreeing that a conversion extinguished the right of the administrator de bonis non, as it was an administration, and his commission reached only to the goods and credits unadministered. Sometimes equity will follow the property, where at law, there might be said to be a conversion; as, if the first administrator vested money of his intestate, in the funds, or transferred it from one fund to another. This, as it shewed no intention of making the money his own, would not be considered, in equity, a conversion. Sometimes there will be a conversion in equity, where none exists at law; that is, where some act is done by the administrator, shewing a clear intent to convert. These differences result from the different modes of administering justice in the two systems; and do not, in the least, affect the question; for, before whichever forum the case is brought, if it be decided that the subject matter of dispute has been converted, that is regarded as decisive to *shew, that the administrator de bonis non has no power over it. In addition to all this, the statute of 30th Ch. 2, ch. 7, explained and perpetuated by the 4th and 5th Wm. & Mary, expressly declares, in its preamble, "that executors and administrators of executors and administrators, for want of privity, were not before answerable, nor could be sued, for debts due by the first testator or intestate, notwithstanding such executors or administrators had wasted the estate of the first testator;" and to remedy this evil, it makes such second executors or administrators chargeable. How? To the administrator de bonis non? No; but chargeable "in the same manner as the first executor or administrator should or might have been;" that is, liable directly to the creditors, "who," (as Sergeant Williams, in a learned note on this statute, 1 Saund. 219, e, says,) "may sustain an action against them, in every case, where the executor, in his lifetime, was in any way guilty of any act, which amounts in law to a devastavit, such as exhausting the assets by the payment of debts of inferior degree, before those of a superior, and the like." This review shews us, that in all contests for the property of the intestate, between the administrator de bonis non, and the representative of the first administrator, a conversion has uniformly been held to withdraw the goods from the administrator de bonis non: that the statutes declare the second executor or administrator not suable for the devastavit of the first; and that the statute making them thenceforward suable, does not give power to the administrator de bonis non to sue them; but gives it to the creditors.

To meet this formidable array, what is there on the other side? Not one single case; not the dictum of a single Judge; not the assertion of an elementary writer, that the administrator de bonis non, either at law or in equity, can support an action, or file a bill for account, against the representative of a delinquent executor or administrator. This absence of authority alone, is conclusive evidence, that in England, such a right was never claimed.

59 *The law of executors and administrators came to this colony, as thus settled, by the mother country; and we are now to enquire, how it has been affected by our own legislation. A minute examination into our early laws, would be rather matter of curiosity, than of useful application to this case; for the question here must be governed by the revival of 1819, which repeals every law not re-enacted by it. I will, however, take a brief notice of some of our early statutes.

The probate of wills, and granting administration, which belonged to the ordinary in England, was given to our Courts. At first, it seems that the Court of James City (the General Court I presume) performed these functions for the whole colony. In 1645, (20th Ch. 1st; 1 Hen. Stat. at Large, 302, (there is a statute, which, stating that theretofore the estates of deceased persons had been much wronged by the great charge and expenses which have been brought in by administrators, by pretence of their attendance at James City, &c., for remedy thereof, &c., enacts that all administrations shall be granted at the County Courts, where the deceased resided, and all probates of wills there made, &c.

The next Act which it is material to notice, is one passed in March, 1661-2, (14th Ch. 2d; 2 Hen. Stat. at Large, 91.) It is headed "Administrations, to whom to be granted," and relates solely to that subject. The recital states, that commissions of administrations had been suddenly disposed of, under pretence of greatest creditor, or next of kin, and thereby the persons really entitled defrauded; and enacts, "that no administration shall be granted for nine months, except to the widow or child." In case of no wife or child, then it is enacted, "that the estate be, by the Court, sold at public outcry, the purchasers putting in security, and acknowledging judgment: for their debts, which the Court shall assign to the several creditors," according to their priorities; the surplusage to be held three years, for any who will prove himself next of kin; "and if none prove himself such within that time, the Court to give an account of the surplus, to the Assembly, to be disposed of by them for the use of the country." This law clearly dispenses altogether with the appointment of an administrator, where the decedent leaves neither wife nor child. A subsequent part of this law, (it is not, as the modern practice is, laid off into sections) states, "And whereas, it hath been the frequent evil practice of administrators, as soon as they have obtained an order to administer, to act as administrator, by virtue of that order, without giving security, or taking out their commissions, so that the estate being embezzled away, no account can be given thereof: Be it therefore enacted, that whoever pretends to administer upon any estate, shall bring into the Court sufficient security, before the order shall be granted; and an order thus obtained legally, by giving such security to be truly accountable, to bring in a true inventory, and to perform such things as the administrators by law are enjoined, shall not, at any time, be reversed, unless the party that obtained the same, die before he hath given an account of the estate, and obtained his quietus; in which case, the Court is empowered to grant the administration of the estate so not accounted for to some other person, who may by virtue thereof, call the heirs, executors or administrators of the former administrator to an account, who shall pay out of the said deceased administrator's estate all such debts as shall be found due to the estate he administered upon, in the first place."

I have given this statute nearly entire, that we may the better judge of it. It contains a striking departure from the established law; for it will be recollected, that it was passed eight years before the Statute of Distributions; and a much longer time before the Statutes of Charles and William & Mary, subjecting executors and administrators of executors and administrators to the suits of creditors. It does not touch the case of executors, but goes to a radical change of the existing law of administrators. That law granted to the administrator de bonis non, a partial administration of the goods and credits unadministered. This seems to contemplate a full administration; for it is, that if the party die before he hath given an account of the estate, the former order of administration shall be reversed, and administration shall be granted of "the estate," (the whole estate,) "so not accounted for." The administrator, then, is not an administrator de bonis non administratoris, but of the whole estate; and the Act is careful to vest in him the power "by virtue thereof," to call the heirs, executors or administrators of the former administrator to account. As he was made administrator of the whole estate, it was certainly proper that he should have power over the whole; but it could not have been necessary for the law to give him power to call the representative of his predecessor to account, by virtue thereof, if such power existed independent of the law. This provision, then, is clear proof that the Legislature who passed the law, understood that a second administrator could not, as the law then stood, call the representative of a former administrator to account. It is very clear to me, that if this Act of 1661-2 were in force when the case before us arose, it governed it, and gave the right to bring the bill; but it is equally clear to my understanding, that the Act was not then in force. In 1705, (4th Anne, 3 Hen. Stat. at Large, 371,) we have an Act, "For distribution of intestates' estates, &c.," which is nearly a copy (so far as I have been able to compare them,) of the 22d and 23d of Charles 2. This Act unquestionably repealed so much of the Act of 1661, as disposed of the estate of intestates, where there was no wife or child, by making, in such cases, a different disposition of the estate.

In 1711, (9th Anne, 4 Hen. Stat. at Large, 12,) we find "an Act directing the manner of granting probates of wills and administration of intestates' estates." This Act treats these subjects very much at large, and with much more legal science than the former. It not only goes into the details, so necessary to clearness, but prescribes the forms of the bonds to be given in all cases. When it comes to speak on the subject of unfinished administrations, it says, "And if it shall so happen, that any executor shall die intestate, not having fully performed his executorship; or any administrator shall depart this life, not having fully administered the goods of his intestate; in every such case, it shall and may be lawful for the Court that granted the certificate for obtaining such probate or commission of administration, to hear and determine the right of administration, and to grant certificate for obtaining letters of administration. of the goods not administered, to such person as by this Act shall have right thereto."

Now, I say, that this Act repealed the statute of 1661. The provisions of the two Acts are inconsistent with each other. The first, in case the party dies before he obtains his quietus, reverses the former order of administration, and grants de novo complete administration of the whole estate; the second, where the administrator dies, not having fully administered, grants administration "of the goods not administered" only. The former gives the second administrator power to call the heirs, executors or administrators of the first, to account; and this was necessary; for, as he had to account for all the estate, he ought to have the power to call it all in. The latter law gives no power to the second administrator to call the representative of the first to account; and for this there was no need, as he had to do only with the goods unadministered. When the Legislature used these words, their meaning had been perfectly fixed and settled; and we are bound to suppose that they used them in the sense which such a numerous train of decisions had affixed to them. This law, then, would repeal the former, upon the ground that leges posteriores, priores contrarias abrogant. But it has also a repealing clause, most strongly and emphatically expressed; that "all and every other Act and Acts, and every clause and article thereof, heretofore made, for so much thereof as relates to any matter or thing whatsoever, within the purview of this Act, is and are hereby repealed and made void, to all intents and purposes, as if the same had never been made." I conclude, then, that this Act repealed the former.*

63 The repeal of the Act of 1661-2, restored things to the standing here, which, I have shewn, existed before its passage. That this was the Legislative understanding of the matter in 1730, is most clear from an Act then passed, in which they say, "Whereas executors and administrators of such persons as possess themselves of personal estates of other dead persons, and convert the same to their own use, are not liable, by the rules of the common law, as it now stands in this colony, to pay the debts of such persons, whose estates have been so converted by their testator or intestate; for remedy whereof: Be it enacted, that all executors and administrators of any executor in his own wrong, and all executors or administrators of any executor or administrator of right, who shall waste or convert to his own use, goods, &c. of his testator or intestate, shall, from henceforth, be liable and chargeable, in the

*Note by JUDGE CARR. When these remarks were written, I had not seen the revival of 1733. My brother CABELL has since turned my attention to it, and I find it containing such complete evidence of the repeal of the Act of 1661-2, by that of 1711, as would have saved me the trouble of the above remarks, had it been known to me. This revival is contained in a single volume, entitled thus: "A collection of all the Acts of Assembly now in force in the Colony of Virginia. (with the titles of such as are expired or repealed, and notes in the margin, how and at what time, they were repealed.) examined with the record by a committee appointed for that purpose, who have added many useful marginal notes and references, and an exact table. Published pursuant to an order of the General Assembly held in Williamsburg, in 1727." In this volume, we have the title of the Act of 1661-2, to wit: "Administrations, to whom to be granted;" followed by the word "Repealed;" and in the margin the following words: "Repealed, chap. 2d. 1711;" the very law, which I have contended above did repeal it. If stronger evidence could be necessary, than the Acts themselves afford, it is thus furnished.

64 same manner as his testator or intestate should or might have "been."

Here we see the mischief clearly expressed, and the remedy as plainly applied; a mischief, which could not have existed, and a remedy worse than useless, because tending to create confusion, if the statute of 1661-2 had been in force.

Several other Acts were mentioned in the argument, those of 1785 and 1814, particularly; but really it seems so clear to me that they were intended to meet the particular mischief stated in them, and have no influence on the question before us, that I do not think it worth while to add to this opinion, (already too long,) by a further notice of them.

It will be observed, that I have not compared the conveniences and inconveniences of the two constructions contended for. In doubtful questions, this may be very well; but where the law is clear, (as it seems to me in this case,) the Court have nothing to do (I think) with these considerations. That the law is so, is enough for us. If it be inconvenient, or operate injustice, the Legislature must interfere.

I shall only add, that in the revival of 1819, 1 R. C. 390, sec. 66, the law as stated above, taken from the Act of 1730, is re-enacted, whereby the administrator of an administrator who has wasted the assets, is made liable and chargeable, in the same manner as his intestate was; in other words, liable to the creditors, and not to the administrator de bonis non.

I am therefore of opinion, that the administrator de bonis non cannot maintain a bill in equity, calling the administrator of the administrator to account, for any waste or conversion of his intestate.

JUDGE GREEN.

It was determined in Dykes v. Woodhouse, 3 Rand. 287, that an administrator de bonis non, was entitled to a scire facias to revive a judgment in favor of a deceased executor or administrator, for a debt due to the testator or intestate; because such judgment did not, as was admitted in the English Courts, convert the property of the debt, or amount to an administration. The administrator de bonis non is bound by, and entitled to, the benefit of such judgment; and for the same reason, he is entitled to appeal, or to prosecute an appeal from any decree or judgment against the former executor or administrator, or administrator de bonis non, binding or affecting any subject belonging to the testator or intestate; the right to which, but for such decree or judgment, would have devolved on the administrator de bonis non. The party aggrieved, or any one standing, by operation of law, in his place, is entitled to prosecute such appeal.

The original plaintiff in the Court below, could not, in his character of administrator de bonis non of Wernick (in which character only he sued,) reach the fund in the hands of M'Murdo, unless he was entitled, in that character, to call the representative of the former administrator to account, and to be substituted to the rights of Wernick's creditors and distributees, and of the sureties of the first administrator, in respect to the fund deposited with Douglas, by the first administrator, for the indemnity of his sureties.

The question, whether an administrator de bonis non can call the representative of a deceased executor or administrator to account in a Court of Equity, for the assets of the testator or intestate, wasted or converted to his own use by such executor or administrator, deserves a full examination; since it has never yet, as far as I am informed, occurred in this Court, except in the case of Spotswood v. Dandridge, decided in a Special Court; and in that case, the question does not appear to have been discussed, but to have passed sub silentio.

At the common law, an administrator was the mere bailiff of the ordinary, responsible only to him. The next of kin had no legal or equitable claim to distribution; but *the ordinary distributed the assets in pious usus, at his pleasure. 11 Vin. Abr. 52, pl. 1, n.; Palmer v. Alcock, 3 Mod. 56; Skinner, 219, S. C. It has been even doubted, whether the ordinary was responsible to creditors; a doubt removed by the statute of Westm. 2, which required the ordinary to pay the debts. 18 H. 6, 23, b; 5 Rep. 83, Snelling's Case. Nor could the ordinary or administrator sue for the debts due to the intestate. 8 Rep. 135, Sir John Needham's Case. The statute of 31st Edw. 3, ch. 11, made it the duty of the ordinary to commit the administration to the next and most loyal friends of the intestate, who might sue for the debts due to the intestate, and be answerable as executor. 11 Vin. Abr. 91, pl. 1; and the statute of 21 H. 8, ch. 5, sect. 3, directed that in case of intestacy, or the executor's refusing, administration should be committed to the widow or next of kin, or both, at the discretion of the ordinary; and if divers persons were in equality of kindred, he might accept one or more. Ibid. pl. 2. These statutes deprived the ordinary of the power of displacing administrators at pleasure, which he had at the common law. 11 Vin. Abr. 52, pl. 1, n; 70, pl. 7; 115, pl. 15. But, he still took bonds from the administrators, and compelled them to make distribution at his pleasure, Sadler v. Daniel, 10 Mod. 21; until about the 12th of James 1st, when it was determined upon the construction of the statute of H. 8, that an administrator was not bound to make any distribution of the surplus, even although the intestate had children under age, or beyond sea, and administration was granted to a stranger; and prohibitions issued to prevent the ordinary from compelling such distribution. 11 Vin. Abr. 52, pl. 1, n; 183, pl. 1; 357, pl. 2; Hughes v. Hughes, Lev. 233.

Before the Statute of Distributions of the 22d and 23d of Charles 2, (1670,) an executor was not compellable in any case, to make distribution of any surplus of the assets remaining after the payment of debts and legacies; so that an executor and administrator had precisely the same 67 interest *in the testator's goods; not an absolute interest, as they held in autre droit, but such an interest as that no other except creditors, in case of intestacy, or creditors and legatees, in case of a will and executor, could claim any thing against them, in respect to the assets of the testator or intestate, which came to their hands. The nature of this interest was such, that although the executor or administrator was entitled to the goods, chattels and credits of the testator or intestate, so that no one, (except creditors and legatees as aforesaid,) could claim against them during their lives; yet, upon their deaths, testate or intestate, all the testator's or intestate's goods, chattels and credits, remaining in kind, still belong to the estate of the testator or intestate; that is, (in the language of the letters testamentary, or commission of administration,) they were "the goods, chattels and credits of the testator or intestate at the time of his death." Neither the executor or administrator could dispose of such by his will. 11 Vin. Abr. 109, pl. 3; 421, pl. 6; 267, pl. 6. They remained, as at the death of the testator or intestate, without a proprietor, and it devolved on the ordinary to give them an owner, by appointing an administrator "de bonis non administratis" by the former executor or administrator, or by granting probate of the will of the first executor to his executor; the effect of which was, to make the second executor the immediate executor of the first testator, as if he was appointed executor by his will. 11 Vin. Abr. 421, pl. 6; 267, pl. 6. But, the executor or administrator had the power, and if it did not injure creditors or legatees, the right also to make the goods, chattels and credits of the testator or intestate, their own, by converting them to their own use, by destroying their identity and changing their character; and whatever was so converted, no longer remained any part of "the goods, chattels and credits, which were of the testator or intestate, at the time of his death."

In this state of things, it was necessary, and within the original reason of granting 68 administrations, to grant an administration "of the goods and chattels remaining in kind. But, there was no reason to grant to another a power to call upon the executor or administrator of the deceased executor or administrator, for an account and payment of any balance of the assets converted to his own use. The payment of legacies was compelled in the Ecclesiastical Court exclusively, (11 Vin. Abr. 358, pl. 7, note;) until Lord Nottingham first assumed the jurisdiction in Chancery, upon the ground that the executor was a trustee for the legatees; and before the Statute of Distributions, and whilst the ordinary exercised the power to compel distribution at his pleasure, that jurisdiction was also exercised exclusively in the Ecclesiastical Courts. Toll. Law of Executors, 489. But, creditors never had remedy in the Ecclesiastical Court and only had it in Courts of common law. As to creditors, after the death of an executor or administrator, they had no remedy against his representative for a devastavit, at common law, it being a tort, which died with the person. 11 Vin. Abr. 309, pl. 1; 310, pl. 7, 8. Nor were they ever held to have a remedy in Chancery, until three years before the statute of 30 Ch. 2, chap. 7, sec. 2,

(which gave a remedy at law against the executor or administrator of an executor de son tort;) when it was said that such a remedy might be had against such an executor in equity; and two years after, and one year before the statute, it was held that the same remedy might be had in equity against an executor of a rightful executor. 11 Vin. Abr. 310, pl. 9; pl. 3, sec. 6; pl. 10. The bond given by the administrator could be used against the executor or administrator of the deceased administrator only for the purposes of enforcing that which was within the proper jurisdiction of the ordinary to enforce, the returning of an account, and a distribution at his pleasure; not to enforce the payment of debts, as was afterwards determined, when the Courts of law adjudged that the bond was void, so far as it bound the administrator to distribute, but good, so far as it bound him to render an account; the latter subject

69 *being within, and the former without, the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court. 11 Vin. Abr. 183, pl. 1; 358, pl. 7, note. It was therefore more convenient, (as no one was interested in the recovery to be had against the executor or administrator of the administrator, but those designated by the ordinary as distributees,) that the remedy should be had immediately for their benefit, and in their names, and paid to them at once, than that it should go into the hands of the succeeding administrator (although he might be one of the designated distributees) to be afterwards distributed, perhaps after a suit against him. But after it was determined, that the ordinary had no power to compel any distribution, it would have been absurd to hold that the executor of a deceased administrator was liable to account to the administrator de bonis non for the assets converted by the first administrator; for, then the fund would have devolved from administrator de bonis non to administrator de bonis non forever, and could have been of no use to any one. So, in respect to executors dying intestate, creditors had no remedy in respect to the assets converted to his own use or wasted; and the ordinary never had power to compel any distribution whatever, in the case of an executor. Such effect had the appointment of an executor, that before the statute of 21 Hen. 8, (which directed administration to be committed to the wife or the next of kin in case of intestacy,) that if an executor died intestate, the ordinary might, and ought to commit the administration de bonis non of the executor and of the first testator, to the same person. Br. Abr. "Administrator," pl. 45, cites 32 H. 6; 2 Lib. Int. 145; 21 Edw. 4, 24; 11 Vin. Abr. 88, pl. 1. The statute of 31 Edw. 3, having directed the administration to be committed to the next and most loyal friend, the executor was considered as designated by the testator as such; and the unadministered assets should therefore go quasi his, to the next and most loyal friend of the executor.

This doctrine was held as late as the 70 30th Char. 2, 11 Vin. *Abr. 90, 11.

But it was otherwise held, both before and after this last case, and particularly after the Statute of Distributions, and that administration de bonis non should be granted to the next of kin of the testator, under the Statute of 21 H. 8, the testator being dead intestate as to all the assets not administered by the executor; that is, not converted. 11 Vin. Abr. 89, pl. 8; 87, pl. 23, (1721;) 111, pl. 20, 21, (1723, 1725;) 11 Vin. Abr. 88, pl. 1. The same doctrine, founded upon the Statute of 21 H. 8, was suggested by Brooke, in his abridgment.

It was for these reasons, that no rights were given to the administrator de bonis non against the former executor or administrator, and his commission was so framed as to shew accurately the extent of his rights, by committing to him the administration de bonis non administratis by the former executor or administrator; which entitled him to no more than the goods, chattels and credits, remaining in specie, or although changed, yet capable of being identified as the proceeds of the goods, chattels or credits of the testator or intestate, not intended to be converted by the executor or administrator; as money collected and kept separate by the executor or administrator; lands extended in a suit by the executor or administrator, in satisfaction of a debt due to the testator. 3 Bac. Abr. 19, 20; Wankford v. Wankford, 1 Salk. 306; 11 Vin. Abr. 108, pl. 2; 112, pl. 4. In equity, money might be recovered by the administrator of an executor, upon a judgment recovered by the executor for goods of the testator taken from the executor; Yate v. Gough, Yelv. 33; or if the executor should, for the benefit of the estate, invest part of it in the funds, or transfer it from one particular stock to another, this was not a conversion or appropriation, but it might still be followed as assets, for the nature of the case required it. Waite v. Whorewood, 2 Atk. 159. In these cases, the fund can be identified, like money kept separate; and there was no intention on the part of the executor, to convert it to his own use, and therefore the fund in 71 these cases, as in *the case of a judgment unsatisfied, in favor of an executor, for a debt originally due to the testator, remains assets of the testator not administered by the executor. After the determination that an administrator could not be compelled to make distribution, the rights of an executor and administrator were precisely the same. Neither was accountable for assets wasted or converted to his own use, except to creditors, and (in the case of a will) to legatees, in their life-time; and to legatees only, after their deaths. Their representatives had no interest in the assets unadministered; but, these went to the administrator de bonis non, or the executor of the executor, who held them as the assets of the testator or intestate, chargeable, in respect to such assets, as the executor or administrator was chargeable whilst he held them, and no further. Upon their deaths, the same consequences followed, as upon the deaths of the executor or administrator, and no other.

It was argued, that after the Statute of Distributions, the administrator, in all cases, and the executor, in some cases, being compellable to make distribution of the surplus of the assets which came to their hands to be administered; and as their representatives were exempted from responsibility to the administrator de bonis non for goods converted by the executor or administrator, in the life-time of the executor or administrator, in respect to the beneficial power over the assets, which the executor and administrator had before that statute; and as, since the statute, the representative of the executor or administrator is responsible, for the goods so converted, to some one; that responsibility should be to the administrator de bonis non, as trustee for the distributees; and that the reason of the former rule having failed, the rule also failed.

Before the Statute of Distributions, and whilst the ordinary compelled distribution, the same reason existed for holding the representative of a deceased administrator liable to the administrator de bonis non, for the goods converted, "as exists since the statute; yet such liability never existed, and would not have been convenient to any purpose, for the reasons before stated. The administrator de bonis non, after the statute, was a trustee for distributees, and a representative of the testator or intestate, only to the extent of the goods, chattels and credits, unadministered. Such was the effect of the commission to the administrator de bonis non, both before and after the statute. No alteration was made in the form of the commission, in consequence of the statute; nor was the statute ever held, in England, to have varied or enlarged the rights of the administrator de bonis non. No case has never occurred in England, in which an administrator de bonis non has ever asserted a claim against the representative of a deceased executor or administrator, at law or in equity, for an account of the assets wasted or converted to his own use, by the executor or administrator; and consequently, no adjudged case is to be found expressly denying or affirming the propriety of such a claim. Nor do I find any direct dictum to the point, one way or the other. This is only to be accounted for, by the supposition that it never occurred to any one there, that there was any foundation in law or equity, for such a claim; otherwise, cases must have occurred, in which it would have been necessary to decide that point; and, if such a right existed, it is impossible that there should not be found many instances of its having been asserted, in the reports of the decisions of the English Courts. The various questions which must have arisen in the prosecution of such claims, could not have escaped the attention of all the reporters and elementary writers. There is, however, abundant evidence in the adjudged cases, found in the English books, to shew that no such right existed, either before or after the Statute of Distributions.

I have already noticed the cases at law and in equity, in which the question has been between the executor or administrator of an executor or administrator, and the administrator de bonis non, as to their respective rights to particular subjects; many of which were subsequent to the Statute of Distributions, and in which the right of the administrator de bonis non to the particular subject, has been sustained, upon the ground that it was not converted, nor the property altered, or if altered at law, not altered in the contemplation of a Court of Equity; because the executor or administrator did not intend, by such alteration, to convert it to his own use. Other cases have occurred, where the same question has arisen in the Courts of Law and Equity, and has been determined in favour of the representative of the deceased executor or administrator, upon the ground that the subject of controversy had been administered or converted, and the property changed at law; and even when not changed at law, yet altered in the contemplation of a Court of Equity, by the act of the executor or administrator, with intent to convert it. Thus, an administrator, possessed of a term of his intestate, makes a lease for years of a part of it, reserving a rent, and makes his executor and dies; the executor of the administrator is entitled to the rent, and not the administrator de bonis non of the intestate. Dunn v. Baylie, Freeman's Rep. 392; Vent. 295; 2 Lev. 100; Noel v. Robinson, Vern. 94. The cases in equity of Butler v. Baker, Ch. Cas. 224, (1673,) and an anonymous case in 2 Vent. 362, (1683,) strongly illustrate these doctrines. The first of those cases was thus: "Administrator mortgages a term of the intestate's and makes A. his executor, and dies. B. takes administration de bonis non of the first intestate, and claims the residuary interest and trust in the term, and prays redemption. But, redemption was decreed to A., the executor of the first administrator, who had aliened the whole estate in law, of the term, and was not possessed in autre droit, nor of any part of the interest thereof, but in his own right; and so it shall go to his executor, and not to B. the administrator de bonis non."

The other case was thus: Administrator of the donee of a statute, had agreed with the consor to assign, in consideration of a sum of money, which, upon agreement, the consor had covenanted to pay to him, his executors or administrators. Administrator died. Decreed the money to be paid to the executor of the administrator, and not to the administrator de bonis non; although, before the extent, it could not be assigned at law, no debts of the first intestate appearing.

These cases were after the Statute of Distributions. In the last case, the legal title to the statute, belonged to the administrator de bonis non; and if debts of the first intestate had appeared, it is intimated that the equitable title of the executor of the administrator would not have prevailed against this legal title. Yet, the subject was liable to be brought into distribution, with any assets converted by the administrator.

If the representative of a deceased executor or administrator was liable administrator de bonis non, for the assets converted, upon what principle could the equity of redemption, in the first case, be decreed to the executor of the administrator? That he might receive the money, merely to account for it to the administrator de bonis non, a party in the very cause in which that decree was made? And upon what principle could the equitable right of the executor of the administrator, in the last case, prevail, against the legal title of the administrator de bonis non, if the money paid to the first was to be accounted for to the last?

It was suggested in the argument, that the first administrator may have been a creditor of the intestate, and therefore entitled to the fund to satisfy his claim. If so, he must have asserted that ground of claim, or the Court could not have presumed it; or if, on the other hand, he was a debtor to the estate, that fact would have been alleged to support the claim of the administrator de bonis non. But, no enquiry was made as to the fact, whether the deceased executor or administrator was a creditor or debtor of the estate, in any case; a proof, I think, that the fact had no influence, in any way, upon the rights of the parties.

75 *Again: If an administrator de bonis non had such a right as is now claimed, upon the best settled principles of a Court of Equity, legatees and distributees could not proceed in equity against the executor or administrator of a deceased executor or administrator, without making the administrator de bonis non a party; for, if he had the right claimed, he would be entitled to the assets converted, for the payment of debts, before the legatees and distributees could be entitled to anything. In that case, if there was no administrator de bonis non, the Court should not proceed in the suit, until one was appointed, and was brought before the Court. As, in the case of an executor de son tort, it is said, "There is no precedent in a Court of Equity of a decree against him, without setting up an administrator; for, if there should be an administrator, and the defendant pay the money, he would be again liable to the administrator." Edlows v. Deane, Bunb. 36. Yet, in the numerous cases cited in the argument, in which the legatees and distributees prosecuted suits against the representatives of deceased executors or administrators, for the assets converted, the administrator de bonis non was not a party, nor was the necessity that he should be a party suggested. 11 Vin. Abr. 420, pl. 4; 427, pl. 11; 423, pl. 18; Orr v. Mann, 2 Ves. 194. The rule is accurately laid down by Lord Chancellor King, in Swann v. Hooker, 2 Wms. Rep. 340, (1725.) "If an executor dies intestate, all the personal estate, the property whereof is not altered, shall go to the administrator de bonis non, and not to the next of kin of the executor; and this is true; for, from the time the executor dies intestate, the first testator dies intestate also; and it was the executor's own fault, that he did not, as he might, alter the property."

There are other considerations, arising out of well settled principles of law, which lead irresistibly to the conclusion that an administrator de bonis non had not a right in equity, either before or after the Statute of Distributions, to claim satisfaction from the representative of an executor or administrator, for assets wasted or converted to his use. Creditors, at common law, had no action against the executor or administrator of an executor or administrator, who had wasted or converted the assets to his own use; and in equity, a remedy was not allowed in such cases, until after the Statute of Distributions, and a little before the English Statutes gave a remedy in that case, at law. Now, such a remedy at law or in equity, would have been utterly superfluous, and the want of it could never have been felt, if the representative of a deceased executor or administrator was accountable to the administrator de bonis non, for the assets wasted or converted. The fund would have passed into his hands; and then, as assets in his hands to be administered, would have been liable to creditors. If he failed to coerce the payment, it would be a devastavit, like the failure to collect any other debt, and he would be liable for the amount to creditors, as if it had been actually received.

It has been seen, that an executor of an executor has precisely the same rights in respect to the assets of the first testator, which an administrator de bonis non has; that is, to all the goods, chattels and credits, not administered by the first executor; and an executor or administrator, who represents both the debtor and creditor, may retain the assets, which he has as executor or administrator of the debtor, for the satisfaction of the debt due to him, as executor or administrator of the creditor. 11 Vin. Abr. 261, pl. 3; Burdett v. Pin, 2 Brownl. 50. If then, the administrator de bonis non, who was also executor or administrator of the deceased executor or administrator, or the executor of an executor, were entitled to claim against the estate of the first executor or administrator, for the assets of the first testator or intestate, converted to their use or wasted, it would be their duty to retain out of the assets of the executor or administrator in their hands, the whole amount due to them for such conversion or waste, as administrator de bonis non or executor of the first testator 77 *or intestate; and the claim would be extinguished by operation of law, the instant the right and obligation concurred in the same persons. In such case, there never could have been any necessity for a Court of Equity to give relief to creditors against the representative of a deceased executor or administrator, upon the ground that they had no remedy at law; nor any occasion for the statute which gave them a remedy at law. It would have been absurd to allow to legatees and distributees a remedy in equity, against the representatives of the deceased executor; for, the debt of the deceased executor would be in the hands of the executor of the executor, as executor of the first testator, liable to creditors and legatees, and that before any suit could possibly be brought.

Again: An executor, before the Statute of Distributions, was entitled to the surplus of the assets, after the payment of debts and legacies, and since the statute, unless from the terms of the will it appears that the testator intended to exlude him from the surplus; and then he is a trustee for the next of kin. 11 Vin. Abr. 408, pl. 6, and note. He was not entitled as legatee, but as executor; so that the assets unadministered went to his executor, as immediate executor of the first testator, with precisely the same rights which the first executor had. The executor could not devise the assets unadministered; and if the executor died intestate, then was the testator intestate as to the assets not converted by the executor, and they went to the next of kin of the testator, and not of the executor. 11 Vin. Abr. 111, pl. 19-20. Thus, the right of the executor to the surplus, was virtually limited to the surplus of the assets, the property of which had been altered by his act in his life-time. If the estate of the first executor was responsible to the executor of the executor, as executor of the testator, for the assets so converted, this right to the surplus would be utterly frustrated, not only as to the first executor, but every succeeding executor ad infinitum; and after the payment of the debts and legacies of the testator, the residue

78 *of the assets of the testator would be transmitted ad infinitum from executor to executor, each succeeding as to such assets as the executor of the testator, and the fund would never be liable for any debts of the intermediate executors. If a creditor sued the executor of the executor for the debt of the executor, the executor of the executor would say, "my testator, the executor, was indebted for goods wasted and converted, to me as executor of the first testator, in a large sum which I have retained out of the assets of my immediate testator, and no more came to my hands, than was sufficient to pay that debt;" and so every succeeding executor ad infinitum. The right of an executor to the surplus, stands, in Virginia, precisely on the same footing that it does in England. This was certainly the case, until January 1, 1787, as was decided in Shelton v. Shelton, 1 Wash. 53, in this Court. In that case, a doubt is thrown out, whether, since the time when the act of 1785 took effect, the executor is not, by that act, deprived in all cases of the surplus. That act provides that "when any person shall die intestate as to his goods and chattels, or any part thereof, the surplus shall be distributed." The expression, or any part thereof, was adverted to in Shelton v. Shelton, as referring to all that was not actually bequeathed. I cannot think that the expression had that import. A testator might die testate as to part, and intestate as to other part of his estate. 11 Vin. Abr. 79, pl. 3. As, if he appointed an executor of all his goods in Virginia, leaving goods in Maryland, he would be intestate as to all the goods in Maryland; or, was to appoint an executor of a specified part of his goods, saying nothing of the residue, he would die intestate as to the residue; or, if his general executor died without administering or converting all his goods and chattels, the testator would be intestate as to all unadministered or unconverted, according to the cases before referred to. But, whenever a general executor was appointed, the testator was not intestate as to any part of his estate, unless the executor died without converting the whole; in which case, he would be intestate as to the part not converted, and it was to these cases of partial intestacy that the expression of the statute referred. All statutes should be construed, with reference to the principles of the common law; and the expression, "if intestate as to a part of the estate," means intestate according to the signification of that term as used in the common law. It was not intended by the statute, to give it an entirely new signification.

If the administrator de bonis non had the right now contended for, the statutes giving a remedy to creditors against the representatives of the deceased executor or administrator, for the waste or conversion of the assets, would not only have been useless for the reasons before stated, but the remedies of the creditors and of the administrator de bonis non, in relation to the same subject, would have been inconsistent in their effects. As respects the assets of such executor or administrator, the claim of all creditors (no matter what was their original dignity, in respect to the assets of the testator or intestate) were of equal dignity, and all ranked as simple contract debts only; and the first judgment was to be first satisfied. But, if the fund was to go into the hands of the administrator de bonis non, then the claims of creditors would rank upon the fund according to the original dignity of the debts. As against the executor or administrator of the executor or administrator, a simple contract creditor might get, by greater diligence, a preference over a bond creditor; which could not be done, as against the administrator de bonis non. If the administrator de bonis non had a right to claim the fund, the Legislature surely would not give to creditors a concurrent right to claim the same fund; the effect of which would be so totally different as to the ultimate rights of the different creditors; and that too, without any necessity.

It was argued that the Statutes of 30th Ch. 2, and 4th and 5th of Will. & Mary, did not give a remedy against an executor or administrator of an executor or administrator, "who had wasted or converted the assets, to any creditor, but such as had obtained a judgment against the executor or administrator in his life-time; and that, therefore, in order to provide for creditors who had not obtained judgment in the life-time of the executor or administrator, the fund should go into the hands of the administrator de bonis non, so that the creditors who had not obtained judgments might be satisfied. If this proposition were true, there was the same necessity before as since the statutes, to give the fund to the administrator de bonis non; and if that had been the law, the statute would have been unnecessary. But it seems to me, that the statute gives a right to all creditors, whether they had obtained judgments against the executor or administrator in his life-time or not, to sue the representative of the executor or administrator, and to allege in his declaration, the existence of the debt, that assets sufficient to pay it had come to the hands of the executor or administrator, and that he had wasted or converted them. This construction is necessary to give effect to the statutes. The declaration that the executor or administrator was liable, relates to the substance of the liability, and not to the mode of enforcing it. In an original suit against an executor or administrator, a devastavit cannot be put in issue, nor any thing, but whether the debt be due, and whether assets sufficient to satisfy it, in a due course of administration, have come to the hands of the executor or administrator. 11 Vin. Abr. 312, pl. 7. If the devastavit could be enquired of, then a personal judgment would be the consequence, whilst it might happen, that although the executor had committed a devastavit by paying debts of an inferior dignity, or by releasing a debt improperly, or by converting the goods to his own use; yet, there might be assets sufficient remaining to satisfy the creditor, upon execution; in which case, none of those things would be an injury or devastavit, as to that creditor. It only becomes an injury to him, when, by a return of nulla bona, it appears that such acts had 81 prevented the *recovery of his debt.

It would, therefore, be premature to enquire into a devastavit, before it appeared that such devastavit had injured the creditor. But, after the death of the executor or administrator, none of the assets of the testator or intestate, can remain in the hands of his representative, answerable to the claim of the creditor; and in a suit against such representative, an enquiry into the devastavit becomes pertinent and proper; for that is the only foundation of the plaintiff's claim. The gist of the action by a creditor of the testator, against the executor for a devastavit, is not the debt of the testator, but the tort of the executor in wasting the assets, which ought to have been applied to the payment of the debt. The action is therefore against the executor in the debt and detinet, for the recovery of compensation against him individually, for his tort; and the debt of the testator, ascertained by the judgment against the executor, is introduced collaterally, as an inducement to the action, and as furnishing the measure of compensation. Wheatley v. Lane, 1 Saund. 216. So the gist of an action against the administrator of an executor, for the devastavit of the executor, would be the personal wrong of the executor, which, by the common law, died with the person, but for which the administrator of the executor is responsible, in his character of administrator, by the statute. The action is not for the recovery of the debt eo nomine, as the debt of the testator, but for compensation for the injury done by the executor; and the debt is matter of inducement, and the measure of the recovery. It is not at all uncommon, that the question whether a debt, and to what amount, is due to the plaintiff by a stranger to the defendant, is necessarily put in issue; as in the case of an escape, the creditor, in a suit against the sheriff, may recover the amount of the debt which he can prove to be due to him
